No. 601.] [PRICE ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending July 7th, 1900.

What I Owe Michael Ragsdale.

It was never my good fortune to meet Michael Ragsdale, although once his existence and mine touched one another very nearly.

A man who had come in contact with him at a club in town once told me that he never encountered a more charming and courteous gentleman, and that Ragsdale was as great a genius in his way as Napoleon and Goethe were in theirs. Another individual, who had had in Paris some experience with Mr. Ragsdale's methods, assured me that no greater villain ever went unhanged. So much depends upon the point of view.

The time to which I refer when this interesting person crossed my path (to use a good old theatrical phrase) was in March three years ago. I was then playing a rather unimportant part in a highly successful piece which had run all the season at the Frivolity Theatre.

At the time I speak of the theatre was closed temporarily. I was glad of the rest, for the season had been a long disappointment to me. This was because I had not been allowed to play the part of the Cardinal. Only an actor who knows himself to be well fitted to interpret a strong rôle and sees it given to someone else, can appreciate my feelings.

The whole of London was then ringing with the famous Blemworth-Dally diamond robbery, and had been for a week. But not the most brilliant jewel in that whole superb collection seemed as bright to my mind as did the lost opportunity to play the Cardinal. This is one of the bitter experiences associated with my profession.

On Tuesday of the week before Easter, I was reminded that other people beside myself had their troubles. At four o'clock in the afternoon I received by special messenger the following strange note:

MY DEAR CROWSMITH,—I find myself suddenly in deep trouble, and you can help me if you will. I am at present in Croydon, at Norman's Hotel. I must keep out of town for a while, and it is highly important that I should not be seen and recognised. Will you come down here this evening and bring me one or two of your wigs and a beard. Also, please bring a revolver, if possible, as I would feel safer with it. This sounds very mysterious, but I will explain all when I see you. Do not disappoint me, old friend—this is a matter of life and death.

Yours in distress,

H. WILLEY.

Destroy this.

All rights reserved.]

Harry Willey was a clever comedian, whose erratic nature had more than once caused him to be entangled in the meshes of the law. But he had a big heart, and had often proved his friendship to me. I could not neglect him in this extremity, and while making all manner of conjectures regarding the nature of this latest scrape of his, I set about carrying out his instructions.

I packed a handbag with a few articles of clothing I thought he might want, and put in two wigs, a false beard and a cavalry revolver I owned. Then, as a further aid to disguise, I added a pair of green goggles. It is necessary to my story that I relate my subsequent movements in some detail.

I left the Berkshire where I was then staying, at 5.30 o'clock, and as I went out I received my last correspondence, which included a paper, from the clerk at the desk with whom I left the key.

I then went to London Bridge and caught the train for Croydon. On my way I opened my letters, which were unimportant, and turned to the paper, which was addressed to me in a strange hand. It was a copy of an illustrated weekly publication issued that day. As I turned the leaves I came suddenly upon a full-page portrait of myself.

Pleased as I was of this mark of recognition of my artistic merit, I could not think how the editors had obtained the picture. I had not been asked for one, nor could I recall the photograph of which it was a reproduction. From the picture my eyes wandered to the lettering beneath it, and I gave a great start as I read:

"Michael Ragsdale, bank-robber, forger, counterfeiter and expert thief, the man who committed the great Blemworth-Dally diamond robbery, and for whom the entire police force of the city is searching."

Digitized by Google

With the realization that this was not my likeness at all, but that of a vicious criminal, came a decidedly disagreeable sensation.

This Michael Ragsdale, then, looked so much like me that I, myself, was deceived by his picture. The resemblance was certainly amazing. After a further contemplation of the face of this worthy, I turned to a sketch of his life on the opposite page.

No one knew whence this wonderful man, with the face of an ascetic, and the soul of an arch-fiend, had come. He was believed to have been born in New South Wales. It was certain that long before he was twenty he was fairly launched upon a life of crime in that colony. He appeared in England in 1876, and was concerned in several daring robberies. He went successively to Paris, Vienna and Berlin, with always the same story of successful knavery. Twice only was he captured on the Continent, and both times made his escape under such remarkable circumstances as to suggest the supernatural.

Then he went back to America. In San Francisco he directed the celebrated Wattles Bank robbery in which a clerk was d ugged and a watchman killed. In Chicago he turned up as the head of a gang of counterfeiters.

There, after months of successful operation, he was captured, but on the very evening of his arrest he knocked senseless, with the handcuffs which bound him, the detective who had him in charg , and vanished like a wraith.

In New Orleans he was again taken, and escaped from a prison yard, to have egress from which he must have scaled a wall forty feet high. No trace of rope or ladder was found. Many other such instances were given.

His reappearance in London in 1891, and his part in the great robbery by which Duhamel and Co., the jewellers, lost £50,000, were well remembered. On that occasion, too, he was arrested, and this was the only time on record that Michael Ragsdale was ever brought to trial. The great sensation which his acquittal on a technicality caused would not soon be forgotten. From the day he bowed politely to the judge, who frowningly discharged him, up to the night of the Blemworth-Dally diamond robbery, Michael Ragsdale had not again been seen in London.

Then followed a graphic description of the famous sensation. No more brilliant feat of robbery from a second-storey room had ever been attempted.

The success of Ragsdale's plans were imperilled at the last moment, but again his wonderful pluck saved him.

Mr. Dally had forgotten his opera glasses, and sent his man back for them. The servant, ascending the stairs, saw the thief in the hall, and made a leap for him. Ragsdale had recourse to no noisy firearms, or tell-tale knives, but a blow from his powerful arm sent the man backward down the flight of stairs.

Stunned, and with a broken arm, the plucky fellow staggered to the front door, and shouted an alarm. It was answered promptly, but Ragsdale had vanished into the night, and the jewels with him. Within twenty minutes the full story of the robbery was at the police headquarters.

Mr. Dally's man had obtained a good view of the burglar in the brightly lighted hall, and when he said "he looked like a gentleman, and something like a clergyman," Mike Ragsdale was the name which sprang to the mind of every detective who heard the description.

It was a splendid case by which to test the merits of the Detective Department.

From that night on, every means of escape from the city was watched by lynx-eyed men, each of whom had the features of Michael Ragsdale burned into his brain.

When I had finished reading this entertaining sketch, I turned again to the portrait.

"Well, Ragsdale, my double," I said, "we are both artists in our way, it seems, only you are recognised as such, while I—ah, if I only had the part of Cardinal!"

I sighed as my thoughts returned to the grievance which beset me.

With my penknife I cut the picture from the paper and put it in my pocket. We were now at New Croydon station. I took up my bag and leaving the station walked towards the hotel.

Suddenly I felt each arm grasped from behind by a pair of strong hands. I turned and saw a grim face and stalwart figure on either side.

"What does this mean?" I demanded.

A third figure appeared in front of me and slipped a pair of steel bracelets over my wrist. Then I had my answer.

"It means, Mike Ragsdale, that we want you."

In vain I declared I was not Mike Ragsdale, but only an innocent actor named Crowsmith on his way to see a friend.

The detectives hurried me along through the streets without heeding my words, intent only upon escaping the crowd which had begun to gather. When I found that I must go with them I protested against the indignity of the handcuffs, but without avail. Silently they took me to another platform where we got into an up-train which was about to start. A detective sat on each side of me while two others sat opposite. I was certainly an important capture.

After I had recovered from the first shock occasioned by my arrest and saw that the detectives were considerably aiding me in concealing my manacles, I even felt a grim humour in the situation. I promised myself that this false arrest should be dearly paid for, and the thought even crossed my mind that it would be a good advertisement for William Crowsmith, comedian.

When we arrived at London Bridge Station the news of an important arrest had evidently preceded us. The barrier was surrounded by newspaper men.

I was hurried into a cab and driven to Bow Street, where I was taken at once into the private room of Inspector Fitzallen, the senior officer on duty. He was a tall fine-looking man, who sat at his desk with an appearance of great composure, which seemed, I thought, not quite genuine. He gave one quick glance at me and then addressed the man who still held me firmly by the right arm.

"Detective-Sergeant Canby," he said, "you are deserving of great credit for having effected the capture of one of the most dangerous criminals of the century. I confess I did not attach much importance to that anonymous letter. Your judgment was better than mine, and I shall recommend you for promotion. Well, Mr. Ragsdale," addressing me in a tone of light raillery, "I suppose you are ready to tell me now where the jewels are."

"I am not Mr. Ragsdale," I said, with what dignity I could command, "but an actor of the Frivolity Theatre Company. My name is William Crowsmith, and I am the victim of an outrageous blunder for which someone shall suffer."

The Inspector raised his eyebrows slightly, and said:

"What is in that bag?"

Sergeant Canby forced the slight lock and enumerated the articles as he took them out:

"One brown wig, one light wig, one brown beard and moustache, a pair of green goggles, one large revolver," the rest of the articles were clothing.

"Mr. Ragsdale pays a high compliment to the London police," said the Inspector in the same mocking tone, "in not deeming it worth while to assume these clumsy disguises here. He was doubtless reserving them for 'the road.'"

Then my pockets were searched. I had no letters, having destroyed Willey's, and my pocket-book contained no cards. The only thing of interest found here was the portrait of Ragsdale.

"Ah, the picture in this week's Illustrated London News—an excellent one it is, too," said the Inspector; "it seems to have struck his fancy. How many were there in the gang, Ragsdale?" this in an easy, confidential tone.

"I belong to no 'gang,'" I said, my voice shaking with anger, "and I repeat that I am not Ragsdale."

Inspector Fitzallen paid not the slightest attention to what I said. He beckoned to Canby and the other detective, and the three held a long whispered consultation. It was interrupted by a sharp rap at the door, and a policeman hurried in.

"Walters is here, Inspector," he said, saluting

Inspector Fitzallen turned to me and said in a hard voice:

"Ragsdale, I am going to take off your handcuffs."

The handcuffs removed, I was placed against the wall in line with half-a-dozen men in plain clothes. At a signal the policeman who had saluted returned, bringing a man who had a discoloured circle round his left eye and carried one arm in a sling.

"Walters," said Inspector Fitzallen, "if you see here the man whom you saw on the night of the 21st—the man who knocked you downstairs, put your hand on him."

Walters glanced along the line once. His face was very pale as he took two steps forward and pointed at me.

"That is the man," he said.

"Touch him," said the Inspector.

The man came nearer, put a finger on my shoulder and stepped back quickly.

"That is all, thank you," said the Inspector.

His face indicated the greatest satisfaction.

"Inspector Fitzallen!" I burst out, feeling myself possessed of sudden fury, "do you mean to ignore me utterly? I have told you again and again that I am not Michael Ragsdale, and have told you who I am. I, an innocent man, have been dragged through the streets in a most humiliating manner, and have been threatened by you and your men because of my resemblance—a very strong one I admit—to a vile criminal. The resemblance is so striking as to have deceived even myself, for when I saw that picture this afternoon I thought it was my own. You must not treat me like this—you must listen to me."

My words had had an effect, I could see, and I followed up my advantage, speaking earnestly but more calmly:

"I know from the papers that you have not been long in your present position. To have effected the capture of this celebrated thief, who has eluded justice for all these years, would make your name famous on both sides of the ocean. But to let it go forth to the world that you have made this brilliant catch, and find out in the morning that you have bagged only a harmless actor, will make a laughing-stock of you. Surely you will lose nothing by moving carefully, and I can prove my identity in thirty minutes."

The Inspector was visibly interested. He paused a moment before he said:

"How can you prove that your claim is true?"

"By simply sending a line to the manager of the Frivolity Theatre, or to one of my friends at the Berkshire, where I am staying. Please give me some paper and a pencil."

The Inspector hesitated, again eyeing me closely. Then he took a pad of paper from his desk.

"It seems ridiculous under the circumstances," he muttered, "but I will do it."

I wrote two notes both to the same effect, that by a singular mistake I had been arrested as the man who had committed the Blenworth-Dally robbery, and begging the recipient to come at once to the Police Station and identify me.

"One of these notes is to Mr. Hopkins, manager of the Frivolity," I told Inspector Fitzallen. "The theatre is closed, and your messenger may not be be able to find him easily. The other note is to my friend, Mr. Rostyn, who is staying at the Berkshire. He is almost sure to be there at this hour. Should he not be, have your messenger show the note to the proprietor, or the clerk at the desk. Everyone about the hotel knows me."

The officer took the notes, read both of them, and pressed a button on his desk for a messenger.

After the man had gone he did not speak to me again, but I caught him looking at me in a peculiar manner two or three times, and I felt that in spite of the identification made by Mr. Blenworth-Dally's man he was not altogether satisfied with the night's work.

I do not think he relished my presence in the room during the wait, for calling in the two principal detectives, he gave them some whispered order, and I was marched out between them.

I was taken to a large, brightly lighted cell, and a comfortable chair was handed in to me. The two men did not leave the cell door after I was locked in.

The time of waiting seemed very long, but at length the summons came to bring me in.

I walked between the two men back into the Inspector's room.

The Inspector sat at his desk, and beside him stood the messenger. Detectives in plain clothes and men in uniform were all about.

After a rapid glance round the room I looked at the Inspector, expecting his apology for arresting and detaining me. He was looking at me sternly. I became suddenly aware that the detectives retained a tight hold on my arms. The voice of the Inspector in harsh, staccato tones broke the silence:

"Well, Ragsdale, perhaps you will be good enough to tell me what that trick of yours meant."

"Why do you continue to address me by that name?" I said. "As for your insulting remark, I don't know what it means."

"It means," he said, speaking slowly and distinctly, "that Mr. William Crowsmith, the actor, whom you claim to be, is at home in bed."

"It is a lie!" I burst out, "for I am William Crowsmith, and it is you who have tricked me. You did not send the messenger, so sure were you of your game."

The Inspector smiled indulgently.

"Riggs," he said, "will you repeat for Mr. Ragsdale and the gentlemen of the Press all that you told me a few minutes ago."

P.C. Riggs stepped forward, and, with evident appreciation of the importance of his story, began:

"I first went to Mr. Hopkins' house in Lincoln Street. He wasn't there, and his whereabouts wasn't known. Then I went up to the Berkshire and found Mr. Rostyn in. He is a tall gentleman, with reddish face and hair white on the temples. I gave him the note, and after he had read it he said:

"'Why, this is very strange, I can't understand it. Mr. Crowsmith was here a little while ago, and is in his own apartment now, unless I am very much mistaken.'

"He asked me what time the man was arrested. I said, 'Six o'clock.'

"He said, 'It was nearly half-past, I know, when Crowsmith came in here. He was suffering from toothache. He had started to go to Croydon to see a friend, he said, but turned back because his tooth was so bad. I gave him something to put on it, and he left, saying he was going to bed.'

"Then Mr. Rostyn looked at the note again and remarked that it did look like Crowsmith's writin'."

"Mr. Ragsdale is an expert penman, as we all know," interjected Sergeant Canby.

"And then," continued Riggs, "he said he'd go and see, and told me I could go with him if I liked. I followed him down the hall and turned into another little hall about thirty feet away, and he rapped on a door. He had to rap twice before he got an answer, and then the gentleman inside said very cross-like, "'Well, what do you want?'

"'It's me, Crowsmith,' said Mr. Rostyn, 'I want to speak to you a minute.'

"'What is it, Rostyn?' he said, still quite impatient-like.

"'You're not in any trouble, are you?' asked Mr. Rostyn.

"'Yes, I am, in a lot of trouble with this infernal tooth,' and the gentleman swore a little; 'did you wake me up to ask me that?'

"'No,' says the other one, 'but I've got a note from you here saying you've been arrested and that you're in prison. You haven't been arrested, have you?'

"Then Mr. Crowsmith swore a good deal more, and we could hear him punching his pillows. He told Mr. Rostyn he thought it was a mean trick of him coming and waking him up when he knew he was suffering, just to play a poor joke on him. Mr. Rostyn seemed to feel pretty bad about it himself, and told me to come back and tell you, sir, that Mr. Crowsmith was in bed and that he guessed you'd caught a 'sharp one.'

I listened to this amazing recital first with indignation and then with astonishment. The man was telling the truth—that was evident.

Then, suddenly, I felt the half-hypnotic influence of all those eyes fastened upon me. Every man in that room believed me to be a clumsy liar, and had it not been proved that I was one?

The test I myself proposed had resulted that the man I claimed to be was at his home, while the friend I had appealed to had pronounced me a "sharper." What could I say? I had no longer strength or indignation left for another outburst. My only feeling was one of shame, and muttering something, I did not know what, I bowed my head.

The papers of the following morning somehow got to know about my interview, and described this scene far more graphically than I can.

"When Ragsdale was brought in," they said, "his appearance surprised those who had never seen him before.

"He is of medium height, but his figure is upright and commanding. He has a fine tranquil eye and a scholarly mouth and jaw.

"He gazed about the room with an air of conscious inborn superiority to the men who held him prisoner. His expression of intense astonishment as he listened to the recital of Inspector Fitzallen's messenger was more admirably acted than the finest histrionic effort of Mr. William Crowsmith.

"When it was over, however, the realisation that the game was up seemed to strike him suddenly. The charmed life had come to an end. In Inspector Fitzallen this master-thief and arch criminal had at last met his match. A deep blush succeeded by a greyish pallor o'erspread his face. The flexible mouth moved, but no words came. Then the thin lips were drawn back tightly, exposing the strong white fangs. A baleful gleam shot from the narrowed eyes. The expression was that of a wolf which sees vanishing the last hope of escape from the trap which clutches him, Michael Ragsdale lowered his head. He owned himself beaten at last.

"What his object was no one can guess. The scheme was a clumsy one, for the resemblance to the actor is not in any way marked, and this is probably the first time in his career that Michael Ragsdale has ever been accused of clumsiness. He wanted to gain time, evidently, but whatever his hope it perished miserably, and one could not suppress a feeling akin to pity for the man as he was led back to his cell in almost a state of collapse.

"Inspector Fitzallen probably suspected an attempt at suicide, for he ordered a double guard to be placed over Ragsdale for the night."

That night of horror I shall not attempt to describe. Before morning I was half persuaded that I was, in fact, Ragsdale, and that I had been leading some hideous dual existence of which I was only now becoming dimly aware. I wondered what my punishment would be, for I saw no possible hope of escape now. It seemed useless to send for any more of my friends, for was I not at home asleep?—and to-morrow I would be walking about among them. I thought that possibly William Crowsmith would come to the prison or the court-room to look at me, and I felt a vague curiosity to see him.

I even remembered poor Willey waiting for me in Croydon. He would be greatly disappointed, but perhaps the other Mr. Crowsmith would go when his tooth got better.

Next morning, Bow Street Police-court contained an interested assemblage. Of course Inspector Fitzallen was there, and so were Mr. Blemworth-Dally, and half-a-dozen of his aristocratic friends.

Outside the rail every inch of space was filled with the great public, and the doors were surrounded with hundreds of others clamouring for admission. All knew from the morning papers that Michael Ragsdale had been taken the night before, and that he was to appear in Court this morning.

I knew nothing of all these people until afterwards, for I paid little attention to externals then. I was only anxious to get away from that crowd, whose eyes I could feel staring at me as at some caged beast.

Mr. Dally told his story and Mr Dally's man again identified me. Inspector Fitzallen and Detective-sergeant Canby also talked but I listened to none of them. It all seemed such an old story now, and its truth as far as I was concerned was practical, if not actual.

The magistrate addressed one or two questions to me, but I shook my head.

I heard the magistrate say, "I must adjourn the examination till Friday," and then Inspector Fitzallen, who now treated me with the greatest consideration, asked me if I had thought of engaging counsel.

I was about to reply that I did not consider it necessary when I caught sight of something — the only real, tangible thing I had seen since I entered upon this strange world of unreality. It was the florid face and white hair of Rostyn, who was forcing his way through the crowd towards the railing. I caught his eye, and held my breath while I waited.

"Crowsmith, old man, what must you think?" he said, as he grasped my hand.

After this I did not care. I knew who I was and knew that I should soon be free. I felt faint and dizzy, for I had eaten nothing since my arrest, and I leaned heavily against the railing. I caught only fragments of what followed.

"But, your worship," Inspector Fitzallen was saying, "this is the very man who sent me word last night that he had seen and talked to Mr. Crowsmith after the time that the prisoner was arrested."

"That is true," replied Rostyn, "but early this morning I went to Mr. Crowsmith's room and found him gone, and the bed not slept in. I thought, in view of the note I had received, something strange must have happened, and I came down here to investigate. All I know is that I can swear that is Mr. Crowsmith standing there."

"Your worship, this may be some new trick of this dangerous man. The people cannot accept any such absurd identification. Who is this Mr. Rostyn?"

"You vouch for the prisoner being Mr. Crowsmith, Mr. Rostyn; can anyone vouch for you?" said the magistrate.

Rostyn looked round the court-room.

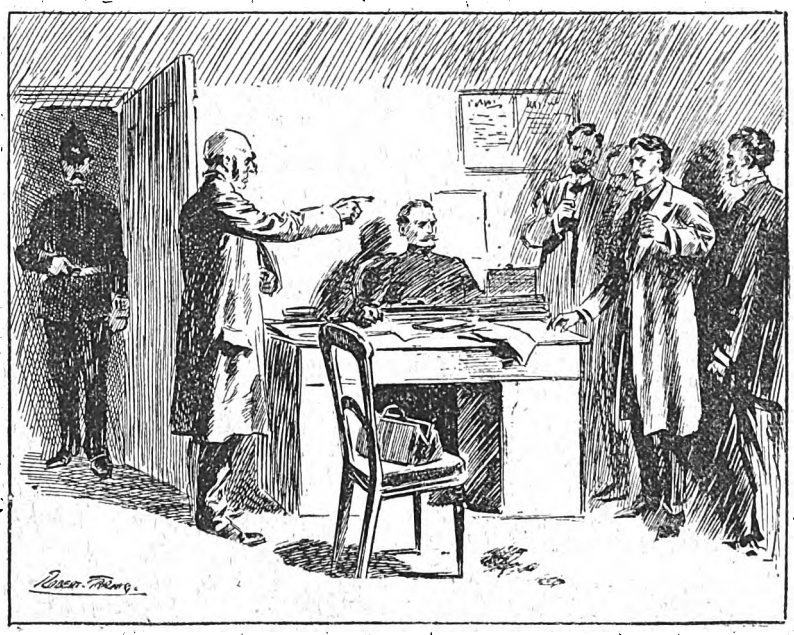
"Yes; I think I see someone," he said, smiling.

Mr. Hopkins, the Frivolity manager, was pressing toward the magistrate's bench, and just behind him came Harry Willey.

Both seized my hands, and while Mr. Hopkins began to explain that he had received my note only an hour ago, Willey interrupted with a question about why I had written that strange letter begging him to come up to London yesterday. Everything seemed to be in a muddle, and the next thing I heard was the magistrate's voice saying:

"There can be no doubt, Inspector Fitzallen, that your men made a blunder. This gentleman has been unmistakably identified as William Crowsmith. The question now is, who was the man in Mr. Crowsmith's room last night?"

No one replied to the question. I looked at Inspector Fitzallen's face and then I began to understand.



He took two steps forward and pointed at me.

Somewhere, it may be in New York, Hamburg or Buda Pesth, that demoniac, dynamic force is still at work, and wherever it appears the power of evil triumphant is demonstrated anew. When the story of that strange life is written there can be in it no more wonderful chapter than that which tells how he eluded the entire London police force after the Blemworth-Dally diamond robbery.

Ragsdale was imprisoned in the city as a lion is imprisoned in a wood which the hunters have surrounded. He might rove to and fro in this forest of brick and stone for a greater or less period, but his ultimate capture was certain. He knew when not to tempt Fate too far, and he acquiesced in the inevitable—Michael Ragsdale must be taken.

At some time, it may have been months or years before this, he had learned of a rather obscure actor who bore a marvellous resemblance to himself. That man was then marked as his own, to be used in a possible day of need. The day had come, and the man was here. He should act as a vicarious Michael Ragsdale, and be taken in his stead.

He gleaned some particulars of the actor's friends and habits and then the plot was formed. The decoy letter, purporting to be written by a friend in trouble and asking the actor to come with disguises—the letter getting the friend himself out of the way, and the anonymous note warning the police—all were his work. So was the paper containing his portrait—posted to arrive in the nick of time, and with the wigs and fire-arms made a nice accumulation of presumptive evidence.

The plan worked like a charm. We moved in accordance with his will like the pieces on a chess-board, and Crowsmith, hastening to the relief of his friend, was caught with the incriminating evidence upon him.

Thus far, however, the plot was one which could have been devised by almost any clever intelligence. Only a Ragsdale could have conceived the act of sublime daring which followed.

It was highly probable that Mr. Crowsmith would be able to prove his identity within an hour after his arrest. Then all the cunning scheming would go for naught. The thing must be fixed up properly, and the news go forth throughout the city and the country that Ragsdale had been caught. Then the detectives would be called off, and the way would be clear for escape. Mr. Crowsmith would send, naturally, to his manager and his hotel.

The former was difficult to find at this time. The main reliance would be placed on his friends in the house where he lived, and there he must be found.

Accordingly, within twenty minutes of the time when Michael Ragsdale was arrested at Croydon, William Crowsmith, attired in the long, light overcoat and soft hat he always wore, walked leisurely into the Berkshire. He asked for his key at the desk, and spoke a few words to the clerk on duty. Then he went to his own room, stopping on the way to speak to his particular friend, Rostyn.

Mr. Crowsmith had the toothache, and kept a handkerchief pressed to his lips for the greater part of the time. This was also his reason for retiring early.

When the messenger from the Court arrived with a ridiculous forged note Mr. Crowsmith was in bed—apparently.

But sometime in the dead of night Mr. Crowsmith left the room and the house unseen. His pockets were filled with letters and papers by which he could easily prove his identity in case he should be stopped. And since the hour when William Crowsmith vanished into the night, Michael Ragsdale has never been seen.

As for me, with the disappearance from the scene of that marvellous personality, I became the central figure in this nine days' wonder. My picture was in every shop window. People came from miles round to see the man who had been so potent a factor in the escape of the famous criminal, and who bore so startling a resemblance to him.

And thus it was that I came prominently before the public, for when the theatre reopened—and this is what I owe to Michael Ragsdale—I played the part of the Cardinal.

A Lover's Scheme.

I HAD been in Athens three or four days when the steamer from Brindisi brought in an English tourist named Burns and an American gentleman and his daughter named Wallace.

Mr. Wallace, as I soon came to understand, was a gentleman of wealth and leisure, and his daughter was as handsome a girl as had ever landed in the country of tombs, mosquitoes, beggars and brigands.

As for Burns, I believe he was some sort of Civil Service employé on leave, but he had some money and greater expectations. The three had become acquainted while doing Italy.

More than that, Burns had fallen head over ears in love with Miss Wallace. I am inclined to think she was a bit of a coquette and that she encouraged him out of a spirit of adventure. The father was a dignified, quiet-spoken man, who probably had his own plans for his daughter and trusted her not to go too far with the Englishman.

While he treated Burns in a courteous manner, there was a reserve which the latter did not dare approach too closely. I thought I saw through the whole thing at a glance. It was love and dollars on the Englishman's part, and on the part of the girl a desire for flirtation and a half hope that the man would make a fool of himself.

We all became acquainted in a day's time, and after the expiration of another day young Burns gave me his confidence. He was in love for the first time in his life. He had never dreamed that there were angels on earth until he met Miss Wallace. The man who charged him with a mercenary feeling wronged him in the most terrible manner. He had somehow heard that her father was a millionaire and that she was an only child, but he begged me to understand that he was loving her with his whole soul before that news reached him. I believed him, and he added:

"And now comes the question, 'Does Miss Wallace love me in return?' There are times when I think she does, and my heels lift off the ground; and there are other times when I doubt it, and I feel as if a house had fallen on me."

"Why not ask her?" I suggested.

"I'm afraid it's too soon," he replied, "and then the old gentleman somehow always manages to show up just as we get sentimental. I don't think he appreciates me. If I went to him and said I loved his daughter, I believe he'd keep on reading his newspaper and smoking his beastly black cigar—I really do! If I only had someone to sound him for me!"

"You ought to do something heroic to win the girl's admiration and love, and the father's gratitude and esteem," I said after a long while.

"Well, I just about think I will!" he promptly replied—"that is, I would if there were a chance. I was ready to save them both if the steamer went down, but she simply rolled about like a log in a pond and refused to sink when I prayed for it."

"But there may be other opportunities."

"How can there be unless to keep the mosquitoes and beggars off? My goodness, but I suffer!"

I didn't see how I could help him except to advise him to learn his fate on the morrow and have it done with, and then go up to Marathon and see the ruins and the tombs and get out of Greece. Loverlike, he went out into the balmy evening to commit suicide, and I saw him no more until next afternoon.

He not only still lived, but there was a look of happiness on his face as I saw him talking to a man I would not have cared to meet a mile out of town at noonday. That evening Mr. Wallace informed me that he and his daughter and Burns were going over to Marathon by rail next day to be gone for a couple of days, and at a later hour the lover sat down beside me to say:

Digitized by Google

"I've got a fine game on foot, old chap."

"Going to become a hero?" I asked.

"If I don't, then you may call me a donkey. Yes, sir, I've taken your advice, and there'll be something happen within a day or two. Thanks, awfully, for the hint. I hope to come back arm in arm with the old gent and to have matters all settled with the daughter, my boy."

As I had been at Marathon I had declined to make one of the party. They got off in good time next morning, and Burns was in high spirits and acting like a young man who felt solid ground beneath his feet.

To my surprise, Mr. Wallace and his daughter returned by the evening train, and they had an adventure to relate.

From Marathon you make a tour of the tombs on the backs of donkeys, and it is a rough road and full of ambushes.

The trio had started out by themselves and made fair progress when a couple of picturesque villains suddenly pounced out upon them. The escort of a man and his two boys fled at once, and the villains were about to lead the donkeys up into the hills when Burns came to the rescue. He alone was armed. He descended from his saddle and began shooting, and after tumbling over themselves the scoundrels left him in possession of the battle-field.

He had saved the party, and he was a hero, entitled to admiration and gratitude, but before the father could pat him on the head or the daughter announce that his love was returned something else happened.

Shots were fired from behind a ruin, and the donkeys ridden by father and daughter started off into a gallop followed by the others. Burns was not hit, but in his confusion over the new attack he lingered and was captured.

Thus the hero of one moment became the captive of the next.

When the others had reached a place of safety, they learnt that their saviour had fallen into the hands of regular brigands, headed by old Beppo, and, though a show of pursuit was made by a detachment of soliders, the fellows were not overtaken.

As soon as I had heard the story I saw the little scheme Burns had worked.

He had hired a couple of rascals in Athens to go over to Marathon and play brigands for him, but after becoming a hero, a gang of the genuine article swooped down on him and carried him off.

The only man in Marathon or Athens who was at all disturbed over the matter was the landlord of the hotel, who feared he might not get his bill settled. Mr. Wallace and his daughter seemed to have a suspicion after their return that a little job had been put up, but the father came forward and guaranteed the hotel bill, and not a great deal was said. Two days later an ugly faced native presented Wallace with a note from Burns. He had not only been carried off, but the brigands wanted five hundred pounds in gold for his ransom. In his trunk he had about fifty pounds, but they had refused that. The rascals took it that he was a rich man's prospective son-in-law and that the five hundred pounds would be forthcoming at once, but the American carried the note to the British consulate.

The minister was away for a holiday, and the official in charge had no intention of disturbing himself in the matter.

He said he would notify the Greek government and that in due time the matter would be settled.

Two days later there was a second note.

Burns said if the messenger came back without the cash he would lose one of his ears.

When this was handed in at the consulate, it was greeted with the remark:

"The case must take the usual course, and he was an ass to go and get captured."

Two days passed again, and this time the messenger handed Mr. Wallace a bulky letter. Its bulk arose from the fact that one of Burns' ears was inclosed.

In the letter he stated that unless the cash was raised he would lose the other.

The sight of the ear stirred them up at the consulate—that is, another demand was made on the Greek government, and the Greek government replied that the case would be taken up in its regular order.

Then Wallace did a handsome thing. The messenger had been detained to see what the minister would do, and, as it was plain that nothing would be done until too late, the ransom was paid.

It was three days before the prisoner was handed over. His right ear had been sliced off beautifully, and he had had a hard time of it moving about on the mountains in the company of the villains. He did not come to the hotel, but sent for me to come to the lodgings he had secured. While his gratitude to Wallace was unbounded and he said he would speedily arrange to repay him, he did not want to meet him.

"Egad," said he, "but don't you see how it is? The hero is no hero, but an ass! He must have seen through my little game. The fact is, the two terrible villains I had hired for the little comedy began to fall down and beg for their lives before I had fired a shot. I believe the old gent was smiling when the donkeys started to run. The brutes overdid it, you see. No, I can't see him. It would quite upset me if he took my hand and pressed it and said: 'Hero, I thank thee for thy gallant conduct.'"

"But the girl?" I queried.

"Egad, but that's worse yet. I saw her looking at one of the villains to see where he was hit, and I heard her ask her father 'if the fellow wasn't running rather fast for a wounded man.' I couldn't face it, you know. She might fall on my neck and call me a hero and declare that I saved her life, but it's more likely that she'd welcome me as the prize donkey of the century. Really, but I couldn't take chances, absolutely."

"And how about your volcanic and overwhelming love, angels on earth and so forth?"

"Why, hang it, man, can't you understand the situation? Haven't I lost an ear and made an ass of myself, and does a one-eared ass love like a two-eared man? Can't you see that the rest of my life will be spent in feeling for the ear that's probably been thrown to the dogs of Athens? And when I'm not feeling for the ear I'll be training a lock of hair to fall down where it ought to be, and if there's any time left, I'll put it in kicking myself, d'ye see?"

I saw and sent his belongings over to him and gave him my sympathy, and that evening when I told Miss Wallace that he was going by the next boat, a small grin hovered round her mouth as she replied:

"Papa must find me that ear as a souvenir!"

Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XIII. HE COMES HOME GOOD-NATURED AND GOES TO BED HAPPY.

WHEN Mr. Bowser let himself into the house the other evening he did something which almost made Mrs. Bowser jump out of her shoes.

He called out in a cheery voice:

"Where is that blessed little wife of mine! Why isn't she here to receive a dozen kisses?"

"You—you are home?" she faltered, as she met him at the door of the sitting-room, and wondered if she had heard aright.

"Of course I'm here, old sweetheart!" he exclaimed as he gave her a kiss on the cheek and a pat on the head. "Glad to see your hubby, eh? How's dinner? Of course you've got something delicious to eat."

He kissed her again, and then putting his arm round her in a loverlike way escorted her to the dining-room.

The meal was no better and no worse than the average, but Mr. Bowser praised everything sky high and uttered a jolly laugh between every sentence. Mrs. Bowser was puzzled from the start. It wasn't the weather for sunstrokes. He had no shares in any gold mine. He couldn't have been hypnotized or lost his identity.

She looked at him furtively, and puzzled and wondered, but could not make things clear. He called her dear and darling, asked her after the health of her mother, and as dessert was brought on he took a five pound note from his pocket and tossed it over to her and hilariously exclaimed:

"There you are, best of all women, and you can have forty more if you want 'em—yes a hundred. Whoop! By George, but I am a happy man!"

Mrs. Bowser took a long look at him, and it ended with a painful suspicion creeping into her heart.

Mrs. Bowser took a long look at him.

He had often charged her with attempts to murder him, and on a hundred different occasions had threatened separation proceedings.

Suppose he had at last determined to go to the courts. Suppose, driven to the last resource, he had determined to murder her. Such good nature, hilarity and liberality must surely cover some sinister motive. She was almost afraid of him as they returned to the sitting-room and he danced her about and laughed till the tears stood in his eyes. When he finally let her go he said:

"Come, now, let's talk of old times—of the days of our courtship and honeymoon. You must have a lot of my old love letters put away. Get 'em out and let's read 'em over."

"But you'd be ashamed of 'em and get angry," she replied.

"Not at all, sweetheart. I remember that I used to write you some splendid old love letters, but why should I be ashamed? Weren't they written to the dearest, sweetest, bestest, darlingest little woman in all this world? Mrs. Bowser, do you know that I love you even more than on the day we were married?"

"Do you? Why, sometimes I—I——"

"Yes, sometimes I come home and make a row and threaten to get a separation, but it's all wind, and doesn't count for anything. There are times when I ought to be taken out and kicked. Please forgive your old hubby for being a crank. You won't get a separation from me, will you? You'll give me a chance to redeem myself—you surely will?"

"I never thought of separation," she said as his eyes filled with tears and his lip trembled.

"I thought you were going to get one and wreck my life. Do you know, I couldn't live without you? If you should get a separation and get rid of me and marry again I'd—I'd——"

And Mr. Bowser was overcome by his feelings, and the tears rolled down his cheeks and he began weeping.

Mrs. Bowser now abandoned the theory that he might be plotting separation proceedings, but would not a husband who meditated a cold-blooded midnight murder adopt just this course to disarm suspicion?

"It's so good of you not to want to get rid of me!" he continued, after a minute. "Shome wives would want to get rid of their husbands right out and not give them a chance. Mrs. Bowser, do you want er fifty pounds to buy shoes and stockings?"

"No, not so much, dear. The five pounds you have given me will be plenty for the time being."

"You jest shay zhat because you love me—you love me—but I'm goin' ter make you take fifty pounds. Yes, I want you to buy five hundred pounds' worth of shoes and stockings. Shometimes I have come home and made a fuss about the gas bill. Will you forgive me for it? If you will you may burn a thousand pounds' worth of gas and I won't say a word."

"Mr. Bowser," she said, as she got an altogether new idea and began to look at him more closely, "what were you doing this afternoon?"

"What er I doing?" he repeated as he looked at her in a vacant way. "I want er doing nozzings 'tall."

"Didn't you meet an old friend?"

"Ole fren'? Yes, I er met ole fren'. Ole fren' asked me to go out and play er game billiards wiz him, and I went. Shay, Mrs. Bowser, I beat that ole fren' seven games straight off, and he had er buy fo—fo—four bottles of wine. Shometimes I come home and make a fuss about er coal bills, but I won't never do it again. You can buy forty trucks of coal and I won't shay a word."

"Do you mean to tell me that you helped drink four bottles of wine this afternoon!" demanded Mrs. Bowser as she sprang up.

"Course I did. I beat ole fren' at billiards, you know, and ole fren' he had to buy four bottles of wine. Mishus Bowser, you orter be proud of a husband who can beat ole fren' at billiards seven times straight off."

The truth was out at last.

Mr. Bowser was in that condition known as "lively." His share of the four bottles had proved too much for him.

Never before had Mrs. Bowser seen him in that condition, and she didn't know whether to laugh or cry. As she stood looking him over he fell to weeping again and feelingly exclaimed:

"Mishus Bow—ow—owser, don't get rid of me. Be good to me and lemme shtay. If you will I'll see er ole fren' to-morrer and beat him sheventeen times straight off. Tell me you love me as I love you. Tell me—tell me——"

"I'll tell you to go to bed. Mr. Bowser, you are intoxicated!"

"Toxshicated? Toxshicated? How can I be toxshicated? I jest met er ole fren' and beat him seven games straight off. Mishus Bow—owser, zhat ain't being toxshicated. What er going to do?"

"Going to put you to bed."

"Puz me in my little bed? All rize—all rize. You my ole fren', you are. You shtick by me and I'll shtick by you. Whazever mazzer of floor, Mrs. Bowser? Keeps jumpin' up, you know.

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself!" she said as she pushed and pulled by turns and got him upstairs at last."

"Had I? Had I?" he queried, as he sat on the floor. "Shay, now Mrs. Bowser, I met er ole fren', you know—ole fren'. Zhat ole fren' he shays—he shays——"

And then Mr. Bowser's head fell back on the pillow provided for it, and he knew no more. M. QUAD.

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself."

The Strange Story of Jean Joseph.

SILENCE fell upon the room at Dr. Bourgneuf's entrance—that silence well-known to frequenters of the assizes that hushes immediately alike the rustling of the briefs on the bench of the barristers and the murmured whisperings of the public.

The deposition of Dr. Bourgneuf would be the "nail" of the process. The people knew this and that at the fate of the accused was in the doctor's hands.

But the appearance of this witness at once reassured all the crowded audience, conscious of an inner shrinking against a responsibility so heavy in human hands.

At the call of the usher the doctor had advanced to the bar without even a glance for those eager assistants through whom the pronouncement of his name had sent a chill and stir of subdued excitement.

His scientific works were known to all; his spotless probity had passed into a proverb; and now that they saw him, his serious attention and simplicity, the gravity of his oath and manner, the firmness with which he faced the jury, as if utterly alone with them, without a gallery of crowded heads and listening ears to catch his lightest syllable, more than corroborated the pleasing impressions of Dr. Bourgneuf's character.

"Gentlemen of the jury," he began slowly—his whole deposition continued without hurry and with the same clear, precise utterance with which he spoke these opening words—"Gentlemen of the jury, I must ask permission to rehearse once more before you the story of this unhappy crime, the method, it seems to me, most favourable to the proper exposition and understanding of my own testimony.

"When selected by you to examine into the mental state of Jean Joseph, the criminal before us, I desired, if you remember, before giving my diagnosis to the public, to see and personally inspect the framing—nothing else so well expresses my meaning—that surrounded this crime. Why? Because numberless experiences have led me to believe, and to assert with conviction, that nothing so much and so quickly enlightens a physician as exact knowledge of the setting of a crime.

"I found, then, at the side of a desolate highway, fully half a mile from the village or other habitation, an ordinary country house standing in its own grounds. A casual inspection of the entrance doors and window shutters, which were adorned with a superfluity of bolts and iron bars and bells, convinced me at once that the occupant of this house had been of a timorous nature, who doubtless exaggerated the peril that the isolation of her dwelling compelled her to run.

"In the rooms of the house I made a still more detailed survey; everywhere finding a crowd of images, of statuettes, bearing upon or constituting objects of piety till one could readily have believed himself in the walls of a monastery.

"Indeed, the bedroom of Madame Piquet, as the murdered woman, I believe, was called, was so arranged as to perfectly resemble a Saint Joseph's chapel, pictures and figures of that holy saint tapestrying the walls and crowding the brackets, while twelve of the score of volumes lying upon bookshelves and tables were devoted to the life and virtues of that worthy man.

"I call your attention to this special form of devotion holding it, as I do, to be an important factor in this case, as showing the ascendency which the widow had been able to exercise over her domestic; the attic of the servant—to-day the assassin—showing an incumberment of ornament and literature precisely similar in religious character to that in the chamber of Joseph's mistress.

"These details and particulars gathered on the spot and from the lips of those who personally knew the widow Piquet lead me, keeping in mind the character of the deceased, to the following opinion:

"She was an emotional, exalted, and excitable person, whom the abuse of practical religion and the fear of the supernatural dragged into constant apprehensions of an origin clearly morbid.

"On the other hand, putting personal cowardliness out of the question, the dominant characteristics of the widow Piquet on all other points were energy, obstinacy, and inexorable despotism.

"Joseph, on the contrary, presents himself to us as a lad of natural docility, one of those plastic, characterless beings to whom education, good or bad, gives its only imprint.

"We cannot know or trace Joseph's hereditary traits, for the reason that he is a foundling taken from a public asylum by the Widow Piquet to bring up for domestic service. Nevertheless, all that I have been able to discover of the criminal's temperament shows a sensitive nervosité, exceedingly rare in a peasant, and which seems to have been fostered and increased by the fear in which Jean Joseph lived of displeasing his mistress and of exposing himself to her reprimands.

"Such was the reciprocal attitude of the Widow Piquet and her servant when one day, during the month of November last, something happened of which Jean Joseph, unskilled in the art of self-defence, has failed to apprise judge and jury, but which he has minutely and honestly described to me.

Digitized by Google

"It was evening and at the close of dinner. Jean Joseph, who had dined facing his mistress, had risen to clear the table, when suddenly, in a tone of horror, Dame Piquet called him to return.

"'Hear this, Jean,' she cried, 'just hear this!'

"And from the columns of the journal she had spread out before her she read to him the details of an assassination of a woman by her servant.

"'The sheet trembled in her hands,' Jean Joseph told me in relating this incident, 'and as she read she constantly turned upon me a strange fixed gaze, seeking to judge of the effect produced upon me by the detailed recital. The article finished, seeing that still I did not speak, she turned to me with the demand to know what I thought about it.

"'"And his name, Jean," she continued, "what do you think it was?"

"'"I cannot divine, madame," said I.

"'"It was Jean—Joseph—the same as yours!"

"'She did not say another word and during the evening did not again address me a syllable, and when bedtime had come and she mounted to her chamber I heard her, contrary to her habit, close and lock her door with a double turn.'

"Gentlemen of the jury," pursued Dr. Bourgneuf, with a deliberation that dwelt upon and seemed to weigh every word, "this was the point of departure of the accomplished crime!

"As the result of that scene Jean Joseph in his turn ascended to his chamber and there passed a night of insomnia and reflection.

"'How,' he asked himself, 'had that other murderous servant been able to commit such a cowardly assassination of an aged woman who had sheltered and nourished him beneath her roof?'

"Step by step his excited fancy traced every circumstance of the crime. In the absence of precise details he invented and had recourse to comparisons; before long, for instance, placing the action of the crime into the framing of his own dwelling.

"It was himself whom now he saw upon the boards instead of the other murderer; himself and his benefactress, and he thought he heard outside his door the timorous step of the widow Piquet, come to turn upon him the key of his mansarde.

"He passed those night hours in a wakeful nightmare. He got up a murderer, and his gaze, which at the first morning encounter had sought that of his mistress, seemed to read in it a growing consciousness of his hideous thoughts that more and more unnerved him.

"Though no allusion was made to the reading of the previous evening, he felt the abyss that had suddenly opened between himself and Dame Piquet, and he no longer dared lift his eyes to her face in the terror of his suspicions.

"'Ah! the relief I should have experienced,' Jean Joseph has confessed to me, 'if only madame, my mistress, had given me an occasion to discuss the crime with her. It would have been a relief to both of us, and that which happened would not have come to pass. But it was not possible for me to speak of it to her first, because of the uneasiness of her eyes, which clung to me always, of her leaps and starts at the least brusque movement, of the atmosphere of fright and suppressed terror that perpetually hovered over the house. Time and again I longed to throw myself on my knees before her and cry aloud: "Swear to me, madame, swear to me that you do not believe me capable of—that!"

"'The fear that I read on her features strangled the cry in my throat, as the fear that I myself felt strangled all thoughts of flight—the fear of accusing myself if I did, as I had thought of doing, run away—of adding conviction to the belief of my mistress that her suspicions were in truth well founded, I remained. It was that which lost me!'

"Gentlemen of the jury, this existence of hallucination and madness with Jean Joseph endured a week. At the end of that time the two unfortunates talked to each other no more. They lived on the watch, facing each other, eye to eye, like beast enemies inclosed in the same cage and who spied upon each other before leaping to the end.

"It was the eighth day and after dinner, the time this thing had first begun, when Jean Joseph got up from his meal and went out to work in the woodhouse. Unable to sleep if he went to bed, he proposed to split wood, and through the fatigue of this rough duty to win the rest that for a week had fled his seeking.

"He had already sharpened his axe and was in the act of attacking with sturdy strokes a log of oak, when suddenly the sound of footsteps caught his ear in the courtyard. He stopped, listened, still with uplifted axe—the steps came nearer—close to the door, which now swung slowly back, and Dame Piquet, her clothes disordered as if preparing for bed, a lighted candle in her hand, stood shivering on the threshold.

"The shriek she uttered as the raised blade fell heavily upon her skull was heard by passing carters, truck farmers returning late from market; the voice was followed and Jean Joseph found, axe still in hand, bewildered and wild-eyed beside his bleeding victim!

"Gentlemen of the jury"—the doctor's tones had dropped lower and lower, till it seemed as if, perhaps, he did not wish the hall to hear his words—"Jean Joseph killed his mistress, as all of us know, but, heed well what I say to you now, it is the key to everything; Jean Joseph killed his mistress, yes, but killed her only because of that mistress' will!

"The dread and hallucination that led him to commit the deed, the dread and hallucination that constantly led her to suggest the deed, could end but in one way. If Jean Joseph is guilty of the murder of his mistress, he is guilty through obedience alone!

"Messieurs—decide the rest—I am done!"

On the Long Trail.

It was a proud day for Lorne, the young foreman of the Circle Bar ranch, when he started on his first "drive" with a herd of five thousand cattle for the shipping point. His orders were to take the herd to St. Louis, and pass through the Ozark mountains or foot hills.

The herd was tractable during the earlier days of the journey, but as the cattle went on they became more nervous, and it was with difficulty that the herders could keep them within the lines of the nightly round-up.

Once when they had been compelled to ride constantly round the herd from evening far into the night, Lorne went to the head of the herd to see what was the disturbing cause.

As he sat on his horse he heard the call of a wolf off to the right, answered by another from the left. Something about the sound was unnatural, and he listened closely. Again they came, and soon there was a second movement among the cattle—something had been thrown into the herd to startle them.

He knew then what was the matter—someone was annoying the herd to make him trouble. But when daylight came he could see nothing of the disturbers, and again he waited for night.

He took his own position far on the outskirts that night, and waited for developments. Soon there was another wolf call; then another, then a whizzing sound and another movement of the cattle. He rode furiously at the point where he thought the sound originated, and was not surprised to catch a glimpse of a dark form which he took to be a man on horseback,

"Halt!" he cried, "or I will shoot you!"

There was no stopping. Faster and faster he rode, and gained on his annoyer. Then, before he was aware of what was happening, he was seized from behind, and went rolling to the ground, a lariat coiled round him having jerked him from the saddle. It had not caught over his head, and his second assailiant went rushing past and away before he could regain his feet.

But not quick enough for the rider to escape notice, and one glance at the stooping shoulders and long hair told Lorne who it was—Louie, the Mexican, who had been discharged when Lorne went to work first on the Circle Bar.

But there was enough to look after at the other end of the line. The cattle, startled more than ever by the noise, had started on a stampede, and were racing towards the east at the top of their speed, the herders doing all in their power to stop them, but without effect.

The plan of the herders was to ride on the edge of the leaders of the herd, and by swerving them, eventually run the whole lot in a circle, so that it would tire itself out. Lorne joined in the ride, and fierce and fast was the racing for hours. All the time they were getting the herd into a "mill," which meant a constant turning, which might continue as long as strength lasted without damage. When this was accomplished Lorne went to the camp waggon and threw himself on a pile of blankets to rest.

It was two days before the herd was in shape to start on the journey again. On the second day they came back to the broad ribbon of brown earth that was spread over the green of the plain for four hundred miles, and was the first thoroughfare between the ranches of the south-west and the shipping station of the north.

Upon it were scores of herds, and it seemed likely that they would be allowed to proceed quietly and without molestation. They did not know the character of the young Mexican who was hanging on the edge of the herd.

Louie was not alone. He had taken with him another renegade from the south-west, and they were fertile in expedients to disturb the passage of the herd. The young foreman was unsuspicious.

"I believe, Jim," said he to the head herder, "that they have got discouraged and have left us."

"I don't know. It is never safe to trust a greaser unless he is dead," was the reply, "and then it is as well to take no chances."

So the watch was kept close, and day after day went by without incident. To be sure, a strange cry came from the side of the trail one night and caused the cattle to rouse quickly, but it did not amount to anything serious. Then there was a bundle of red cloth in the middle of the trail one afternoon round which the stock rushed and took a course a half-mile out of their way.

But on the whole the trip was going well, and they were up in the middle of the territory, with hopes of seeing the south branch of the Cimarron any day. A halt had been called early for the night, and on the level plain the cattle were scattered for two miles up and down the trail. The herders were getting supper, and only three were on guard.

None of them saw a crawling figure, leading a small pony, that crept across the herd's grazing ground, and slowly, without making the contented animals raise their heads suspiciously, separated the northern third of the herd from those on the south.

Steadily they drew away, and, as there were several hummocks in that region, were soon behind one, and out of sight of the regular herders. Lorne did not even see what had been done until one of the herders rode up to say that there was something wrong.

"The herd's short, somehow," he exclaimed.

In a moment the herders were in the saddles and the remainder of the cattle were being urged forward, for they knew that the lost stock had not been taken during the day, and consequently were not to the south, but must be to the north of the herd. It was almost sundown by this time, and he feared that the stock would escape him altogether if he waited for morning.

His fears on these grounds were unnecessary. Louie had no intention of stealing the stock. Every hoof was branded, and could not have been sold in any market. With his companion he had hurried the thousand head that he had led away from the main herd, and was already a mile or more up the trail preparing for a grand stroke that should give the Circle Bar man trouble.

On the long trail nothing causes so much annoyance and often great loss as the meeting of two herds. The cattle charge on each other, and frequently some lively fights ensue. More than that, there is almost sure to be a stampede, and when the two herds take opposite directions there is little chance for milling or controlling the frightened creatures.

So it happened that as the main herd went round the edge of the hillock, being pushed as fast as the excited men could hurry it, there came suddenly to meet it another herd, that was not for the moment recognised by Lorne and his followers.

Behind the thousand were two yelling men, Louie and his companion. The stock fought and the regular herders tried to separate the herds, not knowing that they belonged to each other. It was growing dusk, and the situation was a serious one.

Louie had gone to one side and was watching with satisfaction the mêlée. Suddenly the great mass of horns and swing tails gave a lurch in his direction and the stampede had commenced. Coming at him broadside, it gave him small chance to escape, and he put spurs to his horse and raced away to the south.

On came the herd, and then, to add to his peril, the trusty little pony stepped in a prairie dog hole and went sprawling on the sod with a broken leg. In an instant he was out of the saddle, but what could he do? The avalanche was coming.

Lorne, hurrying to the front, saw the herd start for the west and caught through the dusk a glimpse of a single horseman. Then he saw, too, the horse fall and fail to rise again. Forgetful of the herd, and only intent on saving the unfortunate herder, whoever it might be, he reined his pony in that direction.

As Lorne rode it was with the thought that the herder was one of his own men. He spurred at his best gait and was soon within a few yards of the unfortunate man. But the cattle were nearly as close, and it was even racing who would get there first.

Suddenly the young foreman recognised the man on foot and at the mercy of the herd—Louie. He was tempted to ride in another direction and save himself—something that he could not be sure of doing if he waited to take care of the meddler.

But the beseeching eyes of the Mexican were too much for him, and he slipped his left foot spur under the wide clinch that held the rear of the saddle. Then he prepared for leaning to the right, and called. "Get ready to jump there!"

Louie could not understand why his enemy should take chances of his own life to save one who had done him injury, but he was willing to be the saved one in the present condition of affairs.

Farther and farther Lorne leaned over to the right until he could almost sweep the long grasses with his hand. He had practised picking up a handkerchief while his horse was on the run, and the experiment came in handy at this time.

"Now—ready!" he called, and then, with a swoop, he went past.

The herd was but a dozen yards away and coming with heads down and tails in the air—a terrifying spectacle, and one that meant death to both the young men if they could not get out of the way.

But Lorne's strong arm and the broad clinch on the horse's flanks meant safety, and as the boy's arm went round the Mexican it held. On and on they went, Louie riding in the grasp of his rescuer, at the side of the flying animal, and Lorne breathing hard as he held the heavy burden, watching all the time for the herd, which was pressing on them.

But at last the pony dashed out of the line of pursuit and the herd went raging past. Louie dropped and went rolling over and over on the sod, while Lorne went on to the camp.

When at last Lorne and his men had gathered round the camp fire and were eating some of the cook's black bread, that seemed so good to the weary cowboys, a dark figure came stealing into the circle. It was Louie.

"I want the señor," he said timidly, and Lorne went out to him.

"You saved my life this afternoon," said the boy, in his broken dialect, impossible to reproduce in print.

"Well, I only did as I would for anyone."

"I know; but you are better than me. I make you loss and trouble. I am sorry. I like to help you now."

So the young Mexican joined the camp, and the next day took his place in the middle shift of the herders, and watched the cattle with all the care and fidelity of an old cowboy.

EINAR OF THE LONG SWORD.

By George C. Wallis . .

Author of "The Winning of Gunhild," "The Gladiator," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

This story of the wooing of Astrid, the daughter of Earl Sweyn, is told by Sigmund, the Skald.

Einar Longsword and Hardrada Hardskull are both wishful to marry the maiden, who has been promised by her father to the latter, but Einar is told that he may proffer his suit if he captures the ship of Edred the Bearsark, a notorious pirate, within a year.

While Einar is on the voyage, Hardrada offends Sweyn, and is debarred from paying court to his daughter.

Einar first sets sail for North-hold, his own home, and on his arrival there finds that Edred has devastated it and that his parents have perished. He then starts out on his mission of vengeance, and after sailing for some time meets with Edred, whom he slays in the ensuing fight.

Hardrada, after leaving Raven's-nest, the home of Sewyn, sails for North-hold, hoping to find Einar there. On the voyage he falls in with Hrolf, Edred's son, and they agree to hunt Einar together. It is during a great storm that Hardrada and Hrolf come up with Einar. Fighting takes place, and Hrolf is thrown overboard by Einar and his ship destroyed. Hardrada, however, who took no part in the fight, manages to save Hrolf from drowning

CHAPTER VIII.

The Hunting of Hrolf and Hardrada.

The Eagle was driven far out of the usual course of ships by the storm, and several days passed before she made land. She put in at last at Ostö, in the Skager Rack, and lay there until she was repaired, and fresh men taken aboard for those who had been lost in the storm-fight. As at Nidaros, there was no lack of volunteers, for Einar's fame was gone all down the coast, and it was esteemed an honour to be his man.

When she sailed again Einar had as stout and well-caulked a ship under him and as full and jovial a crew as ever he had taken to sea before.

After some days of fine sailing they met a trader, from whom they learned that a vessel in distress had been seen making for the Reyjane Islands not long before. Thither, not doubting that it was the mastless Vulture, Einar turned his keel.

"We can play no longer at a waiting game," said he to Algar. "The year speeds apace, and now that I have won Astrid she is much in my thoughts. A year is a long time, and much may happen in my absence, and as yet I have found no means to send her news of my doings, though it seems they are well-known down here in the south. Next time we see Hardrada must be the last, Algar Erikson."

"I trust so," said Algar, "but he is a wary customer, and I like not that were-man of his, Alfdane. Having tasted the sharpness of our teeth they will be the less keen for another bite until they can catch us napping and do the biting themselves. This is my view, that Hardrada will run from us if he can, thinking to keep us at sea until the year be out."

"Then we must be hot on his track," said Einar. "He has yet to show us that he has the swiftest ship. I wish I had got the Destroyer under me now, but it would be ill to risk her out here. Old Sweyn is well-named the Stern, and if I do not fulfil my vow to the letter, he will not give me Astrid without more trouble."

So they made all speed that wind and tide would let them to the Reyjanes; but when they landed there Algar's rede came true. The Vulture had been, and rigged new masts, but had sailed the moment she was seaworthy again. The islanders did not know where to, except that she seemed to be aiming north. When questioned about her crew, an old fisherman answered that they seemed to be a full company, and that there were three champions amongst them who wore the golden wings.

"Now, who can the third be?" said Einar wonderingly. "Except Hardrada and his man Swerkur, I know of none who should wear the wings. Alfdane was a deedless man, with only a steel cap. What kind of men were the three, fisherman?"

"One was tall and bony, with a villainous face," said the man. "The second was a grizzled Viking, but cheery withal, and the third was a young man of about your own age, Earl, as much like Edred the Bearsark—whom I have seen twice—as ever one man is like another."

"Hrolf Red-hand, by Odin!" cried Algar. "Then even Rana herself has refused him! 'Tis well, for he will live to regret the day. We have no time to waste here."

The Vikings ran down the shore to the ship at once, and leaving the fishermen staring astonished in the village street, sprang aboard in haste and headed north.

Now Algar had guessed rightly how Hardrada would act, but did not know the depth of Alfdane's witchcraft. The were-man was busy with spells and incantations as the Vulture sped through the sea, and his familiar told him at times where the Eagle was, and sent dreams at his bidding to Einar's mind, so that the latter steered the ship where he should not have done. Sometimes Einar fought against the strange thoughts that moved him, but the spells of the troll were powerful and conquered. In Iceland Hardrada had kin and lands, and thither, from the Westman Isles, his ship fared, the Eagle labouring three days behind. Hardrada's track was plain amongst the islands by the work of sword and flame he left where the people had not been hospitable enough; and at every fresh evidence of this needless ravage Einar's face was set the harder and his men swore the louder, and Algar vowed deeper vengeance.

The summer days were yet warm, the flowers were still blooming everywhere, the land yet smiled green and glorious to the face of Frey, when Einar reached Iceland and came to where Hardrada had taken up fresh men; this time but a day too late. Algar was furious, and he and the men were for sacking the place for revenge before they sailed again. Einar would not hear of it.

"I will have no needless slaughter on my hands," said he decisively. "I have no quarrel with these folk, who have done me no harm. Put out to sea again and sail south; we cannot be far behind Hardskull now."

They voyaged forth again, and to make a long tale short, came after many weary days to one of the Faroy Isles, landing there late in the afternoon of the same day that Hardrada had left it in the morning. They would have put out again at once, but the last run had been a long one and the ship was short of water, and one man sick and needed help. Also it was growing dusk, and Einar was full of thoughts regarding Astrid, and weary of sailing, and half-minded to give up the search and fare back to Ravensnest to claim his love. And the folks were very friendly.

Now, this was the cunning of Alfdane. He had led them to this anchorage, where the people were hospitable, after a long and weary search, thus making sure that they would stay awhile and so fall into the trap he had set.

Not far from the landing-place was a temple to Odin, and not far from the temple was the garth of Borg Skiggison, who had made Hardrada welcome on his short stay.

Thither went Einar and his men, and old Borg, who had long left the sea and now spent his time listening to the boasting of the young Vikings who passed his way, bade them come in and rest awhile. His wife Sishild at once made stir to wait on the guests, and while they were putting away from them the desire for food his daughter Thora came in and sang them greeting. Hardrada's men had not rested there with idle tongues, and all on the island knew by now something of Einar's fame and the feuds that were between Einar and Hardrada on the one hand Hrolf and Einar on the other. However, old Borg said he took no man's part now, having done enough in his own day, and Alfdane had been very quiet with his own plot. So Thora sang:

Welcome to Borg's-hold,
Einar the Wonder,
Einar the Longsword,
Fighter in thunder.
Welcome to Fareys,
To peace and to rest,
After your sailing
O'er ocean's white crest.
Welcome to Borg's-hold
As long as thou'lt stay,
And kind be the thoughts
Thou wilt take away!

She was tall and fair as a lily and her voice soft and sweet, and the men cheered long and lustily when she had done, and even Einar smiled. He thought he had never heard a voice so like Astrid's, nor seen a woman who came so near being as fair. And that night the ale was good and men merry round the long tables in Borg's lofty hall. And Algar Erikson, when he had drained the ale-horn many times, spoke more than was well, telling of Einar's love and of his vow.

There was high revel and loud mirth till far into the night, and, after the women had retired from the hall, merriment of none too prudish a sort. At length, as the red logs flickered, and sank together, dying on the hearth-stone, the guests and the house-folk alike fell asleep, some beneath the tables, some upon their folded arms, some leaning back against the wall. The days of voyaging had been many, and full of hard work and fast following disappointments, and what wonder that Einar's men fell an easy prey to the soft glamour of Thora's songs and the good quality of Borg's beer?

The first to wake in the morning was Einar, and the sun was already stabbing the twilight of the hall with lances of light when he opened his eyes and roused himself. Close to him old Borg lay snoring, and not far off his own man Algar.

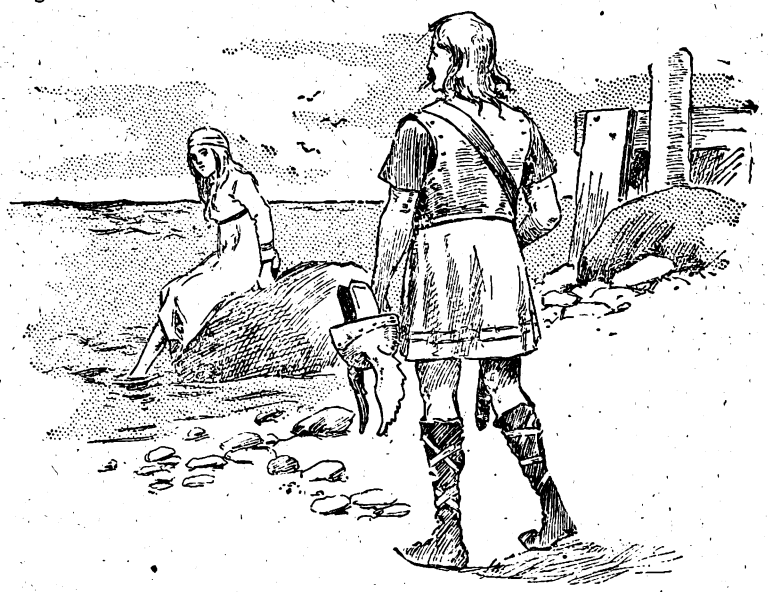
"We were over-worshipful of Bragi last night," said Einar to himself. "But no harm's done. Yet my mother Gunhild said that folk who truly believed in the White Christ did not thus. . . . . I will go out and get the morning air alone."

Down to the water's edge went Einar, the fresh breeze playing tricks with his curly golden hair as he strode along, his helmet swinging in his hand. Not far from the landing-stage there was a rounded rock jutting into the sea, and on this, her bare feet splashing the low water on the shingle, sat Thora, looking wondrous fair. The sunshine lay warm upon the light locks that escaped from her snowy coif, her arms shone white and firm beneath her fluttering robe, and there was something in her blue eyes that Einar could not understand, but which he could not help admire.

"Greeting, Einar Haraldson," said she softly, when she saw him, "It is a fair morning when the brave are up so early."

"I was never a laggard," said Einar, "but this time Strength is beaten by Beauty. Perhaps it is well that I have not spared more sleep, for who knows what voyage is before us to-day?"

"Surely you will not leave us so soon, Einar?" asked Thora, with a very pretty air of concern. "Surely Borg's-hold is a pleasant place, and vengeance can wait a while? And your Astrid is sure for you whenever you choose to sail!"



Down to the water's edge went Einar, where Thora was seated on a rock.

And Thora gave a little sigh, and looked at the Viking with a swift flash of the eyes that was very flattering.

"There is wisdom in your words, Thora," he said, and gazed out across the water, thinking.

This was Einar's fault—that he could not bring himself to believe evil of fair faces. Yet often fair faces are but masks for crooked minds, and sometimes the minds are the more crooked the fairer are the faces that mask them.

Thora was fair, yet she was false. She had fey gifts and a dark heart, and had before this time lured many men to their deaths for gain. And she had taken golden presents from Hardrada.

CHAPTER IX.

THE TREACHERY OF THORA THE FAIR.

"YES, there is wisdom in your words, Thora," said Einar. "The voyage has been long and fruitless and the year is going fast. Perhaps it will be better if I stay another day and rest and then go to claim Astrid, putting off revenge till after. It must be Baldur who has led us here, so fair a place it is. Yet I cannot stay after to-morrow's dawn, the sea is treacherous these days."

"So it is," quoth Thora, a gleam of triumph coming into her bright eyes. "And on other days beside. And so are men's promises and women's smiles. But see, the swallows fly high; it will be fine weather for your stay."

And then she sprang off the rock and walked with Einar along the shore, talking of everyday affairs until they came back at last to the threshold of the house. But with her hand uplifted to the latch she said swift and low:

"If you are weary of the drinking and merriment this even, Einar, come with me to our guest chamber, which overlooks the sea. I would fain talk more with you, and also, I should like to read to runes that are graven on your sword. The carline Unna will wait upon us."

And he, thinking no evil, promised to be with her after sundown. That day they looked to the ship and cleaned their armour and weapons of the salt-rust that was on them, the men being nothing loth for a good excuse to linger at the island, and when the sun hung low and red over the western sea, all sat round the tables to a glorious feast.

Old Borg was wealthy, having much land and many cattle, and nothing liked he better than to see the ale flow and the boards groan under the weight of good food; to hear the rattle of daggers on the dishes and the wagging of loosened tongues; to see the faces of his guests grow warm with mirth in the leaping glare of the pine logs that roared and crackled on the hearth. And Einar's men were a jovial company, full of stories and full of recent experience, and never was so eloquent a boaster as Algar Erikson when the ale-horns were empty and the thralls were sent to broach a fresh cask.

"'Twas Loki's own luck that brought us here!" he cried, pledging Borg in a deep draught; "but 'tis Bragi that's keeping us. Next to Thor, Bragi's my god. Let us drink to them—Bragi and Thor—to Joy and Courage, Pleasure and Power!"

The men drank the pledge heartily, the house-carles at the door beat with their swords upon their shields, and the house shook with shouts.

So intent were all now on what was before them, that none noticed Einar's absence. He remembered Thora's wish and went up to the guest-chamber, taking his sword, but leaving his axe in the great hall.

Unna brought them wine that a wandering Viking had brought from the far South a year ago, and, having set it before them, retired.

While the twilight lasted it was a pleasant view that Thora and Einar had from the casement. They saw the deepening of the darkness over the sea, the drifting of the night clouds, the shining forth of the stars in the sky. And Thora spoke little, seeming pensive and thoughtful, and Einar sat full of content, dwelling on the love of Astrid and the words she had spoken to him by the water's edge that morning she and I had bidden him vale.

Then as the night came, and Unna brought lamps and set them in brazen sockets on the wall and their light glittering on the golden wings of Einar's helm was reflected into Thora's eyes, the warrior and the maiden drew closer together; and the maiden spoke of love, and sighed often, and gave Einar to see, if he would have seen, how dear he was to her. For awhile, however, he answered her absent-mindedly, and would not see how it was.

Now as the time for her treachery drew on, Thora became anxious and hesitated. She had undertaken the task lightly enough before she had seen Einar, but now she had seen him and spoken to him, her heart pained her. Seeking to entrap him, she had herself fallen a victim to the snare. She loved him as she had never loved before, and towards him her cold, dark mind was soft and warm. She had but to warn him, and he would be safe—safe, to go to Astrid.

At that thought she hardened, but softened again, thinking to win his love. He had praised her songs and seemed content in her presence. Perchance he regretted that he was bound to Astrid the Beautiful? She resolved to try him before she gave him to his fate. "At least I may win," thought she, "and if not, then shall no other."

So she talked of love and of the perversity of fate, and after awhile Einar felt how the wind blew, and looking at her face, was troubled. Yet he would not acknowledge that he knew, caring only to think in that way of Astrid, whose trust he might not break.

"Blind Hödr does things as he will, having no concern for men," said he. "Hearts may be hurt and seared, but he stays not his hands of destiny. 'Tis our best plan to face all fortune, good or ill, with an equal mind, for what we cannot help must be endured."

"That is true, Einar; but is it not also true that sometimes we have our fate in our own hands? For you, Einar, even now I can read much blood and sorrow in the future, if you persist in this feud and in returning to Astrid—who has doubtless grown tired of waiting. Yet you are not forced to go; the choice lies in your own hands. Stay here with us in peace, where love may wait for you without any struggle to win it—love that is, perhaps, deeper than you will find if you search the world over."

"I have given my word to go back," said Einar, strangely moved by the steady regard of her melting eyes. "How can I be a traitor?"

"That you can never be, Einar; you are too brave and noble," said Thora. "But I have great skill in these things, and if you will stay with us, it shall be made to seem to those you have left that you could do nothing else. Surely Borg's-hold is pleasant, and love that cannot keep silence not to be despised? And am I not fair, viking?"

"Yes," said Einar. "And you must be fey, too, to make the saying of what I must say so hard. I cannot forsake Astrid, not even for you. I must sail hence to-morrow, grieve you as it may. We cannot choose our fates, despite your philosophy, Thora. But I shall always remember you, and I trust that sometimes we may meet again and be friends. This I will say, that, had I never seen Astrid, it might have been as you wish."

"Is this Astrid so beautiful, then, and so dear to you?" asked Thora in a low voice, drawing away from him."

"So dear that, not for my life's sake, would I be untrue to her," said Einar.

For a moment Thora fixed her eyes upon him with a gaze that seemed to pierce to his soul, but under which he did not waver, then she rose and took one of the lamps from its socket and drew aside the curtains of the casement, and placed it on the ledge without, so that its light shone as a faint star over the sea.

"Why do you set that lamp there?" asked Einar.

"To guide any seafarers who may happen to have lost their way," said the maiden. "I forgot, or it should have been there sooner. It may lead some wanderers here to-night, calm though the sea is, and there is welcome for all. Now Unna shall bring us more wine, and then I will leave you."

The carline brought in the flagon, and Thora's white hands poured the red liquid into the drinking-cups. Einar thought the hands passing shapely, but did not see, in the uncertain glimmer of the remaining lamp that Thora shook a dark powder from a tiny phial into the cup that she gave to him. He drank, thinking that the wine had a very sweet taste, and whilst he leaned back lazily upon the couch, Thora's deft tongue ran on.

She seemed in no haste to be gone, though she said no more of her desire, and noted with satisfaction how silent Einar was, and how his eyelids slowly drooped. Ever and anon she went to the window and glanced out at the sea.

Einar felt drowsy, but could not rouse himself. The scent of the drugged wine rose to his brain; the talk of Thora was like the soothing murmur of mountain streams; the restless tiding of the sea on the shingles pleasant to hear. In the great hall the voices were growing fewer, and those few thicker and fainter. He was drifting into an unnatural sleep. Then Thora came back from the window, bringing the lamp in again. She had seen, far out on the ocean, a waving flash of fire, and knew that she was giving Einar to his fate. Yet so handsome he looked when the glow of the two lamps shone upon his noble face and the curls of his golden hair, that she shook him gently, and bent and said:

"It is not yet too late, Einar Haraldson. Yet you may have me instead of Astrid. Say quickly which it shall be."

Einar heard her but faintly, saw her anxious face but dimly, as a man in a dream, and only half understood her words. But he caught his love's name, and murmuring it twice—"Astrid, Astrid!"—fell asleep.

Thora watched by him awhile, then started up as she heard the sound of oars on the water and the low, grating noise of a boat being carefully beached. Deftly unfastening

Einar, murmuring "Astrid, Astrid," fell asleep.

Longsword from Einar's belt, she bore it, sheath and all, to her own bower.

"At any rate, that shall be mine!" she said to herself.

She came back once more and kissed his unconscious lips, then went out again. As the curtain fell behind her, there came a hammering and crashing at the great door below, and then the shouts of men and the clash of steel. With flushed cheeks she ran to the inner door of the hall and looked within.

Hardrada Hardskull was there, swinging his axe, and with him Swerkur and Hrolf Red-hand, and behind them came crowding the men of the Vulture. The were-man, Alfdane, stood without, not liking a fight in the semi-darkness.

The work was sharp and short. More than half of Einar's men were too drunken to be roused—and Algar was amongst those—and those who woke and seized weapons hastily were too surprised and dazed to offer a long resistance. They struck out wildly, not knowing friend from foe, and were soon overpowered.

Borg's men, being dressed as for peace, were easily distinguished from them, and though some got hard knocks in the rough fray, none were killed. It was no part of Hardrada's plan to have a feud with Borg—who lay near Algar, oblivious to all—by doing more slaying than could be helped, so long as he had Einar safe. When the fight was over, and Thora and Unna and Sishild brought lamps, he turned to Thora and said, so that all might hear:

"It is a rough return for your hospitality, maiden, but 'tis not so bad as it might have been, and now we have mastered the sober ones, we will leave you the rest, saving Einar only, and this sot, Algar Erikson."

"The one is as bad as the other," cried Thora. "Einar sits in the guest chamber, drunk with our best wine, over which he fell asleep making love to me!"

"That will be good news for Astrid the Beautiful," said Alfdane, who was now at his master's side. "I long to be on my journey."

"You shall not wait, troll," said Hardskull. "When we have netted our bird and emptied these tables, we will be off, and dawn should find us far on the sea. If Borg wakes he may be troublesome, and there is no sport fighting an old grey dog whose teeth are blunt."

So they went in and bound Einar fast with strong cords, and then Algar; and having made a good meal and given Thora more gold secretly, Hardrada went back to the ships with his prisoners, well pleased with the night's work and in high spirits for the future. It was yet quite dark when the Vulture put out to sea again, followed by the Eagle, on which a working crew was placed, and the rise of the sun came when they were out of sight of land.

But in the hurry and excitement, Hardrada had forgotten to look or to ask for Einar's axe and sword, and his men had not bound Algar very securely. The two prisoners lay in the poop-cabin, the door of which was swinging to and fro with the rolling of the galley, and so elated were the crew over their success that none of them took the trouble to look within. The motion and the noise of the sea air, however, woke Algar, though Einar was past rousing for some time to come, and the feeling of the cords sobered him at once. He broke one of the bonds easily, and slipped out of the rest after some patient effort, then crept to the door and peered out.

He had not to listen long to what was being said to know on whose ship he was and how he came there, though it was too dark to see much, and after a vain attempt to wake Einar, he did not hesitate over his course of action. He must jump overboard and swim back to the island before the distance grew too far—he knew that it was no short swim already—and by some means get possession of old Borg's ship, and follow Hardskull to his lair.

Several of the Vikings heard the splash of his dive, and a moment later his escape was discovered, and some arrows and spears sent after him into the darkness. But the ship had a good way on, and they judged it too far from land for a man to reach it alive, so Hrolf said:

"Let the sot die in Rana's arms. It will save us the trouble of putting Odin's mark on a nithing who forsakes his friend!"

So the ships sped on, steering for Strongness. On the second day they parted, Alfdane, with the Eagle turning north. When he came to the fiord that runs up into the land past Raven's-nest, he put in there. The galley was looking very battle-worn and sea-tried, and as they came to the landing-place Alfdane sent most of his men below and went to the helm alone.

CHAPTER X.

THE FIRE ON THE FIORD.

Now when Kolbi the thrall ran to tell us of the solitary ship in the fiord I at once went down to the water side, for visitors had of late been few. Astrid came with me, and little Arvak, who was growing a very sturdy youth, and several of the house-folk.

When we first saw the vessel she was creeping slowly out of the shadow of the lower cliffs into the full glow of the open, and when the sun's rays glittered on her figure-head we saw that she was the Eagle, Einar Haraldson's ship. Astrid gave a start, and a cry of glad surprise; but, as the ship came nearer said, with a catch of fear in her voice:

"It is strange, Sigmund, but her shields are few, and she comes slowly because there are also few rowers. And the man on the forecastle seems neither so tall nor so stalwart as was Einar when last we saw him. Odin grant that no harm has befallen him."

"You are a Norseman's daughter, Astrid," said I, also fearing evil. "You will know how to meet sorrow if it comes; but till the tale is told it is folly to let it grieve us. The man is not Einar, I am sure, but there is something familiar about him even at this distance. We must wait and see."

We were silent then until the galley came to hailing distance, and when the man called to us I knew him at once and marvelled why I had not recognised him before. It was Alfdane, Hardrada's man, and when Astrid heard his name her face turned as deathly pale as the dying glimmer of the northern lights across the snowfields.

My hand was on my dagger as Alfdane sprang to shore, for I feared treachery from the first. He laughed loudly at my care, and smiled insolently at Astrid, and cried:

"Your teeth are not so sharp, skald, that you need think to scare me by showing them, though, by Tyr, you make a good watch-dog. 'Twould have been good news for Einar your care of his fair one."

"Why 'would have been'?" asked Astrid. "What news have you of him?"

"News that will keep till we get to Raven's-nest Hall," said Alfdane. "It is a matter for Sweyn to hear as soon as any man."

Having no quarrel with him, and cursing my physical weakness as I went, I turned about with the others and we all went up to the house, Alfdane and his few men, after anchoring the Eagle, following us. The hall was well filled with folk, and when Earl Sweyn had bidden Alfdane greeting, with a scowl on his face that belied his words, all were eager to hear what was to be told.

But Alfdane drank much ale before he would speak, taking delight in our anxiety, and not until he saw that he had driven Sweyn the stern to the limit of his patience did he put down his cup and tell us the story agreed upon between Hardrada and himself.

"It will seem strange that I alone am returned, and in the Eagle," said he, "but 'tis none of my work. It is the doing of Hödr, and no man can stand against the arm of Fate. If no traders have been this way of late you will not have heard of Einar's doings before he fell in with my master. He has slain Edred the Bearsark in fair fight and taken his ship, and since then, having seen the work that we did at North-hold, has been in search of us. A few days ago we met him at one of the Fareys, and took him a prisoner, together with his man, Algar. Brun the Silent has been silent in death some months now."

At the news that Einar had fulfilled his vow a smile came to old Sweyn's face and a flash of light to Astrid's eyes, and from the men of the homestead a great shout of praise. But at the other tidings a spell of silence fell upon us.

"That is a were-man's word," said I at last scornfully. "No man like your master ever conquered Einar Longsword in fair fight. If he is a prisoner there has been foul work done—nithing's work."

"Not so fast, Sigmund the Skald, not so fast," said Alfdane mockingly. "It was not in open fight, truly, yet it was no more advantage than one man may take of another. We heard of him at the island and that he was seeking us, and, being a large crew, put in boldly to meet him. Though it was night when we got there we landed and broke in the door of the hold where he was guest. We were ready for a stern fight, but so many of his men were asleep with drink that we had little enough to do. Einar himself we took without a blow, for he lay fast asleep in the bower of Borg's daughter, Thora."

"Now we know you speak untruth!" cried Astrid, springing to her feet, her eyes flashing; "now we know what your tale is worth, Alfdane! Go tell that somewhere where Einar is not known!"

"Peace, child," said Sweyn. "Let him be done before you grow so furious. Men are but men after all where fair faces are concerned, and such things have been before to-day."

"'Tis well said, Earl," Alfdane replied. "And when a man is great as Einar and a maiden beautiful as Thora one must look for like doings. But I know nothing beyond what I saw and heard. It was Thora herself who led us to him, to save her father's life, and with my own eyes I saw him asleep, an empty wine-flagon at his side. We bound him and took him on board the Vulture, which sailed at once. With these few men I came hither in the Eagle to ask the hand of Astrid for Hardrada; or, if that be not granted, to offer other terms."

Astrid was now still, for the tale bore some mark of truth—it was, indeed, part true, and therefore the worst of lies—but old Sweyn's brow hardened.

"You can tell Hardrada Hardskull," said he, "that my word is my word, and having given Astrid to Einar on conditions which he has almost fulfilled, I cannot go back on the promise. Hardskull is no longer a friend of mine, and his doings at North-hold have broken all contracts between us. What else have you to say?"

"He bade me say, expecting your answer to the first, that as a second alternative he will go holmgang with Einar, and the victor shall have Astrid. But that all may be fair Astrid herself must see the fight and be ready to wed the winner as soon as it be over. And I should tell you that there is now with us Hrolf Red-Hand, son of Edred, who will challenge Einar should my master fall. So Einar will have two fights to endure at the best, and this Hrolf is a very strong man."

"Nor do I like this," said Sweyn.

"Then Astrid may bid farewell to Einar," said Alfdane, "for if neither of these offers be taken his life is at once forfeit to Hrolf. And prisoners are easily hastened to Valhall. Sacrifices can be made to Thor."

Now we were all speechless but old Sweyn. He was named "the Stern" for this: that nothing could so fix him in a resolve as thwarting or hindrance. Alfdane's words could not have been worse chosen.

"That is as it may befall, Were-Hound," he said, breaking the peace-bands from his sword and unsheathing it as he spoke. "Sometimes the hound bays a different tune when the deer are run down and desperate. Hardrada Hardskull need not think his head so thick that it is axe and sword-proof, nor that my arm is yet too weak to use either, nor that the killing-trick has gone from my memory. After such a message as you bring I declare him my enemy. There is were-gild between me and him because Astrid, my daughter, is now Einar's promised wife, and his father and mother were my friends.

"Go tell him that, Were-Hound, and say that Sweyn's ships are behind you, and Sweyn's sword will soon be in his throat. And tell him that even if he escapes me both he and Hrolf and all their men shall be outlawed and hunted down without mercy. And, last of all, tell him that you are lucky to get out of Raven's-nest at all, and would not but that you were made welcome before you told your tale. On this blade I vow, by Odin, that what I have said I will not unsay for any man. Now go."

For a moment Alfdane's face reddened, for the gaze of all was upon him; then he laughed a soft, cunning laugh that was never heard from an honest man, and said:

"You were ever a man of your word, and noted for hospitality, Earl Sweyn. You cannot do much less than let me go, for I am only a bearer of news, a carrier of a message. It is with Hardrada you must deal. But my men are sea-weary, and so am I, and we would ask to stay the night over. The wind is rough, with threat of wild weather after sunset, and by morning it may be blown over. Whenever I go I can take your word, and Einar is safe whilst I am here."

This old Sweyn could not well refuse, nor could any of us find objection, so Alfdane sat down again and made pretence to be jovial; but I noticed that he drank very little more ale, his men following his example, though some of our folk were worse for what was in them.

With the night came a howling wind that shook the house and woke me several times out of a troubled sleep. The last time I opened my eyes was in the dense darkness that comes just before the show of dawn, and as I lay awake, staring into the blackness around me, a faint scent of burning wood was borne on the wind that whistled through the crevices.

I sat up at once, full of suspicion and thinking of Alfdane, but so loud roared the gale without that I could distinguish no sound in the house save the regular breathing of the men around me. And then, as I heard the wind change its dull roar to a shrill shriek as a fresh eddy caught the gable of of the house, the scent of burning went away altogether.

"It comes from outside, thanks to the All-Father," I said to myself, "but, nevertheless, I will go and seek for it."

I was ever a wakeful bird in the early hours. Groping my way cautiously to the back of the house so that none might be disturbed, I came to a window that I knew to be unsecured. Twice as I groped along the same faint smell of burning reached me, and when I put hand on the latch of the lattice I saw that the sky was red with a strange flickering glow.

At first I thought it was the northern lights, and wriggled through the opening without more ado, but when I stood outside and could see the sky well, I knew better. The glare was a reflection from a vivid fire towards the south, from over the cliffs by the fiord. It was no work of the gods that glare; it was cast by a fire of man's making on or near the silent fiord.

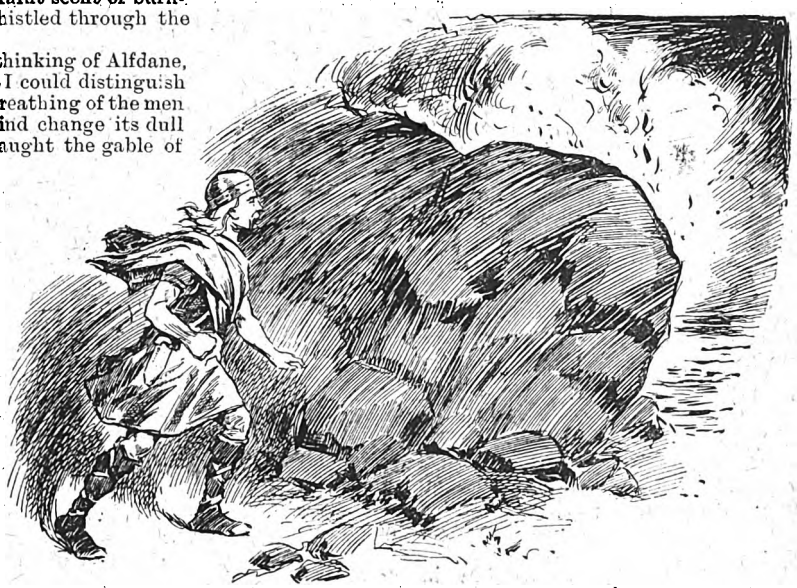
Turning to give one glance at the house, which stood dark, grim, and seemingly lifeless behind, I ran along the garth by the bridle-path that goes down to the landing-stage.

As yet there was no rain, but the gale was so fierce and gusty that owing to my weakness I could in some places scarcely keep my feet, and it was some time before I drew within sight of the landing-stage. Before then, however, there was no doubt that something was on fire. Showers of sparks shot up from behind the rock that hid the fiord, and were whirled hither and thither in starry streams, and now and then the tongue of a huge flame would leap into view, linger a moment, and die down as swiftly as it came. And when the wind blew directly towards me I smelt burning wood, and heard the ominous crackle and roar of its consuming.

Before I came to the end of the rock I feared the worst and was prepared for what I saw. I saw three ships adrift on the fiord, blazing furiously. They were all dry, and in the dry, clear air, fanned by the shrieking gale, the fire had got hold of them beyond all hope. Even if they could have been reached they were past saving, for all the boats were gone from the shore. And the thing that confirmed my worst fears was that there were three ships only. The Eagle was gone, and so, doubtless, were Alfdane and his crew, and this was his doing.

Now when I had been standing there awhile, stupefied by my helplessness and loneliness in the night, and watching the changing glare of the fires on the cliffs and on the still-flowing water, I bethought me of Astrid, and knew the reason of it all. Alfdane's peaceable offer and sudden submission after Sweyn's expressed contempt were only excuses to gain time. He had been sent to bring Astrid away, and failing fair means had used foul. It was a master-trick to sail off and leave our ships and boats burning.

Full of this thought and of furious anger, I went back, the wind behind me now, but before I reached the great hall I saw lights within it and moving figures in the home patch. The scent of fire had roused others. The whole household was up, and it was not long before I had told what I knew and feared, and some were running down to the water, and Sweyn and Alfifa were searching for Astrid.



Showers of sparks shot up from behind the rock.

But presently those who went out came back again, saying that it was useless to try to save the ships, which were almost burnt to the sea-line, and the old Earl came into the hall, reviling the gods with language terrible to hear. Astrid was gone; she had been seized in her sleep, for there was no sign of a struggle, and Alfdane and all his men were missing. The great outer door, closed but unfastened, told us an eloquent tale.

When the sun was well risen and all shone white and glittering with the mantle that the early frost had left, the wind-storm increased in violence. It swept down the valley so fiercely that it was a hard thing to walk erect against it, and its coldness was like the prick of a sharp spear on the skin.

I stood in the shelter of the lee gable with some of the carles when all talking was done and silent despair sat on all faces, looking up the valley to where the bridle path over Saddleback Ridge turns out of sight to the left hand, and suddenly I remembered that it was not a half-day's ride to Trollfell, where Othnar Wolf'sfang's house was. Then I bethought me that I, Sigmund the Skald, who had sung the praises of so many men, might yet do a deed worthy to be remembered after the Hell-shoes are bound upon my feet. And, full of this resolve, I went quietly into the hall.

SHORT STORIES ABOUT CATS.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "A Broken Promise," by Violet Whyte, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. D. Ryan, Jun., of 16 Crow Street, Dublin. Attempts for this week's prize must deal with FUNNY STORIES ABOUT NEGROES, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, July 9th, Post-cards only, please.

Almost Human.

THE other day, having occasion to go down to the kitchen for something or other, I saw an undoubtedly very clever piece of roguery performed by our cat.

The kitchen door was open, and I could see what was going on as I came down the stairs. The cat was on the kitchen table making her way through a piece of meat intended for dinner, and her offspring—a young kitten—was reposing peaceably in a box-bed by the fire.

Hearing my footsteps on the stairs, the cat leapt from the table, ran to the box, took the kitten in her mouth, and having deposited it beside the half-gnawed joint, got into the kitten's bed, and coiling herself up, presented the appearance of the most innocent tabby on earth.

Why They Wanted It.

Two neighbours had a long litigation about a cat, which they both claimed. The judge, wearied out with the case, at last said:

"What is the use of making so much fuss about a little cat?"

"Your honour will see the serious nature of the case," replied one of the lawyers, "when I inform you that the parties are both sausage makers."

The roar of laughter which followed proved that the entire court saw the point.

Educating Barnum.

WHEN the late P. J. Barnum was in San Francisco, he advertised for a cherry-coloured cat.

An Irishman answered the advertisement, and offered to bring him a fine cherry-coloured pussy for three dollars. Barnum was so delighted that he sent the man the money at once, in order to hold him to his bargain.

But his delight changed to unmitigated disgust when Pat came and jerked a wall-eyed, sickly-looking black cat out of the bag, and told him that its name was Billy, and that it was very fond of fish.

"What do you mean by bringing me this thing?" yelled Barnum. "Didn't you say you had a cherry-coloured cat?"

"I did that, Mr. Barnum," said the Irishman, "and didn't Oi bring yer wan? Didn't ye iver ate black cherries?"

The great showman smiled a sickly smile as he muttered:

"Done, by thunder!"

Mr. Bowser's Cat.

MRS. BOWSER: "I say, my dear, that cat is a nuisance, we must get rid of it. It killed the canary this morning. I asked Mrs. Suburb if she would like to have it this morning, and she said she wouldn't have it if every hair on its whiskers hung with diamonds."

Mr. Bowser: "That's just like you women. The way to get rid of that cat is to advertise it in the papers, and put a price on it, say £10. Nobody will have it for nothing." (And Mr. Bowser was right for once. The cat brought £3 10s. But it came back to him again. He says he knows now how to make money.)

A Contretemps.

AN amusing incident was recently witnessed in Scotland during a performance of The Middleman.

Playgoers will recollect how Cyrus works at midnight, firing up the furnace till it is at a tremendous heat, and how the flames glow. At last, when he thinks the pottery is sufficiently fired, he allows the furnace to cool down. Then, in his eagerness to see the result of his work, he begins to pull down the bricks before the oven is really cool.

The delight of the audience may be imagined when from the blazing interior suddenly jumped one of the theatre tabbies.

Didn't Know, But——

A CERTAIN gentleman's garden was by no means improved by the nocturnal visits of the neighbours' cats, and the sufferer had been heard to declare that it would go hard with the first feline trespasser he laid hands on.

One morning a neighbour, who owned a lost pussy, called on the owner of the garden.

"Have you seen my cat, Mr. X.?" she asked.

"Scores of times, madam," was the reply.

"Yes, yes; but you've killed him, haven't you?"

"My dear madam," replied X. cautiously, "your cat was a constant and unwelcome visitor, along with scores of others. If he came with the crowd he took his chance. Perhaps I slew your pussy, perhaps not. That is for you to prove."

With this the lady was by no means satisfied, and on the following morning she waited for Mr. X.'s six-year-old son. Giving the youngster sixpence, she asked:

"I say, Tommy, did your papa kill my cat?"

"Don't know," grinned Tommy, pocketing the coin; "but there's a loop on the end of our clothes-line and a grave in the garden."

Experimenting on Pussy.

"GEORGE," said the careful mother, "don't eat those ornaments on the top of the cake; they are poisonous."

The ornaments remained on the mantelpiece for two days, when one disappeared.

"George, I am afraid you have eaten one of those ornaments?"

"No, mother, I haven't," was the reply, "but I have given one to the cat, and if he is alive to morrow, I shall eat the other one myself!"

A Recipe for Good Jumping.

"HERE, Johnson," roared Bowser from the neighbouring garden, "here's your blessed cat raiding my fowl-house again."

"Is she?" said Johnson, "then why don't you kill her, man? Go for her and wring her neck. It's my wife's cat and I'd like to be rid of the brute."

Thus encouraged, Bowser made a dart at the feline, which promptly jumped on the old fellow's head and over the wall.

"Good gracious! Can't the cat jump!" said Johnson. "Why, man, you've lost her after all."

"Jump, I should think so," retorted Bowser ruefully, "she ought to jump considering the spring chickens the beggar's had."

Mews and Pews.

A CARPENTER, who was repairing a country church, tore down a heavy wire screen that enclosed the belfry, and, when it was removed, three cats were seen to jump from rafter to rafter, and ascend to the peak of the spire.

The carpenter was not able to capture them, but, from his description, they were very peculiar creatures—their fur long and shaggy, and their teeth very prominent, and they were as agile as squirrels.

It is believed that they had been living on the sparrows they caught, but it is not known where they obtained water to drink.

'Afraid of Cats.

SOME people have an unaccountable antipathy for certain objects. They are apparently unable to control the feeling. No power of reason aids them to overcome that which in another person seems mere foolishness and nervousness.

The object held in abhorrence may be a cat, a dog, a mouse, or a snake, the mere sight, even suggestion of which, affects the person very strongly. Serious consequences have sometimes resulted from a desire to overcome or play upon this weakness, by those who thought it but an affectation. But this is wrong, and a cruelty. Witness the following instance:

Brigadier-General Robertdau was once dining with a party of friends at a hotel. Someone had heard of his antipathy to cats, and thinking it would be amusing to play a trick on him, planned to bring a cat into the dining-room while they were at dinner.

At a given signal, one of the waiters quietly brought in a cat, unseen by the general, and the first that he knew was that the cat was climbing in his lap.

General Robertdau turned pale, dropped his knife and fork, faintly exclaimed, "A cat!" and fell back in his chair in a spasm.

All present were greatly alarmed, and immediate measures were taken to revive the fainting man. The dinner was forgotten. Finally he came out of the fit, and shuddered as he looked round for the object of disturbance.

The gentleman who had thus played on the general's weakness was profuse in apologies, declaring that he would have lost his right arm rather than do such an act, had he known his friend would have been so affected.

The general said it was a weakness over which he had no control; that he had tried vainly to overcome his repugnance to cats, and he would rather any time face the cannon's mouth or point of the bayonet than have a cat near him.

Had all the Qualifications.

HERE is a rebuke administered to a hard bargainer who sent the following advertisement to a paper:

"A lady in delicate health wishes to meet with a useful companion. She must be domesticated, musical, an early riser, amiable, of good appearance, and have some experience in nursing; a total abstainer preferred. Comfortable home; no salary."

A few days afterwards the advertiser received by express a basket labelled:

"This side up with care; perishable."

On opening it she found a tabby cat with a letter tied to its tail. It ran thus:

"Madam, in response to your advertisement, I am happy to furnish you with a very useful companion, which you will find exactly to your requirements. She is domesticated, a good vocalist, an early riser, has an amiable disposition, and is considered handsome. She has had great experience as a nurse, having brought up a large family; total abstainer. As salary is no object she will serve you faithfully in return for a comfortable home."

Pussy as a Railway Pet.

THOUSANDS of people have heard of railway dogs, which travel so extensively, and really seem to know as much about trains and time-tables as a guard does. But there is a cat in Colorado which is certainly as remarkable in its fondness for railway riding.

It was a pet of the wife of the engineer of a goods locomotive, and now it accompanies the engineer on every trip that he makes. When the train has to make a long wait, the cat goes off in search of mice, always returning when the whistle sounds, and at some of the stations it is quite a pet.

When the engine is running, the cat sits in the cab or on the coal, and, as its fur is jet black, its beauty is not greatly impaired by its grimy surroundings.

Pussy must have travelled many thousands of miles, for it has been doing duty for several years, and has never been known to miss a trip,

That cats care little for persons and are attached to places and to their environment was seen in the case of this cat last year.

The engineer was badly hurt in a collision, and was laid up for three months. Instead of the cat following him, as a dog would doubtless have done, she stayed about the sheds until the engine was repaired, and then she once more resumed her rides with the substitute engineer.

Waring's Letter.

WARING wrote no letters, but simply sat and smoked watching the other men with a half-cynical, half-regretful feeling of loneliness. For no one in far-away England would hang on the postman's knock for his letter—he was alone in the world, one of those logs on the social sea, that drift past without breaking the slumber of any man's regret.

To-night he allowed himself the rare luxury of self-compassion. At ordinary times he abhorred the failing but to-night, as he watched his brother officers scribbling home to their dear ones—to sweethearts, wives and mothers—Waring vaguely regretted the lack, in his case, of either sweetheart, wife, or mother.

The latter had died many years ago when Waring was a little lad resplendent in a velvet suit and curls. Wife he had never known, and sweetheart—he had once.

And for a moment, as Waring conjured up a vision of the old, happy days, with all their garnered store of "might-have-beens" the hard stern lines of his mouth softened, and the regular puffs of tobacco smoke degenerated into fitful clouds.

Pulling himself up with an effort he instinctively glanced at the bowed head of Captain Bob Brazil, who was hastily scribbling off letter after letter.

For Bob Brazil was one of the corner-stones in Waring's hidden away-romance.

Presently the former looked up, and the serious aspect of his face was merged in a smile as he met Waring's enigmatic glance.

"Lazying, as usual, old chap," he cried. "What a blessing it is, after all, to have no friends!"

Waring shrivelled up a little at the thoughtless remark, but his voice was the perfection of insouciance as he drawled:

"Yes; after all, we social Robinson Crusoes have our advantages. There are no letters to write, no farewells—beastly fag they must be—no tears to account for, and we go out to battle confident in the assurance that our 'going under' will wrinkle the brow of nobody. Yes, as you say, it has its blessings—and curses," he added under his breath.

Brazil detected the pathos behind Waring's cynical words.

"To-morrow may be a bad day for some of us, old chap," he said rather huskily, "and I know you must feel beastly lonely, having no relations to whom you can scribble a last few words. Why don't you send a line to Rose? You two are such old friends and I am sure she would be glad to know you remembered old friends at what may be, perhaps, the finish.

Forgotten. Good Heavens! thought Waring, with a faint shiver, did he ever forget her? Was she ever absent from his thoughts during those last five bitter years?

For Brazil's wife was the other corner-stone, the builder and wrecker of the old-time story, whose ruins Waring kept locked away carefully behind the walls of a lazy cynicism.

He was a modern man distinctly, so his tragedy partook of the quiet order of tragedies, and Brazil never dreamt that to his wife's influence was due the bitter scepticism of his old school chum and brother officer.

"They had been old friends," thought Waring with a shadowy smile, "but Brazil never suspected the possibility of their having ever been anything more than friends."

It all happened so long ago, quite five years ago, and the pages of life-stories get grievously thumbed and worn and out-of-date after five years of this self-contained nineteenth century of ours.

But although Waring's story was a well-thumbed one, the memory of its halcyon days was keen and vigorous as he blew a cloud of smoke through mocking lips and turned to Brazil.

"It's awfully kind and thoughtful, old chap," he said, "but Mrs. Brazil will have in you too great a claim on her interest to waste any of it on a superfluity like me. I appreciate your motive, but if I've got to go under, I prefer to do it without making a fuss."

"I thought you might like to write," said Brazil, "you seemed so solitary, and so altogether out of it, as it were, that I——"

"Thank you, Bob," Waring broke in gratefully, "I understand, old man, but," with an enigmatical smile, "if you don't mind, I think I'll die—silently."

"As you please, of course, Waring," replied Brazil, "but I'm sure Rose would be glad of a line from you. However, as I haven't closed my own letter yet, I'll send your remembrances. May I?"

"Yes," said Waring, with a little smile, "Oh, yes, you may send my—my remembrances."

"Remembrances! Remembrances," he muttered, as Brazil resumed his writing, "what an obtuse world we live in. Poor old Bob has never grasped the possibility of even 'old friends' falling in love. I wonder what he would think if he knew that five years ago his wife and I—bah! what a silly ass I am, and she—she doubtless has quite forgotten the episode of an 'old friend.'"

But although Waring smiled contemptuously at what he dubbed his folly, the "episode" still continued to occupy a central position in his thoughts.

It was only one more of these silent stories, written often-times with ink from the hearts of men and women, but never published and never read.

Six years before Rose Campbell and Waring had been more than friends—they were lovers. Waring had little more than his pay in those days, and Rose's people being rather prone to goods and material, the engagement had been a secret one

But fate unfortunately subverts occasionally the plans of the wisest mortals, and unlooked-for complications ensued when Bob Brazil, Waring's brother officer, an old school chum, fell in love with Waring's sweetheart.

Brazil belonging distinctly to the enviable category of "eligibles," his overtures received the parental sanction, and were forwarded with all the diplomacy of the parental mind.

Unfortunately for the happiness of Rose and Waring the latter, although superficially of an emotional nature, was in reality of a hyper-sensitive and excitable temperament, and this, in conjunction with the hopelessness of his financial position, produced an era of misery partly real and partly self-inflicted.

With the unfortunate perversity of such natures he began to read into Brazil's movements encouragement on the part of Rose.

The latter being excessively proud, this was the beginning of the end, which culminated one day in a rupture, all the more irretrievable because of its self-contained quietness.

In social life, however, their relations were as amicable as old friendship should be, but some time later Rose Campbell changed her latter name to Brazil.

As became an Englishman born and bred in the traditions of nineteenth century self-control, Waring took his congé with commendable sang froid. The old hidden-away shattered love story was respectably swept away into a dark corner amongst the other fragments of de trop sentiments, and apparently forgotten.

Only, quite suddenly, he developed an abnormal growth of cynicism and disbelief in things generally, with a special clause relating to women. He never for a moment doubted the reality of the Brazils' domestic felicity. Neither did he dream that the one woman in the world whom he would ever love, had made the great mistake of a lifetime.

And Brazil, luckily for his mental peace, never knew that his marriage had been a big failure to at least one of the contracting parties.

And so the years drifted past, quietly and peacefully, years in England generally do, and the smiling surface of life's stream was never ruffled by the tempest of aching hearts below.

A period came at last, however, when the years in England were quiet no longer. Hostilities had begun in South Africa and soon afterwards Brazil and Waring went to war.

The latter cool and cynical, Brazil depressed at leaving his wife, but hopeful of soon seeing her again, whilst at home, in mourning London, a woman hung over a few letters and a photograph and cried her heart out quietly for the mistake of five years before.

And to-night on the eve of a great battle Waring also thought of that time five years ago, and in the rising clouds of tobacco-smoke pieced together the broken fragments of memories long repressed.

All the softness he had tried so hard to stifle crept back into his heart, and as the old sweet ideal of the woman he had loved came back again, Waring's eyes grew strangely misty.

"Strong tobacco," he muttered, with a touch of his old sneering cynicism, "must try a lighter brand if I live over to-morrow."

Aye, if he did live over to-morrow? For a strange premonition of disaster had been overshadowing him all day, and although not a superstitious man, Waring instinctively felt that the vivid recall of those old romantic days was an omen of approaching disaster.

"To-morrow, perhaps," he thought, "would witness for him the solving of Life's great problem of apparent inequality—he would perhaps learn the why and the wherefore of what his whole soul had rebelled against for five years, the Master's great plan of human suffering. He would know the reason why, to men like Brazil yonder, happiness came perpetually and was accepted as a matter of course—why the sun always shone on their side of the road, whilst poor devils like he, Waring, walked for ever in the shade.

Even as he thought, there crept round his soul a strange tranquility, and all the pent-up harshness towards the woman who had shattered his happiness faded away like a bad dream, and only forgiveness remained.

He felt himself to be stepping up close to the boundary line of eternity to-night, and a wild desire presently seized him to let her know the strange emotion that possessed him—to tell her that even five years' cynicism had failed to eradicate the purest emotion he had ever known.

Yes, Brazil had asked him to write, and he would write. After all, what would it matter to her, and it would bring much rest to him to-night. What could it matter? After to-morrow he would never offend a living soul again—of that he felt perfectly certain.

And even as Waring thought of to-morrow's probabilities, the conviction that he would never fight again grew into a fixed and absolute certainty.

So what mattered it whether he wrote a letter or not—to her—nothing; whilst to him, it meant—a feeling of peace, nay even of vague happiness at the laying-down of life's burden.

With a "good-night" he presently rose and walked rapidly to his own little tent.

There he hunted up an old and battered writing case, and began to write his letter.

No suitable style of address suggested itself immediately, and for some time Waring stared out through the opening in the tent, into the grey and misty night beyond.

Mechanically he noted how one small star struggled painfully to penetrate the murky atmosphere, then began to write simply and without prefix of any kind:

"If the writing of this letter offends you, try and think of me a little more leniently when you fully grasp the circumstances under which it is written. Believing, as I do, that I am now scribbling my last letter on earth, I am writing as straight from my heart as the medium of words will allow.

"A great battle is impending, one which, some strange feeling tells me to-night I will never come through. My implicit belief in this ominous emotion has aroused in me an uncontrollable desire to write you a few words of farewell.

"Standing on the brink of eternity, man sometimes sees things clearer and in a fairer light than he is ordinarily accustomed to, and to-night all my rebelliousness at what fate meted out to me five years ago has vanished. After all, you had your happiness—mine was a cheap price to pay for that.

"You used to care for me once—when you think of that, try to forgive me for saying now, at my last hour, I still love you.

"It won't hurt you, and the saying of it makes the way a bit smoother for me.

"In saying 'I love you' I have said all, and it makes dying more easy for me. To the love of five years ago I say 'Good-bye. God keep her safely.'

"John Waring."

No man on board the great Cape liner Good Hope, as she reached her moorings in Southampton Water, cared less about his home-coming than Major John Waring, D.S.O.

Six months had come and gone since he wrote that letter, the writing of which, he felt convinced, would be his last literary effort on earth.

But although death had swept away many of his fellow officers, Bob Brazil amongst them, "the man with the scythe" had left him unscathed.

"Threatened men," they say, "live long," and the strange foreboding that prompted Waring to write the fateful letter to the woman who had wrecked his happiness, years before, had resulted in nothing worse than a bad wound.

The great battle, however, had left many widows in far-away England, amongst them being Rose Brazil.

And Waring's letter?

It was the one thing that disturbed the apathetic carelessness of his home-coming. Many times since that fateful night on which it had been written, Waring had cursed himself for being such a superstitious ass. Following immediately on her husband's death, its receipt must, he thought, intensify her old antipathy towards him.

How could he undo that wretched scrawl? What apologies could he make? None. No power of his could undo the past. What was written was written without hope of recovery or alteration, and Waring dreaded accordingly his first meeting with Rose Brazil.

Even as Waring's uncomfortable speculations ran on, the great ship had drawn up alongside the quay and friends were rushing into the arms of friends. Waring had seen the same scene enacted many times before, and had looked on indifferently, but now as he watched the eager, loving faces, a strange feeling of loneliness and social isolation swept through him.

"No one would meet him," he thought with a queer little pang of regret. "No one——"

Suddenly, as he stepped ashore, a woman dressed in deep black came towards him quickly.

It was Rose Brazil.

"You!" he muttered amazedly.

"Yes," she said gently, "I saw your name amongst the list of passengers, and as I knew you would have no one to welcome you home—I——"

"Thank you," said Waring, with a swift look of gratitude, "it was awfully good of you—but—but—have you received my letter?" he added suddenly, remembering himself.

"Yes," she said, flushing softly, "I got your letter."

"And you forgive?" he whispered anxiously. She did not reply immediately and they had walked some distance from the crowd before she spoke.

Then she turned towards him and her eyes were filled with tears.

"If people knew," she said, "they would say my conduct in coming here to meet you, so soon after his death, was everything that was bad and unwomanly, and I suppose it is wrong and sinful. But I couldn't help it—Heaven knows I couldn't. I have never loved any one but you. Oh, John," she whispered, and her lips quivered pathetically, "there was a big mistake made five years ago. For Heaven's sake don't let us make any more."

A WOULD-BE COUNTESS.

When I reached Leghorn I found myself in the company of two people I had heard of several times before in Italy. They were James Saunders, widower, and his daughter, Eileen, of New York.

He was a man of sixty and rather an invalid, and she was a girl of twenty who had an overwhelming desire to become an Italian countess. Mr. Saunders was a frank, blunt-spoken man. I hadn't known him an hour before I knew all his troubles.

He had amassed wealth, and he loved his daughter but he had no use for a son-in-law not born in America.

"I don't know what on earth possesses the girl," he said, when referring to Eileen, who had been plain Ellen before the steamer left New York. "She's just gone mad on the title business. At home she'd have been satisfied with a colonel, a judge, or an honourable, but now she declares that nothing less than being a countess will do.

"It seems as if all the counts in Italy had heard of her desires and the size of my banking account, and they have hung on our heels by the dozen. It's no use for me to talk to the girl. She gets highty-tighty the minute we start to argue, and if I don't give in to her she sulks for a week. Do you know anything about Italian counts?"

"Very little," I replied.

"As near as I can find out they are a mighty poor lot, take 'em as you find 'em, and I haven't seen one I'd hire for a coachman. There's one fellow in particular I'd break in two if I was twenty years younger and could run him down. He's followed us for a month, and the girl seems to be altogether gone on him. I say, now, but I want you to do something for me. He calls himself Count Padova, and he's drummed his title and castles and ancestors into my ears till I want to kick him. I want you to find out if he is a real count."

It was a matter of little trouble to discover that Count Padova had a right to his title, but it also came to light that he was almost sixty years old, poor as a church mouse, and had been twice married. His character as a man was very unsavoury, and it was easy enough to guess that he was after a marriage which would bring him in money.

"The miserable old wretch!" exclaimed Saunders, when I made my report. "I thought that he was an old sinner, and that he was trying his best to knock twenty years off his age. Why, hang the man, I'm sure he's got a wax nose, false teeth and a wooden leg, and that without his wig we'd find his head as bare as a billiard ball! I want you to help me save Ellen."

"But she can't marry without your consent and assistance," I replied.

"But she'll keep at me till I give my consent and assistance," he protested. "Think of it, will you—the daughter of James Saunders, a straight-haired Yankee Doodle Dandee, picking up with a lop-shouldered, knock-kneed, played-out old Italian grandfather just for the sake of being called Countess Padova! Why, I want to hit myself and break the dishes when I think of it! I want you to have a talk with the girl and tell her what a fool she is making of herself."

I naturally refused to take any part in the matter, though willing to offer such outside advice as might help the father. Indeed, one look at Eileen satisfied me that at my first word she'd retaliate with a mighty snub.

It was four or five days before I got sight of Count Padova. He had probably been obliged to fish round to get his railway fare from Florence. I found him all that Saunders had described him, and a little more. He had been washed and wrung out and bleached until one could think only of an old towel on a clothes line.

We didn't hit it off at all. He saw in me a rival, and straightening up as far as possible and assuming what he probably thought was a ferocious dignity, he advanced upon me and said:

"Sir, I am the Count Padova!"

"Well, what of it?" I queried.

"And the affianced husband of Miss Saunders."

"I'm sorry for her."

I thought that a challenge would follow, but it didn't. He tottered round and tried to look bloodthirsty and, finally shook his finger at me and cried out in piping tones:

"Beware, sir—beware! No man shall come between me and my love and live!"

I think he went upstairs and told his lady love that he had scared me off the track and then discovered that I was no rival, for he soon returned, and begged my pardon and offered me his hand. I was reading a newspaper and didn't see or hear him.

Saunders was laid up in his room that day, but he came down after dinner and groaned out as he met me:

"My last hope is gone! Ellen tells me she has accepted the count, and the beggar is going to have the fact published to-morrow."

"But suppose you refuse your sanction and order the old beggar to get?"

"Oh, you don't know Ellen. I threatened to do that and she declared she'd elope with him."

"And what if you told the count he should never touch a shilling of your money?"

"He'd smile and smirk and take it for a bluff. By Jove, though, but I'd pay a bravo a thousand pounds in gold to break his old neck. You know about these bravos. Go out and find one for me, and tell him to come round with a sand bag."

The man was really in wretched spirits over the affair. It would not have taken some fathers two minutes to end it, but he was ill and morbid, and his strength of character was gone for the time.

We sat talking for an hour and then went up-stairs and joined the couple on the balcony. The daughter received us very coolly, but the count had been drinking and was good natured and voluble. I had insulted him, but I was a friend of the charming Miss Saunders and her respected father, and he would overlook it.

We were a little family party, and we were by ourselves on a little balcony, and he would take advantage of the occasion to say that in seeking the hand of the fair girl before him he was incited by love alone.

He was forty-five years old and lonely. He wanted to love and be loved. Money to him was as to the cobblestones in the street. He had estates in Sardinia, in Lombardy and in Umbria. He had castles in Tuscany, Naples and Sicily. He had gold mines in the Alps, silver mines in the Carnics and lead mines in the Apennines. And as to his social standing, who could desire more than to be the confidant of the ruler of the land?

The old count knew how to lay it on thick, and it was entertaining to hear him talk, but at the same time one could not help but pity the father and feel provoked at the daughter.

The aged lover was still exploiting when he suddenly pitched forwards out of his chair. The girl screamed out and ran away to her room, and I was for bringing a doctor as quickly as possible when Saunders protested:

"Hold on a bit. The old vagabond has only fainted away. Let's see what he's made of."

We went to work, and the results were strange enough. I brought soap and water from my room and the first thing we took off was a false brow. We got enough enamel off his face to reveal a score of wrinkles, and it was discovered that every tooth in his head was false.

Under his wig was a shiny pate and his backbone was stiffened with a corset. I believe it was the tightness of the corset that had caused him to faint. There was something still to come. His right leg was supported at the knee by a brace, and a nose which had been broken was neatly patched up with wax.

When we had taken the old fellow all to pieces he was a queer sight to look at, and it was hard to tell whether the heap on the chair or the heap on the floor was Count Padova. He had partly revived before we got through and he cackled away like an old hen.

"And this," groaned Saunders, as he pointed to the heap on the chair, "this was to be my son-in-law! This was what my daughter was to marry to be called a countess! I want her here."

He was back with her in a moment. I lifted the count to a sitting position, and he was chattering of love and castles as the girl got sight of him.

"What have you done!" shrieked the daughter, as she turned from the grisly spectacle to us.

"We've simply taken him apart," replied the father, "and the best part of him is on the chair there."

When the would-be countess had fled we sent for help to get Count Padova to his room.

He had to be handled with care. Any sudden movement might have pulled a limb or his head off. There was considerable hilarity among the servants, and it was left to them to glue the pieces together again and make a man. When morning came he had disappeared, and he had not even left a farewell note behind. A day later Saunders said to me:

"Good heavens, man, but I feel like dancing a hornpipe! There is to be no countess in our family. Ellen has written to a young lawyer in Chicago and said yes to his proposal and we are making ready to start for home. Come out and have three drinks and a hurrah with me!"

Murder Will Out.

I was never a girl hard to please, but I could not help feeling angry with my hostess for picking him out to take me in to dinner.

His whole cadaverous appearance was most uninteresting—his eyes were of a watery nondescript hue—and the impression given one was that of a washed-out semi-animate individual whose only redeeming features were a more than average height and the appearance of muscle in his gaunt anatomy.

This seems very paltry, but somehow we girls are very apt to judge men by first appearances, and so I felt distinctly angry and disposed to be most oyster-like to my partner. He came up in a limp, sidling manner, and offered me his arm without a word. We followed the rest.

My discomfiture was a little alleviated when I found my other neighbour was Richard Deeron whom I had met once or twice and whom I rather liked, perhaps from the fact that he had flattered my vanity by appearing interested in my company, and his deeds of prowess—told by himself, by the way—in his travels and career (he was in the army) had the usual effect on the mind of a girl just out of her teens.

His companion was a querulous old lady who was already making herself agreeable to any and everybody; so I saw an opportunity of engaging Captain Deeron's attention to the neglect of my own partner.

The latter's name was Eversey; I fancied that somebody had told me he also had travelled considerably in a journalistic capacity and had vanished for some considerable time recently from the public ken.

Deeron, seizing the opportunity, turned to me:

"This is a pleasure, Miss Hurtlas," he said in his usual manner which savoured much of the suaviter. "I was in hopes Mrs. Masham would let me take you down. My old lady, however, is quite happy. By the way, who is your companion?"

He elevated his eyebrows as he said this and looked at Eversey, who happened to be facing him. I fancied Deeron's gaze suddenly dropped as he met the other man's eyes, though Eversey showed no signs of recognition, and might have been been posing as a Dutch doll by the lack of interest which he showed.

"I think his name's Eversey," I said quietly, "but don't you know him?"

"I—oh no! though I seem to know his face. But then you see I meet so many fellows that we can scarcely remember one half the occasions or the men."

I felt scarcely satisfied with his answer, but the conversation which was generally too low for the others to hear was soon instrumental in driving away any wonder I felt.

The dinner was a success. My hostess was generally happy in her company.

The old dowager on Deeron's right talked at the top of her voice to Colonel Masham—a brother of the host—across the table, and conversation everywhere was general.

Deeron devoted himself to me. My partner on the other side, beyond a few remarks essential to the occasion, said little, though I noticed that every now and then he turned his passionless face towards us, and at times even showed a little interest as Deeron's narrations grew in loudness.

"I never told you, Miss Hurtlas, of an experience I had in the last frontier business. We had been dodging the beggars all day—grim work it was too—and we, that is, twenty of us, were sent on in advance to find the whereabouts of a poor chap of a war correspondent, who was captured three days before, and whom we had heard from a prisoner was still alive. The enemy had not been seen for some time; we had reason to believe they had retired to their camp in the other direction. We made our way—it was about six o'clock in the evening—and after an hour's gentle picking of our path along the side of the Larri pass towards Nawpur, we came suddenly upon an old battlement lower down the side of the hill. From information we knew that our object of search was probably here.

"We did not anticipate many opponents, and the advantage gained by a surprise seemed likely to balance any inequality of numbers."

By this time most of the company at our end of the table were listening to Deeron, who was quite in his element as an object of interest.

Eversey even was showing animated attention.

Deeron went on:

"Stealing down the side of the hill we came upon an old heavy wooden gate which curiously was ajar. We decided to attack. There was no sign of life. Immediately opposite the door was a building about twenty yards long bordered partly by a moat which, surrounding the whole of the building except where we were, approached within five yards of the door. There was another door in the wall opposite, and this also stood open. There seemed a small roadway therefore to cross between the two doors.

"We began to enter. Before more than half a dozen had entered, the heavy door swung to, shutting out the rest, the wooden roadway which was merely a sort of bridge gave way, and we were precipitated into the green slimy waters of the moat.

"After floundering about for a moment or two, in doubt as to what was to happen next, we found we could do nothing but swim or wade up to our armpits. Nobody could be seen. We could hear our men outside firing at intervals to attract the wretches out, but it was bound to be some time before they could manage to scale the outer wall."

Dinner was now practically over, but the ladies clamoured that the tale should be finished, and even Eversey, when the other men did so, added his request.

"Well," continued Deeron, "we slowly waded on in the dirty water till of a sudden from one of the little openings at the top of the building was thrown the body of a white man.

"We had no time to speculate on the meaning of this, before the moat was alive with what made our blood go cold—alligators in front of us disturbed by the sudden splash. We gave ourselves up as lost. Our rifles were useless, but our revolvers were all right, and these we began to use on the monsters.

"There were a couple of ledges of about the thickness of an ordinary brick—one about a foot below the surface of the water and the other about four feet higher up the outer wall. These we raised ourselves upon, and firing as we went we began to creep back to the entrance.

"The rest of the story has little to tell. We had lost two of our fellows, and doubtless the creatures had made a meal of the body thrown in as well. This doubtless was of the man we went to rescue.

"By the time we reached the gate, our men had succeeded in opening it, but we could do no more than get outside and make our way back to the column."

"You, of course, reported the death of the journalist," said Eversey, and as we turned to him I noticed a gleam of interest I never had expected in his face. He seemed another man. We felt something strange was to come.

Deeron, taken aback by what we thought was the irrelevant remark, said, "Of course I did. Why——"

The old colonel here intervened.

"Yes, I heard of the business; but I had a hazy idea that the newspaper man turned up after some time."

Deeron's face turned a ghastly white.

Before he could stammer out anything, Eversey leant over and said slowly:

"You made a slight mistake in your official report, Captain Deeron. You reported his death. You should have reported his attempted murder.

"May I give a slightly altered version? When you got on the ledge, the alligators began to snap at you. You, sir, were far too terrorised to use your revolver. You, however, saved your life by pushing the man behind you in to take the brute's attention. That man was the newspaper man. But he was not killed. By the greatest of wonders he escaped with the loss of two fingers, and was recaptured just as you went and escaped three months ago."

Deeron, white to the lips, could only put on a sort of sneer of desperation and demand Eversey's right to question his narrative.

"Because, Captain Deeron, I was the correspondent and your would-be victim. Don't be alarmed, sir, my only wish is to revenge myself solely by contradicting your statement. My own feeling for you is not so much hatred as contempt."

Deeron, amid a grim silence, slowly slunk out of the house, to be heard of no more by us, save through the Gazette which told us he had sent in his papers.

* * * * *

Those first impressions of mine I view with mixed feelings, for if I had not devoted myself to Deeron that evening, the tale might not have come out, and the revulsion of feeling might not have been strong enough to cause another dénouement.

I am now the wife of a newspaper man, and his name is Eversey.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver plated pencil-cases or ten popular six shilling novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

GEO. R. SIMS'

HAIR RENEWER "TATCHO."

SAMPLE TRIAL BOTTLES TO-DAY,

EIGHTEENPENCE.

Sent Post Free in plain package, Twenty-one Stamps.

Geo. R. Sims, the discoverer of "TATCHO."

And why, pray, is the successful poet, playwright and journalist an eminent authority on a hair grower? Eager for an explanation, a Daily Mail representative sought out Mr. Sims at Opposite-the-Ducks Villa, and asked him point blank if it were true he had forsaken the leafy paths of light literature for the concrete road of commerce.

Now, Mr. G. R. Sims, as many people know, is one of the busiest men in the kingdom, but hastily affixing his signature to a letter, he looked up and extended a characteristically cordial welcome. Then he said: "Of course there is no truth in that; but as you have asked the question, I will explain how it is that my name has been adopted as the registered title of the company. In '86 I found that I was rapidly going bald. Not seriously, you understand, but the thinning out was sufficiently marked to set me thinking out a remedy. I went to two specialists, both of whom cheerfully assured me that I should be absolutely bald in two years.

"Then I discovered the preparation which has now been placed upon the market. That is to say, I was told something, and by careful trials and experiments I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders. Look at my hair now. Look at the colour; isn't that convincing evidence of the value of my preparation?"

Mrs. Brown Potter writes: "I use only 'Tatcho.'"

If your hair is falling or failing, you have your remedy. Don't hesitate. Use "Tatcho." The result will surprise you and will be intensely gratifying. "Tatcho" will stop the hair falling and prevent it going grey. Remember the name, the "George R. Sims" Hair Restorer "TATCHO."

THE LITTLE PINK LETTER

GWEN was sitting darning a table-cloth. Augusta, austere and spectacled, was reading the paper; Lettice was on the floor staring into the fire—doing nothing.

It was the usual sight in the little house at Earl's Court to find the three sisters thus occupied. Gwen always was mending or patching or cleaning—if not for herself, for her sisters, for Augusta wrote for the magazines, was an adept at short stories of any required style and length, and never had time to mend her clothes, and Lettice would look you straight in the face with her candid blue eyes and say she did not intend to mend hers. She was lazy and she did not care.

"Here, Letty. Here's a chance for you. Get a pen and ink, and answer this," said the eldest girl.

"Answer what?"

"This advertisement in last night's Echo. It will do well for you. It is to teach."

"I can't teach," coolly and not moving.

"Then you've got to," with asperity.

Lettice raised her eyebrows to the fire and said nothing.

"Let us hear this advertisement, Gus, then we will decide whether Letty will do for it or not," remarked the small voice of Gwen.

"You needn't put in your ear," cried Lettice, beginning to feel the odds were against her, and dropping into slang, a trick she had if the question of her working was mooted.

"One, two, three, four—go on Gus," replied Gwen, counting stitches.

Augusta settled her pince-nez and read:

"'Wanted, lessons on the banjo. Beginner. Lady professor preferred. Apply, J. B., 199, South Square, W.C.'"

"Don't see much in that—besides, I can't teach."

"Don't see much in it? Why it is grand. Here is some fussy, dried-up old lawyer wants to learn the banjo as a rest from his legal work. Capital! I could write a tale about it."

"That's right, yarn away," said Lettice aggressively.

"But why not answer it?" put in Gwen, the general peace-maker. "There would be no harm, and I don't think it is an old man. I think it is a lady."

"Why?"

"Because she asks for a lady teacher."

"Which proves it is a man," from Augusta triumphantly.

"Pooh! Proves nothing. I won't answer it; I decline to teach old men. No woman would learn from me, so what should I do?"

Augusta sighed.

Her sister sorely tried her nerves at times, for she had arrived at the age when a girl has nerves.

Lettice hadn't.

"It might be a young man. Some young men like the banjo."

This from Gwen.

"No, young men haven't got the cheek to advertise for lady teachers. I'd like to see the young man who had the nerve to."

"Lawyers have nerve for anything. He is bound to be a legal man because of his address."

"Well, give me a piece of paper. You are determined to put my nose on the grindstone I can see, so I suppose I shall get no peace till I write. What shall I say? Dear sir?"

"No, you don't know it is a sir. I should say: 'Miss Lettice Blake presents her compliments to "J. B.," and would be pleased to give him lessons on the banjo. Her terms are two guineas for ten lessons, and she is a pupil of Mr. A. D. Cammeyer.'"

"Well, all right, I'll do it. Can I use your pen?" and seating herself at the table, Lettice scrawled in her big, untidy handwriting the note that Augusta had dictated.

"Nothing will come of it," she said as she stuck the stamp on.

"You never know," put in Gwen, who was nineteen years old and had, therefore, great experience in this world.

"Now you can get the tea while I correct this proof," said Augusta, satisfied that Letty had done her best. After all, no one could do more.

About three days after this a large square envelope was delivered by the postman addressed to Lettice. It ran:

DEAR MADAM.—Your offer of lessons received. I will call between four and five to-day and make arrangements as to the time that will suit you best. I would also like your advice as to the choice of instrument.

I remain,
Yours faithfully,
JOHN BERKELEY.

"There!" cried Augusta, throwing her glasses violently upon the table. "Didn't I tell you so!"

"My bet's off, I thought it was a lady."

"No, I'm right, It is an old man, Let me see the letter; no, it isn't an old man, it is a man of about forty-five or fifty.

"A nice, solid, respectable person."

"Ugh!" cried Lettice. "Fancy giving lessons to a person."

"Well, I'm glad he is middle-aged. I shan't have to sit in the room with you all the time," remarked Augusta.

Lettice's fair face flushed.

"Do you wish to insinuate that should it turn out to be a young man that you will sit like a glowering dragon all the time? Go on old gig lamps!"

"Really, Lettice, your language is getting beyond all bounds. No music mistress ever spoke as you do," expostulated Augusta.

"I suppose if the pupil talks too much you will ask him to hold his clapper!" said Gwen with a laugh.

"No, I shall say 'stow your lip.' That's quicker and sounds more to the point," replied Letty, who delighted in teasing poor Augusta.

"I can see you are trying to tease me as much as you can so I will leave the question, as I know you only get worse at such times. I am going up to town, girls, but shall be back before Mr. Berkeley calls. I have to go up and see the editor." and shortly afterwards Augusta went out.

Lettice tidied herself, put her unruly hair in order, tied a clean ribbon round the cat's neck, and then lit the lamp. Gwen said nothing. She did not believe in unnecessary conversation.

As the clock drew towards four, signs of uneasiness became manifest in Letty. She poked the fire and got the tea things out, making an extraordinary noise with the cups. Then she tuned and retuned her banjo, and rolled and smoothed out the blue ribbons with which it was ornamented.

At last she could bear it no longer.

"Gwen, I feel horribly nervous. Whatever shall I say to this fool."

"Just say 'How d'you do,' and then arrange the time. It's quite easy."

"Well I hate it, I wish to goodness I had never—oh, Gwen, there he is!" as the little latch of the gate snapped to behind someone.

Gwen leant forward and peered through the pattern of the lace curtain, out into the gathering dusk.

She drew back her head, a trifle pale.

"Letty! It's a young man!"

"That ends it. If anyone thinks I am going to teach young men—there's the bell!" And Lettice, feeling none of her customary self-possession, went slowly to the door.

A deep voice inquired if she were in. She said she was, and the stranger stepped inside.

He was tall, very tall, but that was all she noticed.

Silently she ushered him into the little room from whence Gwen had fled precipitately into the kitchen beyond.

"Won't you sit down," she said as she closed the door.

"Well I came to see a Miss—er—Blake about some banjo lessons."

"I am Miss Blake."

The man started and looked rather disconcerted.

"Oh, I—er—beg your pardon, of course, but I fancied somehow, that you were older," he said apologetically.

"I shall be some day. I'm not now," replied Lettice, unable to resist the repartee.

The man looked at her and caught sight of a vanishing dimple in her cheek.

"Yes, yes, of course," he said vaguely.

"You see you did not state the age you required in your advertisement, so I did not think much about it," said Lettice, regaining her self-possession as she saw the young man losing his. "And really," she added, "I think I can teach you as well as an old woman," here she drew herself up to make as much of her height as possible. "My other pupils get on very well."

It might be added, the other pupils were fictitious.

"Oh, I don't doubt it for a moment. And do you think I could learn to play the banjo?" he hastened to say.

"Why not?" with an amused glance at him.

"Well, I'm so awfully stupid about music, you know."

"You are!" she said with an unmoved face.

He looked quickly at her, rather at a loss to know if she were laughing at him.

"Yes, I am awfully fond of it and all that, but I can't read a note."

Lettice gave a low whistle of comprehension.

"I see, that will be longer then," she said.

"Could I learn, do you think, or am I too old?"

The girl laughed merrily.

"Too old! Why you're not thirty, I should think. People can learn when they are sixty years if they like."

"Thanks, awfully. You have lifted quite a weight off my mind. I am so stupid at music, you know."

"Are you? You don't look it," critically regarding his handsome features.

He turned away his head.

He did not like the candid gaze and was afraid he would turn colour and she would see it.

"And when can I come?" he said, looking at his hat.

"To-morrow at five. Will that do?"

"That will suit me—and what banjo shall I get?"

"Don't be in such an hurry to get one. I have two, you can use one until you decide what to have."

"Thanks, very much. You are very kind. Good afternoon."

"Good afternoon. Bring a copy of Cammayer's Tutor with you!" she called after him, as he went away.

Then she did a couple of pirouettes in the passage and ran into the kitchen.

Rigidly seated in a chair was Augusta, her hat and veil still on.

"I hear he is a young man," she said.

"Young, dark, six feet, and very good looking! Think of that, old dragon!" cried Letty, her face flushed with excitement.

Her sister regarded her severely.

"H'm, I'm sorry I found that advertisement now. It did not strike me he would be young and good looking."

"Well, give me my tea then, unless you want me to drink it out of the pot! If I have to work and teach stupid young men, I must be fed up!"

The next day Mr. John Berkeley called again. This time, Lettice, severely trained by Augusta, received him with solemn demeanour and gave him a little rudimentary instruction in the gentle art of music.

"It would not be much good to teach you the banjo until you can read music," she said, wrinkling her white forehead.

Digitized by Google

"No?" said the young barrister, for Augusta was correct as to his calling. "Couldn't I learn music without learning my notes?"

"Don't be stupid, could you learn to read a book without first learning the alphabet? It is the same with music. Here is a book of scales, let me teach you the lines and spaces."

He paid great attention, and being a man anxious to learn, he progressed quicker than a child who has to have the knowledge forced into his unwilling head.

Augusta attended once or twice, but the behaviour and deportment of the pupil were such as to calm her apprehensions, and she soon returned to her writing and left these two to work out the fifth position in peace.

Sometimes, if he had been less stupid than usual, Lettice would play to him after the lesson and sing also.

Little coon songs about nothing, set to a pretty air.

At these times he would lie back in the faded armchair and smoke cigarettes and see through a comfortable haze, a very pretty girl sitting in a delightful, graceful attitude, and—and—then he would pull himself up very short for fear his thoughts should carry him away.

"Oh, I—er—beg your pardon, but I fancied you were older," he said apologetically.

It was not long before he was introduced to the whole of the family, Gwen and her eternal mending, and Augusta who was father, mother, and sister to the two girls.

Sitting in his lonely chambers the young man used often to think of the three girls happy and contented, and working hard for a living.

He did not work for a living.

He had an income other than that he derived from the Bar, which was just as well as he was briefless.

An insatiable desire to travel prevented him from ever staying long in England.

An orphan himself with no relations to say him nay, and money at his command, he owned no master but his own wishes.

Lettice and he got on capitally.

She liked him because he had evidently such an admiration for her talent and she felt she could talk to him as though he were an old friend, and tell him her household troubles, and her hopes and fears for the future, secure in the knowledge that he would neither make fun of her or feel bored like some of her male acquaintances, or take advantage of the situation to make love to her, as others would have done.

He liked her because she was charming and had a peculiar and attractive grace and manner which was new to this young man, and she was pretty also, and interested in him, and his feelings towards her were perhaps warmer than is usual between pupil and teacher. But he took care to keep these feelings well under control, for he was shy and diffident with this open-hearted frank maiden.

One day, some months after their first meeting, Lettice startled Berkeley considerably by saying, one day: "You may congratulate me if you like?"

There was almost a wistful look in her blue eyes.

"What for, have you had any good luck?"

"I suppose so. I am engaged to be married."

Something seemed to strike in John's brain like a hammer.

"Married?" he cried aghast, and I am afraid with his mouth open.

"Yes. Why do you look like that? It seems to have surprised you."

He was almost too staggered to reply.

"Well—er—to tell the truth it has surprised me. I never thought of such a thing in connection with you."

Lettice felt offended.

"Even freaks get a chance sometimes, and even if my nose is long I suppose there is a man——"

"My dear Miss Letty," taking her hands in his agitation quite unconsciously. "You mistake me. But I—that is—er—well, upon my word, you have staggered me."

"So it seems."

"Tell me, who is the lucky man?"

"He lives over there, down that road, and he is a clerk in the Bank of England and has a salary of £200 a year."

"Good Heavens! Are you going to marry on that?"

"Why not, it is plenty for two people, and besides I can't live on Augusta for ever."

"No, of course not, and if you love him there is no——"

"But that's it, I don't love him. Now Mr. Berkeley, do tell me, is it right for me to marry if I don't love? You are a barrister and used to unknotting points, can you tell me?"

John Berkeley felt the case almost too much for him.

"Well, does the man love you?—but of course he does, no man could help it," he added half to himself.

"I beg your pardon. Does he love me? Oh, yes, he is never happy away from me. I like him, you know, I am very fond of him, and I like to go out with him, but somehow I can be just as happy with any other man, so that's what made me think I don't really love him."

"I should think you did not. Have you ever tested yourself?"

"No, how could I?"

"Have you ever thought what you would feel like if you were out alone one night, we'll say at Earl's Court, and you saw the Johnnie was with some other girl, and he talked to her and made a fuss of her, and she was prettier than you? Have you ever thought what you would feel like?"

She was regarding him earnestly.

"Yes."

"What would you think?"

"I shouldn't mind one bit. I told him and he was furious. He has a dreadful temper but there—I suppose I shall marry him."

Berkeley felt sorry, but, somehow, some words he wanted to say would not come out. A little encouragement, perhaps, from her would have helped him, but she was not even looking his way.

"You have not congratulated me yet," she said.

"No, and if you will excuse me, I don't think I will. I may say I hope you will not marry the fellow—who, I daresay, is all right in his way, but not good enough for you. If I ever meet him I will congratulate him, not you."

"Married!" he cried, aghast.

And abruptly rising he went away.

When he had gone, two tears rose silently into Lettice's blue eyes, and overflowing, ran down her cheeks.

The next time she gave Berkeley a lesson they both noticed a little constraint in the manner of the other.

Neither knew whence it came and each blamed the other, after the manner of young people.

Then he gave her a shock.

"I am afraid I shan't be able to do more than finish this set of lessons."

"Why?"

"I am going abroad. I am tired to death of England."

She was a better actor than he, and did not show her astonishment as he had done. She only said:

"Oh! how nice it must be to be a man and have money to go where you like."

"Yes. I have been in this hole of a place for two years, and I can't stand it any more. I am going to try gold digging in British Columbia."

She dissembled her feelings whatever they might be, and questioned him eagerly about his proposed trip and life out in the wilds.

"But you will come back, won't you, soon?" she said in conclusion, with perhaps more touch of eagerness than is usual.

"Not soon. One day I suppose I shall come back—but I have no home to come to and no one to care about me much."

"Will you be away years?" in a low voice.

"Yes, years."

"Oh, then when you come back I shall be married. Perhaps living in a demi-semi-detached house at Upper Tooting, with two children in a basket-work mail-cart!"

She laughed a rather strained laugh and then coughed.

He was a singularly dense young man, although I suppose there was some excuse for him, he did not understand the ways of women.

All he knew was that he went away with a dull heavy pain in his heart, and the only remedy he knew for it was a trip to some wild spot. But what he did not know was that he left a sharper, more cruel pain in a tenderer heart than his own, a heart that tried to console itself by looking over houses in the Balham district and which found no relief in the near prospect of tiled hearths and brass curb fenders, bought on the hire system.

"Good-bye, Miss Lettice, you will write to me, won't you," with a pleading look. "Good-bye, Miss Gwen; good-bye, Miss Blake; you have been awfully kind to me—hope to see you again some day!" and shaking hands he raised his hat and went away.

Augusta adjusted her glasses and peered after his vanishing figure.

"H'm! a very nice man. Pity he's stupid. Good gracious, Gwen! Lettice is going into hysterics!"

* * * * *

Weeks passed and months rolled by and the New Chum, Rubber-Neck, Tender-Foot, or whatever he was called in those parts, had settled down as one of the small mining community.

But no letter came. Other friends wrote to him and occasionally he got a newspaper but the letter he looked for was never there.

One day, however, a small pink envelope bearing the unmistakable stamp of femininity was handed out to him, and his heart gave a wild thump as he recognised the sprawling handwriting.

He opened it and his hand trembled. It was a long letter and in some places was rather badly expressed, but it told him the truth that he had never dare ask for, nor knew it was there.

"I suppose I ought not to write to you like this, but Augusta is out and will never know, and it is raining and bitterly cold, and we have very little fire—coals are very expensive—I have kept it to myself and nobody has ever guessed my secret, but I feel I shall go mad if I don't tell someone, and there is no one to tell but you, I would not tell you only you are thousands of miles away and I don't suppose I shall ever see you again. I have thrown over the Bank of England fellow. I am sorry I had to do it, but I could not bear it any more. It was not fair to marry one man and love another, as I love you, was it?—even if the other didn't care a rap for you—because I know you never did, only I felt somehow I could not do it, so I told him. He was very sorry, of course, and Augusta was very angry, but then she is an old silly and didn't know all the story. Didn't know how fond I am of you. How I loved you when you were over here, only you never knew it. There! It is out now and I have read it several times and it has given me the cold shivers. Thank goodness! I cannot see your face when you read it. I don't know now whether I shall even send it to you. It is such an awful thing for a girl to say, but oh, Jack, you don't know how I love you."

"Didn't you stay for the last act?"

Here the letter evidently was put away. Berkeley turned back to the date at the head of the letter and compared it with the postmark on the envelope. There were weeks between the two, which showed she had put the letter by.

Then he went on to read, all about the others, and their little doings. Having come to the end of the missive he turned it back and read it all over again.

Then like the luminary of the law that he was, he folded up the little pink sheets and slept on it.

Next morning he rose with a look of extra determination on his sunburnt face.

Having had his breakfast he went down to head-quarters and made inquiries about the passages for England.

In between whiles he called himself a fool and other hard names for having left England at all.

His impatience during the voyage home was a source of continual amusement to his fellow passengers.

One man of a witty turn of mind said one day, he was in as much hurry as if he were going to be married.

Berkeley turned sharply round and catching the man by the sleeve propelled him swiftly towards the bar.

"What is yours, sir?" he said briefly.

And the man being sensible profited by his opportunity.

When at last, bag, baggage, and all, he found himself standing on the platform of Waterloo station, he could almost have leapt for joy. Throwing his luggage pell-mell into a hansom he told the driver to take him to the Weirdor. Having there shaved and changed his things, he called another cab and gave the man an address of a quiet little street in Earl's Court.

Arriving at his destination he rang the bell.

The door opened and a voice said:

"You are home early, didn't you stay for the last act?"

"No," said Berkeley briefly as he stepped inside the passage. "I have come home to hear that——"

Lettice started back with a little cry and leant against the wall very white and trembling.

Berkeley with astonishing promptitude, placed his arm between the wall and her. He thought the idea very neat. He looked down at her fair head resting against his shoulder, and noticed how thin her face was and how dark the lines were under her blue eyes, and he called himself a fool and more hard names still.

"Oh Jack!" she gasped at last, "how you startled me."

"Did I, dear?" he said, devouring her with adoring eyes.

"I got your letter—and I am come home."

"I am all alone to-night. Gwen and Gussy are gone to the theatre, and when you came in I thought you were a thief."

"So I am, Lettice. I am come to take your heart away with me."

"You did that a year ago," she said, giving him one of her old candid glances. Then something in his face caused her to look down. But she forgot to take her head from his shoulder, and he did not trouble to move his arm from round her waist.

"I always told you I was the greatest fool on earth—or I should have guessed you cared for me long ago," he said.

"Yes, I always thought you rather dense," she replied.

"But, however I don't think we'll quarrel over the depths of my folly. I have suffered quite enough, let us kiss and be friends. Lettice, shall we?"

And Augusta said afterwards that it was like a tale in a book, and that after the wedding when she had more time she would write a tale about it.

And she did, for here it is.

Erroll Stanhope.

Willie: "Now that sister is going to marry Mr. Jenks, why is it called an 'engagement,' pa?"

Mr. Underthum: "Probably because the real battle comes later, my son."

Clara (after a tiff): "I suppose you would like your ring back?"

George: "Never mind, keep it. No other girl I know could use that ring, unless she wore it on her thumb."

Mother (suspiciously): "If you haven't been bathing how did your hair get so wet?"

Little Dick: "That's perspiration—running away from bad boys wot wanted me to disobey you and go bathing with them."

Mamma: "Dorothy, do you know you ate my raisins?"

Dorothy (turning over the leaves of her book more rapidly): "Mamma, you told me yesterday some things are better left unsaid. Isn't that one of them, don't you s'pose?"

Little Bobby: "Mamma, the boys is goin' to have a circus. May I act?"

Mamma: "Oh, I suppose so. What are you going to do?"

Little Bobby: "Nothin' much. They is going to have a pyramid of sixteen boys, an' all I has to do is to stand on top."

Mrs. Watts: "That man who sat next us in church put in half-a-crown, and you put in only a threepenny piece."

Watts: "Yes, and he goes only once in about three years, and you make me go every Sunday. If you haven't forgotten your arithmetic, just figure out the proportion, will you?"

Wife (to her husband): "I say, my dear, how badly the tailor has put this button on your waistcoat. This is the fifth time I have had to sew it on again."

"Did you fall?" asked the officious one of the man who had slipped on the pavement.

"Fall?" roared the man, witheringly; "no; I merely sat down to think over the situation in South Africa."

As the family were at dinner the news of the death of a distant relative was received. Little Nellie looked longingly at her well-filled plate, and said:

"Papa, must we be sorry now or can we wait until after we finish eating?"

"Mrs. Higgins is still wildly in love with her husband."

"Does she put the buttons on his shirts for him yet?"

"No; but he told her he sat up all night playing cards without any stakes—and she believes him."

"Did you ever," asked the young husband, "have your wife look you in the eyes when you came home and ask you if you had not forgotten something?"

"Many a time, my boy," answered the old married man. "She does yet. In the early days it used to mean a kiss; now it is usually a reference to wiping my shoes."

"What a wonderful painter Rubens was," remarked Mr. Jones at the art gallery.

"Yes," assented Mrs. Jones. "It is said of him that he could change a laughing face into a sad one by a single stroke."

"Why," spoke up little Johnny, in disgust, "my schoolmaster can do that."

The Rajah's Vengeance.

AN INCIDENT IN THE INDIAN MUTINY.

It was the summer of 1857, and the world was still shuddering at the atrocities enacted at Cawnpore. The natives of Lucknow had revolted, and the Residency was in possession of the British, who were defending it tooth and nail. The stubborn resistance offered by the besieged was infuriating still further the always savage Nana Sahib, who was striving to devise some means whereby he could conquer and annihilate the hated "Feringhees."

He had imprisoned in a mosque, a short distance from the Residency, Captain Vincent, of the 42nd, and the young soldier's fiancée, Rose Deering. These two had been captured when the rising set in, and after Doctor and Mrs. Deering, the parents of Rose, had been brutally murdered in their own bungalow by their own native servants, so deep and subtle was the treachery that prevailed at the time.

The possession of these two prisoners suggested to the plotting and calculating mind of Nana a scheme, infamous in its conception, by which he might bring about the speedy fall of the Residency. Once the idea presented itself he was not slow to act upon it.

The position of affairs stood thus: If the Residency were not captured soon it would be too late, for Havelock, Outram, and Campbell were rapidly advancing to the relief, and might be expected any day. Mines had been constructed from the mosque to within destructive distance of the besieged, the trains being laid ready for lighting. This new idea of Nana's, however, held his hand, and caused him for the time to refrain from applying the match.

One day Captain Vincent received a visit from the Rajah, who appeared in a conciliatory mood. The English officer at once suspected treachery and kept on his guard. The boom of artillery could be heard without at intervals.

"Ah, you hear the firing," remarked Nana, as he eyed his captive with subtle cunning. "Has not enough blood been shed? Your countrymen are obstinate, they are ignorant, they are foolish. They do not know Nana Sahib, they do not know that if they will come from their stupid hiding-place they will be allowed to go free, unmolested. They wait for help, but that help will never come. The Sahib Havelock has been beaten, and cannot come to their assistance. They do not know it. Who will tell them?"

As he said this he looked askance at Vincent, and waited for some indication that his meaning was comprehended. But he only received a glance of contemptuous indifference for response.

"You promised mercy to the women and children of Cawnpore," said Vincent, "did you keep that promise?"

Nana appeared somewhat disconcerted at this thrust.

"What do you know of Cawnpore!" he exclaimed irritably, "you are dreaming!"

"News travels fast in these terrible times," replied the English officer coolly, "and the deeds of assassins go before them to warn."

"I tell you you dream! I offer your countrymen safety, if they will come from their hiding-place."

"They will not believe you, they will not trust you!"

"They will, if you write the message," said Nana, deliberately.

"I write such a message!" exclaimed Vincent hotly, "you must be dreaming to suppose such a thing. I play the traitor to my own people—never!"

At this Nana's patience gave way, and he burst forth in fury.

"Dog," he hissed, thrusting his quivering face into that of his captive, "do you defy me—you whose life has been spared when others have perished. You shall write, or beware my vengeance!

"Listen. Beyond that wall is the woman Deering. Her life has been spared as well as yours. But it is not too late to repair this omission. Now, if you do not write as I shall dictate, if you do not inform your people that help will never reach them from their own soldiers, that they may go free, that the Nana Sahib in his great mercy will spare them—if you do not write this the life of the woman Deering shall be spared no longer! She shall hang from the roof of this building, and you shall follow her! But not before you have seen your people blown into the air by the mines which are ready laid."

"Surami!"

A Sepoy entered the apartment.

"Let the woman Deering be secured to the rope which hangs from the roof," continued Nana in envenomed tones, "have your men in readiness, and upon the stroke of ten let the rope be drawn up." Then turning to Vincent, he added, "I will give you a little time to think it over—you shall speak with the woman. I warn you do not incur the vengeance of the Nana Sahib!"

A few moments later Captain Vincent was alone. He was in a terrible plight, and mature deliberation could not reconcile him to either course open to him. He was called upon either to sacrifice his helpless countrymen or be party to the execution of the woman he loved.

Digitized by Google

He knew the bloodthirsty nature of Nana too well to doubt the sincerity of his intentions. He would never betray his comrades, that was certain. But think how he might he could not conceive any other alternative than the terrible one offered by his merciless captor.

Before he had time to further debate the subject an attendant waited upon him and conducted him to the adjoining apartment, where Rose was already bound.

They exchanged a look of anguish—their sufferings were too heavy for many words. Briefly Vincent explained the situation, and wound up with:

"Tell me, dear, what shall I do?"

"Do, Jack?" replied Rose, sadly; "your duty. Do you think I would receive liberty at such a price? I am not afraid to die. I have lost nearly all who were dear to me, why should I shrink from a fate that sends me to join them where they are gone?"

"We shall go hence together," said Vincent solemnly.

"There are worse things than death, Jack," said Rose, impressively, "much worse."

"I have no thoughts for myself—a soldier does not fear death. 'Tis for you I am concerned. Cannot you escape some way?"

"There is no escape, I feel it. The man is implacable. It is death or dishonour. If you love me, Jack, never write that letter."

"I never will. My own brave lass, we will die together!"

He clasped her in his arms, and their lips met in a long, loving but despairing kiss.

The sun had already set, the shadows were deepening, and night was fast closing in. The attendant who had conducted Jack to Rose now returned and intimated that the interview must cease, and that the Nana Sahib desired to see and speak with Captain Vincent at once.

Jack took leave of Rose, and each felt it was their last meeting on earth. Returned to his own apartment, which communicated with that of Rose by means of an opening masked with heavy curtains, Jack found Nana with two attendants waiting for him.

"Has the Sahib Vincent made up his mind?" began Nana.

"He has," replied Jack indifferently.

"And his reply is?"

"That he will never write the letter that the Nana asks of him!"

"Cursed Feringhee!" burst forth Nana with potent fury, "then you die, you and the woman, Deering, and your people in the Residency! Bind him to that pillar!"

A couple of Sepoys fell upon him with a rope, and in a few moments he was bound hand and foot. He made no resistance, he was quite resigned.

"Now listen to me," went on Nana to Jack, when the latter was left helpless by the Sepoys, "watch the window yonder, and at the stroke of ten you will see the body of your helpless and hated countrywoman carried past on the rope! Then prepare for your own doom!"

And with these bitter words he and his attendants quitted the apartment.

It was now quite dark, the moon had risen and was shedding a flood of silver light upon the mosque. The window referred to by Nana was in the party wall, and lighted the central apartment in which Rose was secured. The rope from the roof was clearly to be seen by the light of the moon, travelling past the window to the floor beneath. It was slack and swung about occasionally. The apartment in which Jack was had no light other than that from the moon.

The position he found himself in was truly hideous and conceived with fiendish interest. No doubt Nana had some idea that his prisoner would give in rather than face the horrors of the penalty of refusal. But Jack was firm against this—he would endure to the end.

It was terrible waiting, the hour before the appointed time being agonising suspense. At last he felt it must be nearing ten o'clock. He averted his gaze from the window, he closed his eyes and tried not to think. He offered up a prayer, and——

Boom!

The first stroke of ten from a neighbouring turret! His heart seemed to stand still, and the ropes about him felt drawn to their utmost tension.

Boom!

He could hardly breathe, something in his throat was surely choking him!

Boom!

His brain was on fire, and somebody must be beating him on the head. He swayed from side to side, helpless as a log. He would not count the strokes, he would shut his ears. He seemed numbed from head to foot. Suddenly his senses seemed to clear, he drew himself up and listened.

Silence!

The tenth stroke was passed, and—Heavens! it was done. He could not look up—the window! He prayed for the speedy hand of the assassin to put an end to his mental torture. Thank goodness, at last, his executioner. But no, a friendly voice!

"Hush!"

A sword flashed in the moonlight, and in a trice he was free.

"Not a word; follow me."

He followed, unquestioningly, into the next apartment, through an aperture in the floor, into the bowels of the earth.

* * * * *

The Residency did not fall and Rose Deering did not die.

While the besiegers were busy mining, the besieged were similarly employed. The latter fortunately struck the mine from the mosque, and removed the charge. Then they explored further into the enemy's tunnel and captured a Sepoy, who was on his way to fire the mine. This individual they bound and gagged, and took along with them until they found themselves in the mosque.

They soon discovered and rescued Rose Deering, who told them of Jack's whereabouts. The Sepoy they put in Rose's place on the rope, and all got safely away through the mines to the Residency. H. L. Adam.

Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XIV.—HE TRIES HORSEBACK EXERCISE TO CURE HIS MANY AILMENTS.

Mrs. Bowser stood looking out of the window the other evening as Mr. Bowser came home from the office. There was a strange man with him, and they were in earnest conversation. He had a half guilty look on his face as he opened the door, and he seemed to want to be questioned, but the mystery was left unsolved until after dinner. Then she quietly asked:

"Well, what have you been buying this time?"

"Nothing at all," he replied.

"Then you've got some scheme on foot."

"There's no scheme about it. I have simply decided to do what any sensible man ought to do. When a man finds that he is the victim of a dozen ailments, he ought to set to and cure himself, oughtn't he?"

"Of course, but what are your ailments? Now and then you have a headache, or you get a corn on your toe, but your general health is excellent. It was only the other day that you were boasting how hardy you were."

"My dear woman," he said as he walked about, "you know very well that I'm not in the habit of complaining. If I were dying, I should say nothing about it till the last moment. I may have boasted of my health, but is it a husband's place to alarm his wife? You now force me to tell you that I have a dozen different ailments at the present moment, any of which may prove fatal, but I am going to make a heroic effort to live on. If you hadn't driven me into a corner, I should have kept my secret."

Mr. Bowser fell on to a heap of ashes.

"I see," she quietly observed as the family cat came downstairs and cocked her eye at Mr. Bowser. "Is it a spring tonic or what?"

"I have been recommended to try horseback riding and this evening I make my first experiment."

"And you imagine you will joggle the complaints away? I think I see you bouncing about in the saddle and the stirrups flying."

"Joggle! Bounce!" he shouted as he turned on her with a gesture which scared the cat out of the room. "You'd be sarcastic if I lay dead in the house! A nice wife you are to encourage a dying husband! Why should I joggle or bounce about in the saddle?"

"You shouldn't," she answered. "However, if you are going to take your first ride this evening I hope you'll stick to the lane and that the horse is a gentle one. I haven't the slightest objection to your scheme. Indeed, I hope it will do you lots of good."

She spoke so kindly that Mr. Bowser recovered his good nature, and twenty minutes later he was with the boy holding a horse in the lane. It was a soft, moonlight evening, and the lane was clear of vehicles and just the place for a gallop.

"Is this a gentle horse?" asked Mr. Bowser as he was all ready to get into the saddle.

"He's like a lamb, sir," replied the boy. "Excuse me, but you are trying to get up on the wrong side. That's better. If I was you, I'd let him walk at first. Some folks are dizzy when they first move off."

Mr. Bowser had climbed into the saddle like a cow climbing over a fence, but as no one but the boy had seen him he didn't feel very bad about it. He had never been on the back of a horse three times in his life, and he was no sooner up than he wished he was down. The boy got his feet in the stirrups for him and encouraged him with quiet words, and after the horse had walked up and down for five minutes confidence was restored. Then the boy said:

"This hoss is one of the easiest trotters in the whole country, and if I was you I'd let him go a bit. When he starts to trot you'll think you are in a rocking chair."

Mr. Bowser doubted it; but, looking over the back fence, he made out Mrs. Bowser standing at one of the windows. She had referred to "bounce" and "joggle," and he felt that he was being tested. He drew a long breath, uttered a silent prayer and chirped to the horse to strike into a trot. The horse obeyed. Had the rider caught the motion it would have been plain sailing, but he didn't catch it. There were half-a-dozen bobs, and three or four clutches at his mane, and Mr. Bowser rolled sideways out of the saddle and fell on to a heap of ashes. It was a good boy, and a sympathetic boy who had brought the horse round. He helped Mr. Bowser up, insisted that it was an accident that might have happened to the best rider on earth and in various ways encouraged him to ride again. The fallen rider kicked at the ash heap and struck the fence and was for giving it up, but the boy soothed him and made him understand that he would lose prestige if he failed to mount again.

"I intend to, of course," replied Mr. Bowser in defiant tones as he noticed Mrs. Bowser still at the window. "I don't claim to be much of a rider, but I'll get the spirit of it in a minute. I think the horse tripped the other time. Look through that knot hole in the fence, will you, and tell me what you see in my back yard?"

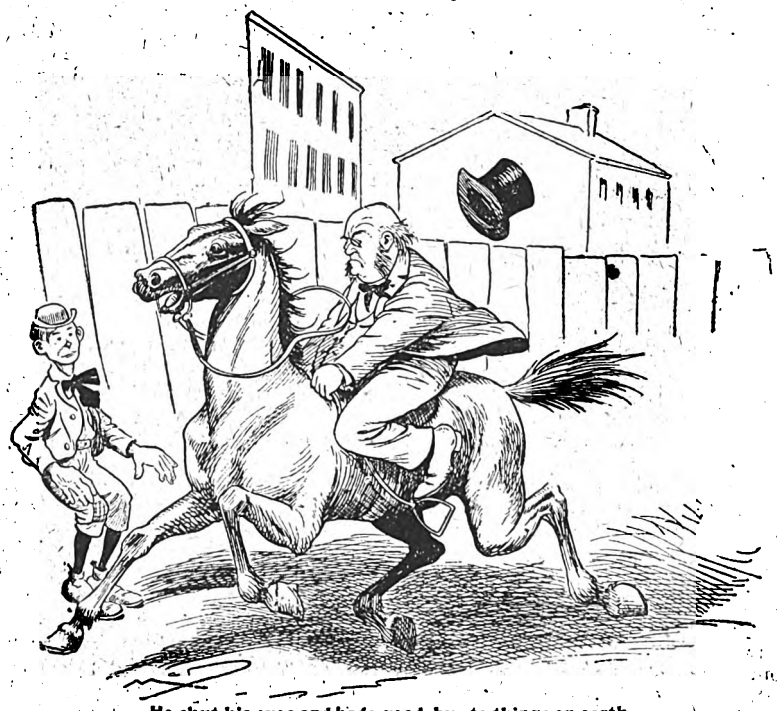
"The cook is sittin' on the ground an' laughin' herself to death," reported the lad after a look.

"She is, eh? Sent out by my wife to spy on me! Well, let her giggle. I'll stick on this time if I have to have my legs tied under the saddle."

"That's the way to talk. When you git into the saddle, jest move with the horse. All ready now?"

Mr. Bowser had another climbing match, but in due time he found himself filling the saddle again. Prudence warned him to go slow, but when he thought of Mrs. Bowser and the cook he determined to run all risks. As he got his feet well planted in the stirrups he struck the horse with his heel, and the animal started away at an easy canter. It was the rocking chair motion the boy had referred to, but Mr. Bowser didn't notice it. He found himself bobbing about and his feet out of the stirrups, and before he knew what he was doing both heels struck the horse and set him off at a full gallop. There was a yell that could have been heard half a mile away and then the rider clutched the saddle, shut his eyes and bade good-bye to things of earth—all except Mrs. Bowser.

The horse set off down the lane with his mind full of wonder, but the wonder soon changed to alarm as his burden lurched about, and before he had gone a hundred yards he made a shy and a kick, and Mr. Bowser went rolling over the ground and came up against a fence like a barrel of cider. It was a long time before the world returned to him. Then he opened his eyes to find Mrs. Bowser, the cook, a policeman, the boy and a workingman hovering over him.



He shut his eyes and bade good-bye to things on earth.

"I think he's coming to," he heard the policeman say, "and you can make your mind easy that his neck is not broken. What on earth possessed him to ride a horse, ma'am?"

"He wanted exercise," he heard Mrs. Bowser reply.

"Well, we'll drag him home for you, of course, but it won't do no good. He'll keep on making a donkey of hisself till something drives him through a brick wall."

Mr. Bowser was dragged along the lane to his own back-yard gate, his back gathering ashes at every step, and it was not until outsiders had retired that he sat up and said to Mrs. Bowser:

"Woman, I understand! I know who threw a stick at the horse and jumped me out of the saddle! Hands off! I want no more of your help, and the cook is discharged on the spot. Follow me into the house. I want you to confess in writing to this attempted assassination, and then we will call in the lawyers and settle matters!"

How their V.C.'s were Won.

"THE battle was over, and we had won, but the Death Roll was a heavy one, and Roger Simmons' name was on the list.

"For my own part I had escaped with a bullet wound in my hip, and a graze on my left forearm—bad enough, some people might think, but the Colonel had just been in the hospital, and murmured the magic words 'Recommended for the Victoria Cross' over me, so what did I care for wounds?

"How had I won it, you want to know? Well just this once I will tell, if you give me your solemn promise not to pass it on to any reporter. As you know, my regiment, the Irish Fusiliers, were to charge the enemy whilst Colonel Simmons commanded the Artillery, but, when the word was given to charge, and the Artillery were ordered to protect us by their fire, Colonel Simmons was missing from the head of his Battery.

"No one had time to go and look for him, so the next officer took command. Half way up the hill, there was a little boulder, which I was just dashing past, when I heard a well-known voice close beside me, and turning round in the saddle saw Simmons. He was literally blue with terror, a man who had seen service on the Afghan frontier too. I could not make it out, could he be funking the engagement? As you know, he was the uncle of the girl I am engaged to, so I felt it would be best to say nothing, but invite him to take my horse, as his had evidently run away.

"All this occupied but a moment in the doing, and with a look of gratitude that I shall never forget, the Colonel mounted my charger, and spurred to join his men.

"I sped along on foot at the head of my men, and soon we were in touch with the Boers, when a hand to hand fight began. I had no time to try and see what Simmons was doing, though I felt there was more in his conduct than met the eye, for my men were falling thick and fast, through sheer force of numbers. On and on we went to gain the last ridge and get the enemy's guns silenced, but just as I was stretching out my hand to strike down a Boer who was attacking me, a horse rushed past, and in another instant Simmons had literally swept off the man's head with his sword.

"But his face as he turned round, I shall never forget it, it was filled with a nameless horror, as a man might look if he saw a ghost.

"In the forefront of the strife, he seemed to woo death, but fate is ever fickle and would not listen to his advances, till at last, just as the recall was sounded a bullet found its billet in his lungs.

"I was near him as he fell from the horse, and went to him.

"With a great gasp, he pointed to his chest, and said: 'There you will find the explanation, do not let it be known—I did my duty—farewell, Maxwell.' With another deep sigh, he fell back dead, internal hemorrhage having ensued.

"Thus was ended the career of a man who it seemed earlier in the day was on the point of disgracing his long line of military ancestors, and it was with a feeling of deep curiosity that I took the letter from his breast, and transferred it to my own. It was on the way back that I received my second wound, from a Boer who fired from behind a large boulder.

"It was three days later before I felt equal to reading that document, and then I admit that, soldier though I am, I shed tears over it.

"It seems that the Colonel had an only son, a wild, harum-scarum youth, who three years before had gone out to the gold mines, in the hopes of making his fortune, but instead, had fallen in love with a Boer woman, and married her.

"The last his father had heard of him, was that he intended to fight on his wife's side, and a few minutes before the charge, it had come to his ears that the man in command of the opposing forces, that he was to fight against, was a fellow of the name of Simmons.

"Poor Colonel, he had scribbled these lines, as in the first horror of knowing that he might kill his own son, he had slipped out of camp, and hidden from his regiment, hoping for death from some chance bullet. I suppose the sight of me flying by at the head of my men awoke the soldier to a sense of his duty, and the chance I offered him of regaining his place was eagerly clutched at.

"I have learnt since that it was his son whom he felled, and only after severing his head did the father know the awful truth.

"I know the tale is safe with you, for having a son of your own, you can sympathise."

"Indeed, yes, poor fellow, what an awful predicament to be placed in, no wonder he sought death," replied the chaplain.

"But, Maxwell you have not told me how you won your V.C.?" he continued.

"Oh, that was a very simple affair. You know Trooper Maynard, well the boy is the only son of an old soldier servant of my father's and he has only been out here a week. He was killed by a Boer, who turned round as he was flying after the charge just to empty his rifle, and the shot told on poor Maynard, whom it caught in the chest. The rest of his Company were well in front at the time, having been summoned back by bugle, as the General feared an attack from another quarter.

"I should not have seen him if I had not stooped over Simmons for a minute, and so got left behind, myself. I just flung the poor chap over my shoulder, and was making my way as best I could to regain my men, when that dastardly shot was fired at my leg, with the object I suppose of killing both myself and my burden. I had to shift him to the other shoulder, how, I don't know, fortunately the fellow was unconscious, so the pain that it must otherwise have caused was not felt by him. That's all."

"Bravo Maxwell, I've heard of many plucky things, but for a man to carry another with his left arm wounded, and his thigh more or less shattered, well, I don't know how you managed it."

"It's the hatred of being beaten that did it, I expect, you see if I had dropped my man, I should have done just what the Boer wanted me to, so I set my teeth, and resolved that we would drop together or not at all till we regained our own lines."

The gallant Captain spoke with a faint tremor in his voice, but a twinkle in his eye, that showed the indomitable spirit of the man as he lay there, in what, his friend knew, must be intense pain.

Trooper Maynard was going on well, in fact would be about again far sooner than his rescuer.

The Chaplain did not tell his friend that he was the other man whose name had been mentioned for the same coveted honour.

But the next time he visited Maxwell, he found his friend with reproaches on his lips at his having kept it from him, and congratulations for the cause.

This was what he had been told:

"There was a little drummer boy, only thirteen years of age, and how it happened no one ever knew, but he was left alone in a bare space on the veld, playing the advance on his drum. He seemed bewildered by the noise of the battle, and stood there an easy prey for any bullet. Nor was he left in doubt long, for a shot rang out and the boy fell, whilst the Boers were about to pass just over the spot where he lay.

"Snatching a rifle from a dead hand, the Chaplain who was watching the fight took in his perilous situation, and without stopping to ask permission, bounded across the veld, picked up the child, and made his way back to camp amidst a perfect rain of bullets, none of which did more than tear his clothes."

As he ran into the British lines, a great cheer went up from the men, and from that day onward the Chaplain would find his way to their hearts laid bare they having once seen that his courage was even superior to their own.

There was yet plenty of work to be done, but the example of such heroes as these two had shown themselves, only served to brace up the wills of others to follow in their footsteps, and win if it were possible that small piece of bronze, which is a soldier's most valued reward.

Tommy: "Mamma, why have you got papa's hair in a locket?"

His Mother: "To remind me that he once had some, Tommy."

Little Tompkins (on his dignity): "Marie, I've been a good husband to you all these years, have been patient and have put up with every humiliation, but," fiercely, "the worm has turned at last—you shall not have my son's trousers cut down for me."

"Papa, didn't you whip me once for biting Tommy?"

"Yes, my child, you hurt him so much."

"Well, then, papa, you ought to whip sister's music-master, too, for he bit sister, yesterday, right on the mouth, and I know it hurt her, because she put her arms round his neck, and tried to choke him."

Policeman (on duty in the park): "Excuse me, sir, but isn't that your dog?"

Mr. Portley: "Certainly."

Policeman: "You see what the notice says, 'No dogs allowed in this park.'"

Mr. Portley: "Yes, but that dog can't read; he is very illiterate. Good morning!"

Sue (who has just been asked to play something on the piano): "I really can't play anything."

Tommy: "But, I say, Sue, why don't you play that piece you spoke to me about?"

Sue: "What piece?"

Tommy: "Why that one you told me to ask you to play when we had company, 'cause you know it better'n any of the others. I forget the name."

A PRETTY ROUNDHEAD MAID.

AN EPISODE OF THE CIVIL WAR.

WHEN I say that I have taken part in the wars of a dozen different states and have been involved in the intrigues of at least half that number of rulers, you will understand that my career has been far from an uneventful one. Yet, strange to relate, only once in all my numerous ventures and experiences did I fail to emerge triumphant; and, stranger still, this one rebuff brought me my greatest happiness in life.

'Tis possible I owed my egotistical and reckless nature to my parents having both quitted this earth soon after I had made my appearance on it; however, my bringing up proved my undoing, for I quarrelled with my relatives and left England to wander forth and seek my fortune beneath other skies.

Having but my sword and my wits to support me, 'twas only natural I ended by becoming a soldier of fortune, bareing my blade now in defence of the oppressed, now in favour of the tyrant, as one or the other fanned the flame of my ambition, or aroused my mercenary instincts with visions of possible riches.

Nevertheless, however deeply buried it may have been, loyalty must have found a place in my heart, for otherwise I could not explain my having enlisted in the army of Charles I. of England, for I neither expected to satisfy my avarice, nor humour my vanity by trying to uphold so fickle a monarch. But be this as it may, when the news reached me in the Lowlands of the outbreak of hostilities between the King and the Parliament, I hastened to London and placed myself at his disposal.

He received me with the graciousness he extended to all, and so flattered my self-esteem that I swore no matter what happened, so long as King Charles's standard floated aloft, I would draw my sword beneath no other.

In this hopeless struggle, I seemed to lead a charmed life. Although I was in the thick of the fight everywhere, my injuries were restricted to a few scratches. When the Royalist cause received its death-blow at Marston Moor, my clothes were cut from off my back although I had but two or three slight flesh wounds. I must have presented a sorry appearance on the evening of that memorable day, when, my horse and myself smothered with blood and mire, I endeavoured to make my way to the east coast in the faint hope of getting safely across to Holland.

I have always since come to the conclusion that my ignorance of the country proved my salvation; for except that I must travel towards the east I had no inkling of the road and thus unwittingly avoided the frequented routes.

I had ridden several miles along a narrow lane that followed a tortuous line low down between two ridges of hills, and was dimly wondering if my beast would hold out much longer, when, as I turned a sharp angle, a squat red brick mansion loomed in sight, standing back from the pathway and flanked by a clump of trees.

The building was surrounded by a high wall pierced in front by large iron gates.

I reined in my horse and tried to obtain a better view of the place but the moon rising at the back threw it in shadow.

Dismounting clumsily, for my limbs were stiff with fatigue, I approached the gates to reconnoitre before determining whether to make myself known to the inhabitants.

I was astonished to see no lights in any of the windows, and feared that the house might prove deserted, but, on again peering between the bars of the gate, noticed that the lawn showed signs of recent gardening care.

Leaving my animal to look after itself, I opened the gate, and walked inside. I now saw that one of the ground floor windows was only partly closed.

I was barely six paces from the window when the moonlight gleamed on the barrel of a pistol and a small white hand just within the casement. Astonishment mastered me for an instant, and I stood there gaping like a fool.

An order to remain where I was, given in a feminine voice, recalled me to my senses.

"Madam," said I, whipping off my shabby beaver, "whoever you are I pray you give me a morsel to eat and let me rest awhile, I——"

My speech was cut short by a second command, this time to throw away my sword.

Ever reckless, I hastily unsheathed my blade and sent it flying over the lawn.

"Madam, I have fought half the day and ridden the other half without food," I cried appealingly, approaching the window to get a sight of my interlocutor.

It was instantly slammed to and bolted.

Mad with anger at the trick that I thought had been played upon me, I was about to thrust my scabbard through the glass when I heard the front door being unfastened.

I ran round to the porch to find the door open and a young woman with a lighted candle, on the threshold.

Finger to lip she bade me enter.

I obeyed with alacrity, and found myself in a large square hall adorned with arms and trophies of the hunt. Following my guide, who was enveloped in a hooded cloak, I crossed the hall and proceeded along a corridor evidently leading to the servants' quarters. Everything was in darkness but for the light the maid carried.

She passed into a large kitchen, went to a cupboard and took out some viands and a mug of beer.

She had not yet addressed a word to me and I watched her silently, with, I fear, little thought save for the food she placed before me and which I ate greedily.

While I was eating she pulled a chair up to the table opposite me and, slipping off her cloak, sat down.

When I had somewhat appeased my wolfish craving, I looked up and waited for my hostess to speak.

She was evidently of gentle birth and not one of the domestics of the house as I had at first supposed. Slender and of average height, this fair maid was hardly twenty years of age. She wore a becoming gown of some cream-coloured stuff, the bodice cut low, exposing the shapely throat, white as the string of pearls that clasped it.

With her elbows on the table, and her pretty face supported in the palms of her hands, I thought she made the sweetest picture it had ever been my fortune to behold.

"Since you have satisfied your hunger, sir," she said, "you will perhaps not object to do the same for my curiosity."

"Permit me but one question and I will gladly answer any you may choose to put to me, Madam. Has the King or the Parliament the honour of your favour?"

"I do not meddle with politics, sir, but rumours of an impending conflict reached us and I could not rest. Our house lies off the beaten track and we gladly give food and shelter to any travellers who may stray this way. But these are troublous times and my uncle, with whom I live here, gives his support to the Parliamentary cause. If, as I suppose, you represent his enemies, you must not stay here. Both he and the servants have retired for the night, but at any moment one or the other might awake and come down."

"The rumours that disturbed your sleep, Madam were well founded," I said, grateful for the chances that had thus befriended me; and I told her of the morning's fight and its issue.

"Where have you left your horse?" she suddenly asked, when I had finished speaking.

"In the lane!"

"'Twill never do there; 'twould arouse suspicion should chance bring another this way."

I sprang up, shamed by her forethought, went out, and led the animal to the rear of the building, where I tethered it to a post.

Having obtained permission from her to fetch my sword, I picked it up and crept noiselessly back to the kitchen.

"I have not yet asked you a single question about yourself," she said. "But 'tis no time for idle curiosity. Lie down and sleep awhile, and I will keep watch. Should no one stir, you shall sleep on for three or four hours, and then you must be up and away. 'Tis but a poor bed you will have at best: for I dare not let you quit this room," and she turned to leave.

"Oh! Madam! How can I thank you! What can I say?" I exclaimed, touched to the heart by her kindness.

She did not speak, but inclined her head slightly and passed through the doorway.

I remained for a while standing where she had left me. 'Twas the first time I had been made welcome in the house of a foe and it affected me strangely. The day that had promised well, had proved but the crisis of a series of failures, my spirits had been so low that I cared not what became of me; and now—— But fatigue stifled my thoughts; I wrapped my cloak round me and lay down on the floor and slept.

I was aroused by a gentle tap on the shoulder, and sprang up immediately but was hardly on my feet ere the intense stillness of the night was broken by the sound of horses' hoofs on the hard road.

My pretty companion paled with fright, but did not for an instant lose her self-possession.

"You must away before they reach us," she exclaimed, running to a door at the far end of the room and motioning me to follow. She once more put her finger to her lip and I was about to close the door behind us, when we were again brought suddenly to a halt. This time it was a sound in the house itself. The staircase groaned beneath the weight of heavy footsteps, but my fair guide had all her wits about her.

"'Tis my uncle." She turned, and opened a big closet just behind us. "Inside! You could not get away without his seeing you," and giving me no time to reply she pushed the door to, turning the key which I heard her take out of the lock, and her swift footsteps echoed back from the way we had come.

Not being of a patient disposition I was at first inclined to chafe under this treatment, but my gratitude to my protectress outdid my doubt. I folded my arms and leant against the wall awaiting the development of affairs.

Left thus in the sole company of my own thoughts, for not a sound of any kind reached my hiding place, I had ample opportunity for reflection.

As it was, the workings of my brain were more concerned with my guardian than with the prospects of my own safety. I doubted not for a moment that her mind was occupied on my behalf and that she was exercising her wits to help me.

What kind of a man should I have been? I pondered, if I had always had a creature like that by my side to help me mould my life. A better one? Possibly. A happier one? I thought not, for until then I had been well content with my lot. But had not virtue and happiness something in common? True, some philosophy had it so. Thus my thoughts wandered on.

But a vision of kind eyes disturbed my meditations, the apparition seemed to claim my attention against my will.

My new goaler approached the door of my temporary prison and unlocked it.

"Be still," she whispered. "You cannot yet leave. A dozen Roundheads are in and about the house. They do not appear to be seeking anyone, but they may remain for an hour or so as my uncle is having a meal prepared for them," and she made as if to lock me up again.

"Run you no risk in thus harbouring an enemy?" I asked vehemently.

"They do say there is a reward of one hundred guineas for the person of every Royalist officer, and untold punishment for hiding one," she said, musingly.

I sprang out of the closet with an oath.

"You shall not suffer on my account, madam!"

She laid a restraining hand upon my arm.

Though I guessed she spoke in jest, it angered me that she should trifle with so serious a matter.

Finding I paid no heed to her entreaties she slid down on her knees, clasped my cloak, and besought me not to give myself up.

"On one condition, fair mistress, that you give me a kiss."

When she discovered that I had been playing with her, she rose to her feet, eyes blazing and bosom heaving with indignation.

"'Tis too high a price, sir; you may go."

'Twas now my turn to be confused. Her anger however was short-lived.

"A truce to play-acting, sir. If you value your unworthy skin go back."

Thus was I reincarcerated in the closet.

In about ten minutes she returned.

"They are all at table; come!"

I followed on tip-toe into a yard and round to the right. She had made sure that all the windows looking in this direction had the curtains down. Once safe from observation, I soon found my horse.

Here was fresh proof of my gentle benefactress's care. She had stowed provisions for two or three days in my saddle-bags.

I led the beast out on to the highway at the back of the house, where she accompanied me, giving instructions to enable me to pursue my journey to the coast. When she had finished and it was time to mount, I hesitated.

My life ahead looked so empty and dreary after the last few hours. I could not leave her thus, and, perchance, never set eyes on her again.

"Why do you wait; there is danger in delay?"

"We do not even know each other's names," I said lamely.

"Mine is Margaret Hanworth."

"And mine, madam, Neil Bransome, at your service." In a few words, I told her of my past career and what was before me should I get safely out of England. "But in a while I shall return, and will come back if I may hope for your assistance to start life anew."

"I fear you over-rate my help," she answered, looking on the ground.

"Do not refuse it," I pleaded. "'Tis all the world to me."

She did not reply, but stood fidgeting a stone with her tiny foot.

"Shall I come back a free man and seek the acquaintance of your uncle," I urged. "Say the word, madam, and I will wear your image in my heart of hearts."

"I have already burdened my soul with too many falsehoods on your behalf to care to add to them. Farewell, sir!" she said smiling, and then, without waiting for me to speak, ran back out of sight, turning to wave her hand she disappeared. Something white fell to the ground as she ran. It was her glove.

My heart leaped as I picked up her gage and kissed it fervently. Then I sprang on my horse, and, waving my beaver for joy, flew towards the coast.

CHAPTER XI.

How Sigmund the Skald went over Saddleback Ridge.

I told none of my purpose, but drew all within the house by persuasion, and sang them a saga that was likely to find them food for talk. Then I sought out a house-carle I had once befriended named Norri, and bringing a couple of ponies from the stables, we mounted and rode forth.

I glanced back at the homestead a many times, fearing lest we should be seen and Sweyn should send after us, but all was silent, and presently the sky was overcast and we were safe. We put the ponies to the trot then, but in the face of the gale that swept down upon us it was hard for the animals to keep their pace. If the wind was shrill and cold in the garth it was tenfold shriller and colder as we went up the long hill. It shrieked and howled around us dismally; its chilliness bit us to the bone.

"Whither go we, skald?" asked Norri. "But for your claim on me it would not have been so easy to draw me from the fire to-day."

"I go to Trollfell," said I, "to get the use of Othnar's ship, Long Dragon, so that we may sail in pursuit of Alfdane."

"'Tis a brave thought, but, methinks, a vain one," said Norri. "But why need I go? And look there on Saddleback; it is white with snow, and no horse can get across."

"Leave that to me, Norri," said I. "I have a deed to do to-day."

The carle ceased grumbling openly and we rode on in silence, the gale increasing in rage and coldness ever as we rose. At last we came to a piece of level ground where its full fury burst upon us, and so icy and fierce was its breath that the warm blood in us seemed to burn the cold flesh through which it ran.

The ponies, steaming with exertion, could scarcely stagger across to the shelter of the rock on the farther side of the flat. There we rested them awhile, bringing some slight glow into our hands by violent exercise, then began the hill again. When we came to the top, where the real danger lay, it was rapidly growing dusk.

At the top of the hill, where on a clear day one may look down and see both Raven's-nest and Trollfell with but a turn of the head, the path narrows to a footway, and rises and falls in a double curve like a saddle. This it is that is called Saddleback Ridge.

On the right of the ridge the rock breaks away and goes sheer down to a fork of the fiord, a swallow's flight, and on the left is a treacherous bog that reaches to the margin of an inland lake, from whence, in winter time, a torrent springs. To come at Trollfell from Raven's-nest, except by Saddleback, would mean a journey of at least double length, and always uncertain because of the flushing of the torrent.

And on Saddleback, even in the summer, it is chill, and the white frosts sparkle in the mornings. In winter it glistens with ice and snow of daily-increasing thickness.

I sprang from the pony and looked across. It was white and smooth and hard, and so steep and narrow in the hollow of it that it seemed impossible any man should creep along it let him go as carefully as he might.

"Now here we must turn back," said Norri. "Neither man nor horse may cross Saddleback Ridge when Thrymm's white mantle is cast over it."

"That we will see," said I, binding on my feet a pair of wrestling shoes that I had brought. "Though I have to creep I have a mind to get down to Trollfell to beg Othnar Wolf'sfang's ship that we may rescue Astrid. You will see now, Norri, why I brought you. You will be able to go back and tell them that I have got across, and my purpose, and to be ready at the landing-stage at dawn. I brought the horses to gain time, and you should have no trouble returning with the wind at your back. Waste no more words on your wonder now, but watch."

He cowered behind the nearest rock at my bidding, the ponies standing tail-to-wind, and I walked out on the white ridge. At first I went easily, for there was a lull in the gale, and the surface was level, but when I came to the downward slope, whose roughnesses were coated with ice and held hard snow between them, I had to be more wary.

I stumbled often, and once Norri shouted with fear, thinking I had lost myself, but I got safely to the lowest part of the saddle. I rested there a moment to regain my breath, which was not easy facing that fierce wind, though I was warm now with excitement; then I began the ascent.

The Trollfell side was the worst of the two, and now I caught the full force of the storm, and white flakes began to fall slowly. It was all that I could do to keep foothold, and at last I had to go down and creep stealthily as a cat, rising but a little with each move. And ever as I rose I met a stronger wind, and now it bore keen ice needles and hard snow dust in its mad whirls, pricking my face and blinding me. Yet I thought of Astrid and Einar, and of Bifrost Bridge, that was barred to me unless I kept on, and I went up slowly.

Now I was almost at the top of the rising curve when the weakness that has beset me since I can remember came upon me. It was like a heavy blow on the back, and it unloosed every muscle that I had on the strain. I let go of the rock ahead, and slid back to the cup of the ridge again, and heard Norri's second cry of fear, though to me it was faint and far-off. An instant I hung there despairing, thinking that all men have a time and that mine had come and it was no use striving against the Nornas, and then the spasm passed, and I crept up again.

Once I glanced above, and through the dim hail I thought I saw a gigantic white form beckoning me on. I looked again when I had risen another step, and it was still there, and this time I saw its face distinctly, and knew that it was the ghost of Harald, Einar's father. He was in full armour, and in his right hand, white and vaporous, was the semblance of a long sword. With this he waved me upwards, pointing ever and anon behind him, but his lips were closed firm so that he spoke not at all.

"Othnar's garth is well called Trollfell," said I, "since trolls beckon one to it. But troll or fey I care not so long as it tends to good."

Digitized by Google

Thus saying I went up steadily, as though nerved with fresh strength, keeping myself flat on the slippery rock so that the howling wind could not tear me off, and Harald, still waving his sword, stepped back as I stepped up. At last I came to the top and pulled myself over and went down the further slope, and so was safe upon the mountain side where the path lies easy down to Trollfell.

The ghost vanished suddenly then, and I shouted across to Norri to do what I had told him. He obeyed at once, nothing loth to be stirring, and I made all speed on my way. But there was the strangeness about the troll; that though Norri had been watching me all the time he had seen nothing of it.

It was very dark when I came to Othnar Wolf'sfang's, and his hall was noisy with song and mirth and the crackle of pine logs. Everyone stared when I went in, and Othnar most of all.

"'Tis a queer night for Sigmund the Weak to be afoot," cried he, "yet no man is more welcome here to-night. We have no skald like you in these parts, and my men are in the mind for jolly songs. We sail on Viking path to-morrow with a taut ship and a staunch crew. We are tired of home-staying, and are thinking of being in warmer waters for Yule. But how came you here?"

Now this was news that might be either good or bad, as Hödr willed, but I thought it good.

"As to how I came what matters it," said I, "so long as I come at the right time and to the right place? Though, to be sure, my way of coming will make a short saga for you when I have got some of the cold out of me and some of the ale in."

They took the hint, asking no more questions until I felt ready to answer them, and then I said:

"I came over Saddleback Ridge, alone, to ask a favour from you, Othnar Wolf'sfang, for old Sweyn, who is sorely stricken."

They sat open-mouthed with surprise at that, and Othnar's great tooth was bared to the gums. He bade me say on, and it would be strange if I asked anything he would not grant.

So I told him of Alfdane's coming and going, and of our despair, and how I had fared over Saddleback to ask him for his ship that we might go in pursuit of the traitor.

"It seems that the gods are with me," I said, "for you have the galley ready and the men also, and you will not have far to seek a fight if you want one. It is a neighbour's quarrel and a just."

"So it is, good Sigmund," the men cried, and one said: "And Odin is with you, or you would never have crossed Saddleback, having your weakness. 'Tis more than a strong man would dare this weather. It is a deed—a deed worthy of Valhall."

"In truth, yes," said Othnar slowly. "It was a brave thing to do. But concerning this quarrel I am not so sure. We need the ship ourselves, and it were ill to risk it in a woman's cause. There is no weregild that touches me in this affair. Yet it was a foul deed of Alfdane's, and a brave one of yours, skald."

I saw that he was yet sore because of Astrid, though half-inclined to grant my wish, and when some of his men had spoken in my favour, I said:

"It were ill to risk your ship, Othnar, and it is not my wish since we should but need it to carry us to Tvedestrof or to Strongness, wherever Hardrada may be. But it were also ill for me to have risked my life to-day to no purpose; and also, Othnar, bethink you how Einar fought for you in your hour of necessity. You have no grudge against him, surely, because he has won Astrid?"

He hesitated a moment, but he was good of heart when the need arose, and thought better of his chagrin.

"You are right, skald," said he with a laugh, and then seriously: "To-morrow at dawn the Long Dragon sails as agreed, but we will take up at Raven's-nest as many of Sweyn's men as we can hold, and we will search the seas for the nithings who burn ships and steal women by stealth. Yes, we shall make food for the vultures of Hardrada Hardskull and his crew. And now, skald, sing a merry song, and then all to sleep while we have solid beds under us."

There went up a roar of applause at his words, and I sang as he wished, my heart seeming light by compare with the heavy fear of the morning.

And at sunrise the Long Dragon moved out upon the dark fiord to the rythmic sound of many oars, and soon we were taking up fifty of Sweyn's best champions, and before the day was well begun were sweeping out to sea. But Alfdane had now been gone a whole day.

CHAPTER XII.

THE DOINGS OF ALGAR ERIKSON.

WHEN Algar saw that no effort was being made to recapture him, he struck out for the shore with strong, hopeful strokes. Though it was a long swim, and the sea was rough, he reached land. A fisherman coming down to the water-side saw him stagger up the shingle and fall, and drew him back from the wash of the waves so that his breath and strength might come to him. Then Algar got to his feet and inquired for those of his comrades who were left.

"Why, the house is scarcely astir yet," said the fisherman. "They drank as deep last night as though the twilight of the gods was upon us, and they meant not even the clamour of the fight of Ragnarok to wake them. But your men will come to no harm here, Viking. Borg is a man of peace, and whatever Thora does is not made worse by him."

Now Algar Erikson was no shorter of cunning than of

He was in full armour, and in his right hand, white and vaporous, was the semblance of a long sword.

When it came to Thora's turn Algar barred the way with his sword.

courage, and as he went up to the house he gave much thought to the matter of how best he might rescue Einar. He held himself guilty in having drunk so much, and resolved to leave no artifice untried to undo the mischief his besetting habit had wrought.

Within the house was now much talk and confusion, and old Borg, now that he knew something of the truth, was so angry with Thora that he had bidden her out of his sight. Sullen and defiant she retired to her bower—to look on Einar's sword and to feel wretched because she had sent him to his fate. All were amazed when Algar entered and told his tale, and when he had done some cried out that he was favoured of Rana to have lived so far through the sea. He turned and faced Borg and the household scornfully, having first bidden his men to go towards the great door, and said:

"I am Einar's man, and he and we have done so many deeds that none need marvel at anything more we may achieve. It is well for you, Borg, that Einar is not here with me, or we two alone would wipe out the insult in blood. Is this treatment your usual hospitality to those who have eaten and slept under your roof? Are you a nithing that you let us be attacked in our sleep and dare raise no hand in our aid? Shall I call you Borg the Nithing before all men, and spread the name over all the northlands?"

Borg, already mad with rage, rose to his feet with something of the quickness of youth, and out flashed his blade.

"No man ever came here to call me that who lived to tell the tale!" cried he. "Though I am old I am not that."

"Nay," said Algar, making no move, "I fight not with you, Borg. I did but wish to know how you felt on this matter—I did not say you were a coward. I see now that it grieves you as much as myself, but it is your fey daughter's work, not yours, and one cannot fight with women. Yet because it was done under your roof, Borg, and we were your peaceful guests, you will see that some recompense is needed from you."

To this fair speech Borg could not say nay, and he calmed at once.

"If I can do aught for you and Einar and so rid myself of the taint of treachery it will be well," said he. "Say on with your desire. As to this girl of mine, who has ever been a trouble, it will go hard with her if Einar comes to his death through this. Say on, Algar Erikson."

"It is no light thing that I ask, Borg. You have a good ship at anchor here, which has carried you far in its day. You have also some seventy hale warriors in and about the garth. I have, as you see, thirty, whom the traitors spared. Let me have the ship and the hundred men and I will sail to Tvedestrof and rescue Einar by force."

Now Borg did not like this proposal, nor being made to seem so guilty by a ready agreement, so he answered:

"It is overmuch to ask, friend. The ship has done me good service, and I would fain keep it safe until it rots or I die and my body is carried out to sea in its blazing embrace. And if you take my men away you leave me an easy prey to the first red-hand who sails near. And I am not sure that I need be so hasty in making amends for what was not of my doing."

"That is as you may think, Earl," said Algar, "but time is short if we would do any good. I will leave you a score of warriors, taking fifty only besides my own, and our glory will be the greater. I pray you be wise, Borg, before harm is done."

And his dagger flashed out, and at a sign from him the champions at his back drew sword. There were not more than twenty of the home warriors in the hall, and Borg thought it best to grant the request while he might do so with good grace, so he consented, and bade some set out food for breakfast and others see to the making-ready of the ship, his beloved Garfreda.

Algar and his men ate with zest, feeling full of hope again, for one and all loved Einar as a brother, and the men of Borg's-hold were glad to have the chance of fighting alongside such champions. But though Borg had more beer brought out Algar would have none of it, vowing that never a mouthful would he taste until Einar was once more free.

By noon they were eager to be going, but in overlooking the Garfreda the men found two great leaks which required mending, and with having lain idle so long she must needs be caulked. Algar chafed at the delay, and had it in his mind that Thora was not ignorant of how the Garfreda had come by her leakages, but of this he said nothing, biding his time.

It was past noon of the third day when the figure-head was fixed upon the bow, the shields hung along the sides, and the ship was ready for sea. When Algar and his eighty men were aboard Borg and his wife and Thora came to give a last look at the vessel in case any mishap should cause her to be lost. This Algar had expected and waited for, and, to make it more certain, had even spoken smoothly to Thora that day.

He bade them farewell coldly as they went along the gangway plank, Borg and Svenna going first; but when it came to Thora's turn Algar barred the way with his sword, and two of his men drew in the plank and cut the ropes, and the oars slid out, and the Garfreda was ploughing the water of the open bay. Thora was taken by surprise, and turned fiercely on Algar.

He met her haughty anger with a grim smile, the sword still in his hand, and Thora, looking at it again, saw that it was Einar's own Longsword, which should have been hanging in her bower. And one of the men near held Einar's great axe and the axe-head that Einar had found under the charred embers of his father's house.

"You would trick the wrong men when you would trick Algar Erikson and his friends twice," said Einar's champion. "None of these men will help you, nor are your parents troubled, for they all know my design. It will not do to raise Hardrada's suspicions when first he sights us, but with you on the forecastle he will think we are friends."

So the galley swept out into the tossing sea and the dreary waste of grey waters swallowed her. In due time she lay off Tvedestrof, heaving idly to the ground swell, and the white frost was thick upon her masts and cords and spars. And now the smile was on Thora's face and the anger in Algar's, for they learnt from the shore-folk that Hardrada had not been home since just before last Yule.

A week and more the Garfreda cruised about the inlet, hoping to catch Hardskull unawares, but no ship greeted the gaze of the anxious watchers. Yet one night, unseen, the Eagle passed them, bearing Alfdane the Were-man and Astrid to Strongness.

At last, when Algar was driven to mute despair, a ship came hissing round the north point in the midst of a storm that would have driven most vessels to shelter, and she would have swept on had not those aboard her seen the Garfreda lying at anchor. She altered her course and tacked slowly in, and Algar saw that she was the Long Dragon, Othnar Wolf'sfang's ship.

CHAPTER XIII.

How Astrid Wore the Silver Shoes.

Now the Eagle was a faster ship than the Long Dragon in rough water, and Alfdane reached Strongness, which is two days sail to the south of Tvedestrof, on the evening of the same day that we fell in with Algar at the latter place.

That night there was great rejoicing in Hrolf's house at the success of the were-man's trick, and loud mirth over the story of the burning of the ships. Einar, bound, kept in a small room near the hall, heard their words and their laughter, and Astrid's voice, and writhed in agony because his bonds held so well. For himself he would have endured his fate with a Viking's stern silence, but that Astrid should be near him and in Hardrada's hands was more than he could bear.

He twisted and rolled about on the floor amongst the rushes trying to break the cords, but they held fast, and the talk and laughter went on unabated. He heard them arrange the wedding-feast for the next afternoon, and heard with despairing joy how Astrid pleaded for his life and scorned Hardskull. And when the night came and some of Hrolf's women took her away so that her tongue was stilled to him, Einar tasted the bitterness of an utterly hopeless fear. In the silence and the darkness of the sunless hours came the helpless terror that goads to madness.

The next day there was great stir in Strongness. The huge beacon on the height was replenished ready for firing, and a watchman placed to scan the sea. The men strewed fresh rushes in the hall, brought plentiful store of resinous pine-logs for the fire, great variety of food and drink from the ships. The women laboured in the kitchen over the roasting joints, and the children, encouraged by their elders, wrestled and fought mock duels on the hillside.

But Hardrada Hardskull spoke ever with Astrid, seeking to win her by fair words before he used force. He promised her much, and when his patience was exhausted darkly hinted at his power. At length Astrid lost her patience, too, and turned upon him with disdain before all the house-folk.

"Do you name yourself a Viking, a son of the sea, a Norseman, one of Odin's men?" she asked scathingly. "Rather should you be named niddering, cub of Fenrir, murderer and outlaw. Is it a man's deed to force a defenceless woman into marriage against her will? But I tell you, Hardskull, that I, too, am determined. I shall not come meekly to your bridal chair, and unless you grant me speech with Einar and promise me his life I will do that which will put me out of your power forever—yes, even if I leap into the fire!"

SHORT STORIES ABOUT BIRDS.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "A Millionaire's Daughter," by Percy White, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. A. Hutton, 3 Lapage Street, Bradford. Attempts for this week's prize must deal with FUNNY STORIES ABOUT Plumbers, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, July 16th, Post-cards only, please.

It was a Prize Bird.

AN old Scotchwoman had a reputation far and near for her fine fowls, for which she had often been awarded prizes at the neighbouring shows.

During the Christmas season a gentleman, staying in the neighbourhood, and hearing nothing but praise of her poultry, resolved to give her a trial.

He thereupon sent an order for the finest turkey she could produce, and after a little delay was delighted on receiving as fine and plump a specimen as he could wish for.

His delight, however, was short-lived, for on attempting to carve the bird he found it so tough as to resist all his efforts.

Enraged and chagrined, he sallied forth to find the woman who, he believed, had swindled him.

After listening to his outburst of righteous wrath and indignation, the old Scot exclaimed:

"Hoots, mon! Why, ye canna tell a guid fowl when ye see it. That turkey has ta'en the first prize at the show for the last seven years."

Flying a Pigeon.

A RURAL policeman walking over Romsey Hills early one morning met a man struggling along with a huge clock in his arms.

After passing the man, he observed him carefully set the clock down and look very mysteriously around. This aroused the officer's suspicions. He thereupon walked back up to the man.

"Hello," he inquired. "What's your little game?"

"Oh, it's all right, gaffer," returned the man, "I've come from Stourbridge to fly my blue checker," and so saying he produced the bird from a deep pocket. "My uncle 'as got my watch, so I 'ad to bring the kitchen clock with me to time him. Our Sal 'll look at next door's."

After which the man tossed the bird into the air, picked up his burden, and trudged contentedly home.

Answered.

A PARROT owned by a doctor gave signs of possessing almost human intelligence the other night.

A party of young folks were spending an hour in guessing riddles.

Finally, a little voice asked. "Why does a dog turn round twice before he lies down?"

Before anybody could answer, the parrot croaked: "One good turn deserves another."

It Died a Natural Death.

IT was one Christmas Day in a mining camp that a Chinese cook brought a steaming fowl to the rough plank table.

Instantly my pards sniffed suspiciously.

Seizing the bird, I found that the only treatment it had received prior to being thrown into the pot to boil was to have its feathers indifferently plucked.

"Who killed this fowl?" I roared.

Ah Chin smiled pleasantly, and replied:

"Me no kill him, sah. He died all by himself!"

W. B.

Mr. Bowser as a Cook.

"YES, Mrs. B., as the cook has gone I purpose making the dinner to-day myself. I can roast that brace of pheasants beautifully. You may go into town, as, when you get back, I will have the best dinner ready you ever sat down to."

During Mrs. B.'s absence, Mr. B. overdid the pheasants—in fact, roasted them into a cinder; and when Mrs. B. came home he had buried the remains in the back yard and told her that the cat had eaten the pheasants when he was looking after something else.

"Indeed," said Mrs. B. "The two pheasants weighed two pounds apiece, equals four pounds. Now I weigh the cat. You see, Mr. B., she is exactly four pounds. I suppose" (pointing to the cat) "that is the birds, and if so where's the cat?"

A Gale Blowing.

A CERTAIN lady having bought a parrot of a bird fancier was shocked by certain expressions it used. She took it back, asking to have her money refunded.

The man refused, saying it was quite easy to cure the parrot. He told her the next time the parrot offended her to take it out of the cage, grasp it by the tail, and swing it violently round her head several times.

On reaching home, the bird at once commenced to use a choice selection of language, and the lady proceeded to "take it out" of him.

After swinging the bird round her head till she was tired, she laid the parrot on the table. The bird then got up, and shaking his feathers together, quietly remarked:

"By thunder! What a gale!"

Picked up in the Kitchen.

A PARROT was usually kept in the dining-room, but during the winter was removed to the kitchen for warmth.

When the winter was past it again made its appearance among the family, whom it amused with the new remarks it had picked up in the kitchen.

The first time the bell was rung for something the parrot was heard remarking from his cage:

"Let 'em ring again."

A Smart Bird.

AN Irish hen-woman from a Clydeside village went into the Glasgow dog and bird market to sell a live cock which had unfortunately lost an eye in warfare.

While exposing the bird for sale, a man offered her three shillings for it.

"Be off wid yer," exclaimed Biddy, "three bob for a fowl like that!"

"Well," said the man, "it has only one eye."

"Wan eye, did yer say?" roared Biddy; "can't yer see the intelligent cratur is only giving me the wink not to take yer offer?"

W. T.

Then Polly Spoke.

YOUNG HANKINSON (making a call): "You have had that parrot a long time, Miss Laura."

Miss Laura: "Yes, we have had him several years."

"Quite intelligent, is he not?"

"Very. He can imitate almost anything."

"They have a remarkably clever one over at the Casterlins', Miss Laura. It can imitate the sound of a kiss to perfection. Is that among the accomplishments of our feathered friend in the corner?"

Miss Laura (indignantly): "No, sir, he does not attempt an imitation of a sound he is not accustomed to hear, Mr. Hankinson."

The Parrot: "Wait, George, dear, till I take this bird out of the room."

A. L. B.

Rather Vain.

"Do you knew," said an observant gentleman, "that with the exception of a peacock, I believe a canary bird is the vainest of all creatures? Both my wife and myself are very fond of pets, and we keep several of these little songsters always in the house.

"One of the cages was very old, having been in the family for years, and was used as much for tradition's as for economy's sake.

"I had frequently remarked to my wife that I believed the occupant of this cage was ashamed of his shabby dwelling-place, and observed with envious eyes the fact that the other songsters were more artistically lodged.

"Eventually the old cage collapsed and it became necessary to purchase a new one. In order to test my belief in the intelligence of my feathered friend, I made it a point to get him the prettiest little brass house that I could find.

"The effect was magical. No sooner was he turned into his new house than he began to sing as he had never sung before, completely drowning out the music of the other birds and behaving otherwise in a manner altogether becoming to his sudden rise in life."

M. E. R.

"Have You Been at the Raisins?"

SOME time ago in a country house a servant, while cleaning the parrot's cage, was called away during the operation, and inadvertently left the cage door open.

On the servant's return the parrot was out of its cage helping itself to some raisins.

The servant caught the bird by throwing her apron over it, and pulled out the bird's head feathers during its struggle to free itself, causing the parrot to be quite bald-headed.

A few days later a bald-headed gentleman called at the house, and on entering the room in which the parrot was, was greeted by the bird thus:

"Oh! oh! have you been at the raisins?"

R. H. B.

A Ventriloquial Bird.

A CERTAIN collier possessed a linnet which he always maintained was the "finest warbler and cleverest linnet that ever grew feathers."

"Enter him in a show," said a friend to the proud owner one day.

He acted on the advice, but the wonderful bird was passed over altogether by the judges.

"He can't be so clever as you thought he was, Jack," said the friend.

"Oh, but he is," said Jack, "in fact he's a deal too clever. You see, it's this way, one o' my lads at home is a—what d'ye call 'em—a ventriloquist. Well, that bird's listened to my lad till he can do it just as well as him. At this 'ere contest, instead o' opening his mouth he sung wi' it shut as he 'ad learnt, and the idiots o' judges thowt it wor t'other birds. See?"

Nature and Art.

OLD LADY TO TAXIDERMIST: "You can see for yourself, man. You only stuffed my poor parrot in the summer and here's his feathers tumbling out before your eyes.'

Taxidermist: "Lor' bless ye, 'm, that's the triumph of the art. We stuff 'em that natural that they moults in their proper season."

E. H.

Hard on the Old Lady.

THE crew of a British ship that was cruising off the Norwegian coast had a parrot on board noted for its clever imitation of the human voice.

The hospitable Norwegians were invited to visit the British vessel. Ladies were hoisted on board by means of a chair fastened to a rope running along the yard arm.

Whenever the chair reached the deck the order was given "Let go!"

Mistress Polly had been quietly watching and listening very intently to the whole proceedings, and when the last of the visitors was being boarded, a dignified middle-aged woman, suddenly in a voice that was a capital imitation of the boatswain's, and utterly deceived the sailors, Polly cried out "Let go!" just when the chair was swinging in mid air, and to the dismay of the onlookers, down went the portly old lady into the sea!

Mephistopheles.

THE Franco-German war was just over when I commenced my medical studies in Paris.

I lived in the Rue de l'Ancienne Comédie, which is just at the back of the Odéon Théâtre, in the heart of the Quartier Latin. I lived on the fourth floor—I and M. Magloire.

We were both students—I of medicine, he of the culinary art. Magloire was an enthusiast; so was I. I believe we each of us loved his particular art, as a true artist should, above everything else.

Magloire had begun life as a marmiton, he rose to be a journeyman, he became a sous-chef; and then he came to Paris to carry out the ambition of his life; he came to Paris to study under the great Capilotade—Capilotade, the cook of cooks, the Napoleon of the culinary art. He was ambitious, you see, this M. Magloire, my fellow-lodger.

"The day will come," he would say to me, "when my talent will be recognized. The day will come—ah and you will live to see it, my friend—when every fashionable dish will be accommodated à la Magloire—soup à la Magloire, fish à la Magloire, entrées, pastry, all à la Magloire. The bills of fare of the fashionable restaurants will bristle with plats à la Magloire. Discreet waiters, on being consulted by their habitual customers, the great bon-vivants, will suggest that the latest style is à la Magloire; and the man who intends to dine well will order the artistic masterpiece of his proposed dinner to be confectioned à la Magloire; and he will never, never, never repent that decision. The recipes for those inestimable plats are here," the little man would say with a self-satisfied smile, pointing to his bomb-shell forehead.

But his art was not his only passion; he hated the enemies of his country, the Germans, with a ferocious hatred.

I believe there is nothing that he would have cooked with greater pleasure than Prince Bismarck himself.

"There's nothing good about a German," he would say, "except his enormous appetite and his wonderful digestion."

We lived in adjoining rooms then, M. Magloire and I, and we had a little box of a kitchen, as is frequently the case in French lodging-houses, in common.

I was only too glad to mess with M. Magloire. We lived for next to nothing, but he always gave me a déjeûner of four plats at twelve o'clock.

Magloire had not an enemy in the world, except Mephistopheles, the cat of our landlord, who occupied the first floor.

This Mephistopheles pervaded the house; and he was a past-master in the predatory art.

Mephistopheles was a red cat, a fiend in feline form. The measure of his iniquity was full; he had eaten the canary of Mlle. Lucie, the pretty milliner on the floor above; he had devoured the favourite starling of the wife of the concierge, and, many a time and oft, he had stolen choice morsels from the laboratory of my friend Magloire.

"Magloire," said I to my fellow-lodger one night, as we were consuming a grog au vin in my room. "I've taken a liberty with you; I have invited my friend, Dr. von Wurst, to breakfast to-morrow. I felt certain you wouldn't mind when I gave the invitation; but after I left him, I remembered that he was a Prussian, and, knowing your hatred for Prussians, perhaps I had better take him out to breakfast. Can you lend me five francs, for I am dead broke?"

M. Magloire upset his tumbler over his trousers; what was in the tumbler was hot.

"Doctor," cried M. Magloire, and his eyes sparkled with mingled pain and rage, "when you ask me to cook for the enemy of my country, you insult me. I would cook for the ignorant, for the uncultured, even for the converted cannibal; but for the enemy of my country, never. Farewell, perfidious Englishman, you've hurt my feelings," and he rushed from the room.

I heard him lock himself into his bedroom, and there was a dead silence for full a quarter of an hour.

It was suddenly broken by a confused noise of running about in my fellow-lodger's room.

Then there was the sound of a heavy blow—then a silence.

Five minutes afterwards, there was a rap at my door, and Magloire appeared.

He was very red in the face, and he looked very much ashamed of himself.

"Dr. Labels," he said, "forgive my loss of temper; forgive my apparent rudeness, I have repented; embrace me, my friend. Labels," he cried, hurriedly, "your friend—your Prussian friend—shall not be disappointed. I will do my best for you to-morrow, and for him. You are hard up, my friend, but you still have crédit with the wine merchant. Send in a couple of bottles of wine, then, and look to Magloire for the breakfast; leave that to me. I will provide a breakfast —such a breakfast!—a breakfast that Lucullus himself would not be ashamed to assist at. But I've one stipulation to make," cried the little man: "I will compose a special dish of honour for your friend, the Prussian a 'civet de lapin à la Magloire,' a delicious plat, but you must promise me not to partake of it."

"You're not going to poison him?" I asked.

"Heaven forbid!" cried the disciple of Soyer; "but I know the German taste. I prepare a special dish for him, and there will not be enough for all."

I agreed to the bargain; I thanked Magloire effusively, and we bade each other good-night.

"Don't forget that you're to provide the wine," cried Magloire, as he disappeared.

At ten minutes to twelve the next day I arrived with my friend, Dr. von Wurst, at my humble home in the Quartier Latin.

On the road, I broke it very gently to him that my fellow-lodger was an amateur cook.

Prussians are very proud, you know; they were prouder than usual at that particular epoch.

Dr. von Wurst laughed.

"I don't care how the food's cooked," he said, brutally, "so long as there's plenty to eat."

As we ascended the stairs, a delicious odour assailed our nostrils.

There was Magloire in his Sunday clothes; he looked much more like a Marquess than a cook.

He received Dr. von Wurst with effusion. He bowed, he gesticulated, he smiled—there seemed something treacherous and diabolical about that smile of his; and I noticed that he never shook hands with the Prussian.

The table was decorated with flowers; there was a written menu upon it. It ran as follows.

Snail-Soup à la Trochu.
Pied de Mouton à la Gambetta.
Pigeons à la Franc-tireur.
Civet de lapin à la Magloire.
Confitures Diverses.

I must confess it, Dr. Von Wurst swaggered in an offensive manner; but my friend Magloire bore it bravely. The German was helped twice to snail-soup.

"We didn't live like this during the war," he said, with a great laugh. And then the conversation turned upon cooks and cookery, and the miserable German was guilty of a wretched epigram. "Every man should stick to his trade," he said, with his mouth full of pied de mouton à la Gambetta; "we Germans are soldiers born—haw, haw!—Frenchmen should leave fighting alone, and stick to cookery; the finest of the fine arts; that's where they shine."

M. Magloire made a horrible grimace and helped the doctor liberally to a great plateful of the rich and fragrant stew that he had entitled "civet de lapin à la Magloire."

For full five minutes my German acquaintance did not speak a single word. He ate—how he ate!—silently, enthusiastically, voraciously; and then he held out his plate for more. He picked the bones, he mopped up the rich gravy with his bread, and then he had a third helping, and he finished the entire dishful.

"I never tasted anything like it," he said; and there were tears of gratitude in his eyes.

"I don't suppose you ever did," said M. Magloire, dryly.

"France is avenged," he whispered to me behind his hand.

Then the German gorged himself with confitures and drank a good deal more than his share of the wine.

"I verily believe," said Dr. von Wurst, turning a little pale, as he took his leave, "that I've eaten too much breakfast."

A dreadful thought passed through my mind. Had Magloire poisoned him?

We were alone, and then M. Magloire began to laugh till I thought he had gone mad; my friend the cook must have laughed for five minutes by the clock.

When he left off laughing, I asked him what he meant by his mysterious statement that France was avenged.

"Swear you will never betray me, my friend, and I will tell you."

I gave the required pledge.

"You have not seen Mephistopheles to-day," he said in a whisper, "at least, not to recognise him. Last night," he went on, "last night he died. I slew him—alone and unarmed I did it. Mephistopheles is dead, my friend; and I have buried him—buried him, all except his skin and his head, in a living tomb. The man—the German man with the unpronounceable name, the man who has insulted my country and my noble profession—has swallowed the mortal remains of Mephistopheles; he is now digesting him. I hope it will disagree with him; but I don't think it will. A Prussian medical student, sir, can digest anything, even a tomcat. Hadn't we better have a glass of Chartreuse?"

JOHN TREVELYAN, of Kimberley, was still a young man.

Early in life the young Cornishman had discovered that the prospects offered amid the closed-down mines of his native county afforded little scope for ambition such as his; so he said "Good-bye" to the land of Tre, Pol and Pen, and carved out a name and wealth for himself in South Africa, whither so many of his countrymen had gone before.

That he had been eminently successful, was shown by the fact of his return to his native shores—while still in the prime of life—as John Trevelyan, of Kimberley—John Trevelyan, the South African millionaire—the rival of the Barnatos, and the daring speculator, in whom Africa's uncrowned king had scarcely found an inferior.

And society received him with open arms. Before the powerful lever of his vast wealth, the doors of the most exclusive houses of fashionable London opened wide to him.

Unused to the companionship of women—for he was a bachelor still—he was shy and awkward in their presence. Yet the proud eyes of the Lady Gwendolines or Lady Mauds of society were wont to dwell very kindly upon him.

Though the frank simplicity of his character—out of place as it was amid the artificial surroundings of a London drawing-room—earned for him the barely-concealed sneers of the men, yet every match-making mamma, with a marriageable daughter, found his company singularly refreshing.

Thus, before he had been in town a month John Trevelyan found himself the lion of the season.

The men, who envied him his success, wondered how it all came about, until they knew him better.

Then they realised that behind the shy, nervous manner lay a will of iron, and that it was not brute strength, but a keen intellect and daring courage, which had won him such a mighty share of the treasures of the Rand.

Gradually they recognised that the great blue eyes, set in the broad, good-tempered face, had not the expression of a fool; that the massive head was not a proof of intellectual weakness, but necessary for the holding of the great brain within.

And, too, as his fame spread, a hundred stories of his African career were buzzed about, showing how cleverly he had checkmated Rhodes, or outwitted Beit, often turning his opponent's schemes to his own advantage, in the manipulation of the stock and share markets of Kimberley and Johannesburg. Thus he grew to be recognised as a strong man—a man whom it would be good to have as a friend—bad as an enemy.

Yet in the hands of Lady Mildred Fane, he had seemed but as wax. From their first meeting, the man had been her slave, worshipping mutely, and at a distance, till she gave him the cue to speak. Then, forgetting his humble ancestry, and that she was the daughter of an earl, he had summoned up courage to speak, and gone almost mad with delight at the whispered "Yes!"

Afterwards, when alone and puzzling his soul to discover what the beautiful, high-born woman could see in him—Black Trevelyan as they had called him out yonder, even among the swarthy Africanders—he little realised, poor fellow, how carefully the little scene had been thought out. From the drooping of the white lids, every time his eyes met hers, and the clinging touch of the slender hand, which rested upon his, as he led her towards the paddock, that day at Doncaster, when his horse, Pretoria, bearing her colours, raced in a winner of the Cup, to the moment, when standing by the horse's head, she touched his hand with her lips, in mistake for the soft nose of the noble creature, on which that hand rested.

It was all so delightfully artistic in its unconsciousness—the act itself, the after confusion—that it was little wonder that the man, of a man's world only, was deceived. He forgot the temptation of his vast wealth. That the Earl of Mountford—her father—was poor, miserably poor, he knew well, but that that had, in any way, influenced his daughter's choice, strange to say, he never dreamt. The awakening to him, was therefore, all the more bitter.

It was some time in coming, for his wealth—enabling her to gratify every desire of her shallow, pleasure-loving nature—inspired, for a time, some feelings of gratitude, and kept her true feelings within bounds. It was only when he asked some sort of return, that she betrayed herself. He had asked his sister Mary to pay them a visit. She was some ten years older than he; and, save himself, the last of his race. All the rest, including his old father and mother, whose last years had been made comfortable by his toil, slept in the little church-yard of Portcawl.

Mary still lived alone in the old farmhouse, in which he had been born, and the old folks had died.

He had often enough pressed her to come up to London, but she, shy and home-staying, had as often asked to be excused, her woman's instinct telling her how unwelcome such simple homely folk as she would be to the "grand lady," whom brother John had made his wife, and whom she had never seen.

But brother John had been persistent, and at last, with sore misgivings, she had written to say she would come.

It was after reading to his wife the contents of Mary's letter, that John Trevelyan obtained his first glimpse of the smallness of Lady Mildred's soul.

The news of his sister's coming had made him as excited as a school-boy. They had been very dear to each other, these two, and the prospect of making her known to that other one, who had entered his life, and of whom he was so proud, had filled him with delight. But his wife's first words chilled him.

"Really, John, you ought to have had more sense, than to have asked your sister here, in the height of the season, too," she said, a deep frown settling upon her forehead, and her white teeth gnawing her somewhat thin lips. "You know what a lot of engagements we have, and—" with increasing irritation, as he stood silent before her, "how is it possible we can take her into Society?"

"Where is the difficulty?" he asked, "Society made no objections to receiving me, and"—with a generous disparagement of self—"Mary is a thousand times better and more clever than I."

The lady gave a cynical smile.

"Oh, that is quite different!" she returned, "you were a man, you see, and—and—a man of note."

"Rich man" she was about to say, but checked herself.

He read her thoughts.

"You mean that I was a rich man?" he said bitterly.

"Since you put it bluntly—yes!"

"Ah! It is strange, but that never occurred to me before. But to return to Mary. Then I am to understand that you would be ashamed to be seen about with her, though she is my sister, and I give you my word, that she would do you no discredit."

Though stung to the quick, there was still much of pleading in his tones. She might have undone the harm that was done even then, although she had wounded him in what to a Cornishman is a tender point—his family pride.

Instead, she tried an evasion.

"Not quite that, John! Only it might be unpleasant—for her, I mean."

It sounded what it was—a lie.

"I understand," he said, "and I think perhaps the wisest plan would be for me to run down and spend a week or two at the old place. I dare say," with a sigh, "Mary will be just as well pleased."

"Yes, do!" she returned eagerly, relieved to find the matter so easily arranged. "Eustace Lambert will be in town to-morrow, and he can look after me in your absence."

For a moment his love got the better of his mortification, and he caught her in his arms.

"Won't you come with me, Mildred?" he cried. "Spare me a week or two, out of this gay life of yours, and come down with me to the old home in which I was born."

A little laugh escaped her.

"What? Bury myself alive for a whole fortnight in a Cornish fisher village, just at this time too? Why, John, you must be mad!"

The big West-countryman released her as suddenly as he had taken her to his breast.

"Yes, I must have been mad!" he said. "Quite mad!"

A day or two later a Society journal announced in the same column that John Trevelyan, Esq., of Kimberley, had left town for a short stay at his country seat in Cornwall; and that the Honourable Eustace Lambert—

He had summoned up courage and gone almost mad with delight at the whispered "Yes."

The Cornishman had made himself conspicuous.

attaché to the Embassy at Vienna—had received leave of absence, and returned to England.

It was three weeks later when the millionaire returned.

Finding his wife was attending a reception, he resolved to spend the evening at his club.

It was eight o'clock, and most of the members were at dinner.

The Cornishman had, however, dined en route, so made his way to the reading room, where he buried himself in the pages of a paper.

The room at the time of his entry, was unoccupied, but shortly, two gentlemen entered, and not noticing the man ensconsced in a big arm-chair, continued the conversation upon which they had evidently been engaged before entering.

"So he has not yet returned?" observed the one.

The first speaker gave a long, low whistle.

"Uncommonly confiding chap he must be. I wonder if he knows what spoons she and Lambert used to be? Everyone thought before Lambert went to Vienna that they were going to make a match of it."

Trevelyan gave a cough to apprise the speakers of his presence, but in the rattle of a passing vehicle, it was unheard.

The conversation proceeded.

"Ah! Old Mountford put a stop to that. Not that it would have made much difference either way. Lady Mildred liked the cub well enough, but she knew her value in the matrimonial market, and—and preferred a cheque in payment on the Bank of England, to the Bank of Love."

Three weeks before, and Trevelyan would have risen to his feet and struck the speaker senseless to the floor, but now he kept silent.

"And what a prize Trevelyan was!"

"And how useful to the family! They tell me old Mountford has cleared off the mortgages on his estates——"

"And," interrupted the other meaningly, "Lambert has paid his debts."

"Indeed!" and the speaker laughed softly. "Lucky chap! Wish I'd a pretty cousin with a wealthy husband to take a sisterly interest in me."

"Yes, I think you'd be rather more to be envied than the husband. Poor devil!"

"Poor devil indeed!" and the speakers strolled out.

John Trevelyan sat as if carved in stone, his eyes fixed vacantly upon the glowing embers of the fire, his great brown hands gripping the sides of the chair, till it seemed as if the wood and leather alike must give under the strain.

For some minutes he sat thus in silent thought, then a peculiar smile passed over his face, and he rose suddenly from his chair, and with the air of a man who had come to some great decision, strode out of the club house and away.

The next issue of the Society paper, which had previously announced John Trevelyan's departure from town, gave publicity to his return, and stated furthermore that the millionaire had sailed for South Africa, with the intention of serving in one of the irregular regiments, now being formed at the Cape.

* * * * *

Twelve months had passed.

The Union Jack had replaced the Vierkleur over the Staat Haus of Pretoria.

Once again had the Empire's sons added a glorious—if bloody page to the Empire's history.

But alas! the cost in human life had been heavy, and the tracks of the victors might almost have been retraced by the mounds marking the graves of those who had fallen by the way.

Under one of these raised in the very shadow of the Drakenburgs—lay John Trevelyan of Kimberley; the great mountains which towered above him, forming a fitting monument for the great millionaire who slept below.

The news of his being "killed in action" had not surprised those who had witnessed his conduct on the field—for in an army where bravery was a quality common to the humblest soldier—the Cornishman had made himself conspicuous. Indeed, such was his reckless disregard of danger, that in any other man it would have aroused the suspicion that he courted death.

But in John Trevelyan, upon whom Fortune had smiled so kindly that at forty he was a millionaire, and the husband of the daughter of one of England's proudest peers, and the, perhaps, most beautiful woman of her time, such a supposition was manifestly absurd.

So the great world, who read of his death, spoke of the pity of it, that one to whom life must have been so sweet had been so prematurely cut off.

But so many other "great ones" had met their deaths in the war, that John Trevelyan was soon forgotten.

It was only when, six months later, the rumours of his widow's intended early marriage to her cousin, Eustace Lambert, leaked out, that the interest in the dead millionaire re-awakened.

He was dead, and Lady Mildred and her lover were very, very lucky. And so thought Lady Mildred herself, as she and Eustace Lambert stood one bright, spring morning, at the altar of the fashionable church—St. Ethelred's-in-the-west—for no tender feeling with regard to the dead husband cast a shadow over her path.

The clergyman, who officiated, was one of the most talked of men of his time, for his heroic services in the recent war, in attending the wounded, had made him a popular idol.

A scion of royalty itself had consented to stand as the Hon. Eustace Lambert's best man, while the élite of Society had gathered to witness the ceremony. Could anything be more promising of future happiness.

With the ring upon her finger, beside that other one placed there by the man lying under the African veld, and the last words of the ceremony still ringing in her ears, as she followed the clergyman to the vestry, Lady Mildred thought not.

Not even when the clergyman—leaning over her to direct her signature in the marriage register—gave a start of surprise, as she signed herself for the last time, Mildred Trevelyan, widow, did she have the slightest premonition of evil. And though the question which followed annoyed her, it gave her no inkling of what was to come.

"Pardon me," he said, speaking in a startled tone, "but is it possible that your late husband was the celebrated Mr. Trevelyan of Kimberley, who was killed in South Africa?"

"He was," she replied impatiently, thinking the reference to her late husband at such a time, singularly mal-apropos.

The cheerful face of the cleric, which, a few minutes previously had been wreathed in smiles of congratulation, became troubled.

"Then"—speaking in grave, constrained tones—"I have to confess myself guilty of terrible negligence—my only excuse for which must be, that the effect of a bullet wound in the head, received during the campaign, has caused me frequent lapses of memory. But"—with a glance of sympathy at the bridegroom, and a second, rather less sympathetic, at the bride herself—"perhaps it will be better for me to call upon your lawyers? Possibly the same firm—Strongall and Travers—who, I believe, managed your late husband's affairs, still represent you?"

The lady inclined her head in the affirmative, restraining her mingled curiosity and indignation, under a mask of cold indifference. But her husband had less self control.

"You have some message from the late Mr. Trevelyan, I suppose? You were present at the engagement in which he fell, I believe?"

The clergyman bowed gravely.

"I was!" he said, "John Trevelyan died in my arms. I regret that I have not carried out his instructions sooner, so that Lady Lambert and yourself might have been spared the shock of hearing them now."

A silence fell upon all within the vestry, broken only by the impatient hum of those who awaited the bridal party without.

After what seemed an interminable silence, the clergyman proceeded:

"It was at Klepfontein where the late Mr. Trevelyan fell," he said. "He was dangerously wounded while taking part in a charge of Brabant's Horse, in which, as you are doubtless aware, he held a captaincy. From the first he recognised that his case was hopeless, and when the bearers arrived to carry him to the collecting station, by his own request he was allowed to remain on the field where he had fallen.

"He stated, however, that he wished to see the senior surgeon or myself, as he had something of importance to communicate. But the surgeon was needed elsewhere, by others to whom his services were of some aid, so I hurried to his side. I found him dying fast, but perfectly conscious. Without going into details, the hearing of which would be of a necessity, painful,"—here the speaker looked hard at Lady Mildred—"he communicated to me his wishes with regard to his property—or in other words, made a will."

Lady Mildred smiled superciliously.

"He made that in my favour before leaving England, and the will has already been proved," she said, "so another was quite unnecessary."

"But the second revokes the first, and leaves his sister Mary his sole heiress."

"What!"

The exclamation arose from one and all.

Had a shell exploded in the midst of the party, the consternation could not have been greater.

It was Lady Mildred who first recovered herself.

"But this is mere nonsense," she said. "I shall make his sister an allowance suitable to her position, but I shall certainly not be quixotic enough to give up the fortune, which is rightfully mine, in obedience to the whim of a dying man."

The clergyman shook his head.

"I'm afraid you will have no choice," he replied. "On the battle-field, the spoken will of the dying revokes all others."

Lady Mildred made no reply.

Like one in a painful dream, she placed her arm within that of her husband's, and staggered out of the vestry while the rest of the bridal party followed.

And those who waited without marvelled much what had happened to cast such a gloom on the proceedings.

But by-and-bye the story got wind, and the few who had known the millionaire in Africa, said they were not surprised; no matter how the game went against him, John Trevelyan, of Kimberley, generally managed to win the odd trick.

H. BARTLETT.

"SEE how I can count, mamma," said Kitty.

"There's my right foot. That's one. There's my left foot. That's two. Two and one make three. Three feet make a yard, and I want to go out and play in it."

A PLASTIC WOMAN.

For many nights now he had sat up until midnight simply worrying about her, and trying to see a way by which he might place her, his little ailing wife, in some sheltered nook of the world where only the softest winds blew. He was willing enough to face tempests himself, and to forget even Dot his only child.

The night preceding the day of his death he never undressed at all—through sheer preoccupation of mind and utter weariness.

Upon leaving his office early in the evening he had forgotten his hat, and had to return for it, so deep was he in thought. He neglected to light his pipe, took a wrong tram, and had to walk a long way to another that ran crosswise; and, finally, when he arrived home he sat on the bottom stair just dangling his boot by its lace until Dot spoke.

"Shall you take your boots up with you, or leave them down here?" she asked, and leaning her elbows on her pinafored knees looked eagerly into his disturbed face as she put the question.

"Eh?" he asked absently. Then he drew off his other boot, and dangled that by the lace, too,

The little girl wrinkled her forehead impatiently.

"You're not listening to me, farver," she said, "you're just finking!"

The man started, grasped his two boots firmly, and stood up.

"Come along, Dot," he said. "I'm ready."

He turned towards the staircase, his boots in one hand, and the other outstretched for his small daughter's.

She stooped, and gathered her tiny tan shoes into one hand, and slipped the other into her father's.

Together they went up the wide staircase, pausing at every creak, now and again uttering a whispered "H—s—h!" now and again pressing each other's fingers encouragingly.

They stopped outside a door which stood ajar, and the man peeped into the fire-lit darkness of the room. Under his arm the little girl peeped too. Then they stepped softly into the room together.

In an easy chair beside a slumbering fire a thin, white woman was sitting. The firelight showed the hollows under her eyes and in her cheeks. The man stooped over her and kissed her forehead.

"My poor little sufferer!" he said tenderly.

The little girl possessed herself of a white, blue-veined hand.

"My poor little muvver!" she murmured gently.

The woman moved fretfully, drew away her forehead, drew away her hand.

"Every time that child can manage it she gets into this room," she said. "Send her away."

"Go away, Dot! Go to bed," ordered the man. "Why, good gracious, it's after nine—and you up yet! What's Jane about?"

"What, indeed," sighed his wife. "I can't look after her."

"Of course not," said the young husband in a shocked tone.

The child tip-toed to the door. She had kissed her mother's hand, but only on the landing outside did she remember her father, and then because he was beside her, and speaking to her in his gentle, repressed way.

"My little girl forgot daddy," he said, and lowered his fair head to her fairer one. "She is always forgetting him, isn't she?"

He kissed her, patted her head, and returned to the room. Its heaviness struck him again.

"I suppose the room doesn't seem close to you, darling?" he asked his wife, looking tenderly down to her white, wan face.

"The whole world seems close to me," she answered, and began to sob hysterically—"and you come home at nine o'clock, and——"

"I had so much to do," said the young man eagerly, "and I brought home what I could to do later on to-night."

"And you never even asked me what the doctor said, and——"

"I was coming to that, my queen," he said eagerly. "To tell the truth, I was too anxious. What did he say?"

The woman's sobs stilled gradually.

"He—he was most sympathetic," she said. "I knew it was not nerves, though forty Dr. Prings said it was. And I the sort of woman for nerves?"

"Good gracious, no!" said her husband quickly.

"Dr. Feversham says I am suffering from extreme debility. I'm to have no house-keeping worries—Dot had better go to school; she is six, and very noisy. I'm not to sit reading, or sewing, or practising. In fact, he seems to think I'd better go right away."

Her husband wrinkled up his forehead.

"Well?" she asked.

He touched her head softly.

"I must think of a plan to make my wee bird sing again," he said. "You decide where you would like to go, darling, while I run over these ugly papers. Just decide where—in reason—and I will work the pros and cons."

He pondered over them next day—until he died. His wife had decided to warehouse the furniture, send Dot to boarding school, and spend the summer months in Cornwall.

"When I return," she said, "we can decide whether it would be better to start another home or to live in a hotel. The last is the freer life."

Merely to think of selling his furniture worried him immeasurably; and boarding school for his wee daughter! He wondered vaguely whether in the plan of things he and the child might not live together. She liked him well enough, he knew, although she gave him none of that absorbing love she showered on her mother.

He left his office, wondering and pondering. Afterwards his utter absent-mindedness was referred to in the newspapers, for he drew back a door and stepped forward to a lift that was two floors above his head. The drop was thirty-five feet and his death instantaneous, so that he may verily be said to have been worrying over her unto the very depths of the Great Shadow.

She sold the furniture, sent Dot to boarding school, and went to Cornwall, for the shock of his death laid her low and brought on an attack of "nervous prostration," as was to have been expected, of course.

She married again, eighteen months later. She was still young—twenty-eight—fragile, and girlish-looking. She had not out-lived sentimental words and ways, and her health was still declared to be "only fair." It was a matter of regret to her that her second engagement was so brief. A "brief song" she called it. She was engaged and married in the twinkling of an eye almost. Her second husband was the city manager of a big iron company and always busy.

On the honeymoon (which was limited to a week) she told him that she was breathless from the bustle of being married, and he laughed at her, taking her face between his capacious hands the while.

"I'm sorry in a way for you to have missed all the bridal flummery you women think so much of," he said, "but we hadn't time for it, had we? Moreover, it would have been purchased too dearly—a lot of worry and loss of money and health—and what to gain?"

"What indeed!" she said, and looking into his face the far-away attractions of the loveliest of gowns were as nothing to her—she was still sentimental.

They talked "plans" on the last day of the honeymoon, and the big, strong-limbed bridegroom lay stretched out on the grass, his bride keeping the flies from his face with an improvised fan. Upon her previous honeymoon the positions of bride and bridegroom had been reversed.

"I think I will leave Dot at school," said Dot's mother; "she used to worry me terribly when poor Arthur was alive."

The bridegroom laughed.

"Why, little woman, that would never do," he said. "To begin with, we can't afford the expense of that school for Dot. You must teach her till she's older. It will do you no end of good to go over your A B C again. Then, I don't believe in separating a child from its mother, providing of course the mother's influence is for good."

"And you think mine would be?" asked the woman eagerly.

Even those first and early compliments of his were rare, and longed for by her.

"If I didn't," he said bluntly, "I'd be one of the first to separate the pair of you. Oh, by the way, I've decided for us to live in a house of my own that has fallen vacant. I'll give you a cheque, and you must arrange it as well as it and your woman's wit will let you with furniture."

"Where is the house?" asked his bride, and felt a glow of pride in that this careless big man should intrust the purchasing of his household gods to her.

"A good way out of London, little woman; a good twenty miles. But it's country, and the train service is good and that's the main thing. You won't be lonely, for you'll have your house and Dot and me—enough for any woman to look after. There's a lovely view from the front of the house and a big wood at the back."

* * * * *

It was after they had been in the heart of the country for four months that she had her first ailment—she called it a "return of her debility."

Dot was tender and tip-toed about the house, her little face all puckered up with its old-time anxiety. When her stepfather rushed home at mid-day she held up a warning finger to him as she had done a hundred times to her own father. But the big man only looked at her from under his bushy eyebrows, and said:

"Eh?" absently.

"Poor mother is ill again," said the child. "Come and peep at her. H-s-h!"

But he strode quite noisily to the door indicated, and omitted to take off his boots.

On the sofa in front of the fire, was his wife, so well as he could make out for rugs and wrappings.

"What's the matter?" he asked abruptly.

"A return of her old debility," answered the child softly. Then, catching his look: "She's very bad. She has too much housekeeping worry, and I'm so noisy generally and such a nuisance."

"Fiddle-de-dee," said the man.

He crossed to the sofa.

"What's the matter, Allie?" he asked.

"I really don't know," she whimpered. "I suppose I'm beginning to be run down again."

"Good gracious!" he said, in tremendous disgust. "Are you one of those clockwork women, who 'run down' every now and again, and send their relations stark mad."

A flush ran into her face.

"Oh, no," she said hurriedly. "Oh, no, Jim, there's very rarely anything wrong with me."

"That's a good thing," said the man. "Then it's nerves, or biliousnesss. We'll treat you for the latter. Go and fetch that bottle of fruit salt from the dining-room, Dot, and a tumbler of cold water. Now my good woman, get up and mix yourself a dose, and then go out into the sunshine. Dot too. I've got to catch the first train down to the works."

"But I thought you'd come home," said his wife, her lip drooping.

"Only for papers. I'm worried; the men at the works are threatening a strike."

"Higher wages?" asked his wife.

"Yes, and any amount of privileges which they're not likely to get."

"I'll get you some lunch," said his wife, casting aside her wrappings.

"Well, hurry up, then," said the man carelessly; "I've only half an hour. Call me when it's ready."

He forgot her "debility." He tramped round the room, muttering, and wrinkling his forehead, and striking one hand now and again with the other.

And his wife bustled round the house and in and out of the kitchen. She bent over the fire herself, in spite of her debility, and both she and Dot spoke in rapid whispers, in case loud tones should disturb the master of the house.

And when all was ready, he said, "By heavens, the woman in the kitchen can't cook a chop yet. A woman who can't grill is neither fit for man nor anything else; so sack her."

It was after he had gone that his wife opened the cookery-book, and read the chapter on "Grilling."

"We'll have chops to-day, Dottie," she said. "I'll experiment on us, and then when father wants a chop, I'll say, 'I'll do it myself, if it's to be well done.' That's what he always says, isn't it?"

"Yes," said the child, and heaved a sigh. "What a good man father is, isn't he?"

"The best man on earth," announced the woman. "We shall never be half good enough to live with him, Dot, but we'll try. And, Dot, never tell him again if I've been ill; you see, men don't like women to be ill."

"But my own daddie didn't mind."

"No, but he was different," said her mother, and left the impression that "different" was "inferior."

So into the woman's and the child's heart now entered the desire and determination to "live up to" the man they had come to live with.

They gave him a sort of worshipping love with as strong an admixture of tenderness in it as they dared to introduce. The worship he accepted blindly enough, being, possibly, unaware of it, but the tenderness he would have none of, and only met it with rough neglect and bluntness.

It came to be a rule in the house that all home worries must be kept from him, aches and pains be slurred over, tears be covered with smiles, so long as he was by to see.

At the close of their first year of married life, his wife said smilingly:

"Darling, I was thinking all day of your worries. Couldn't you let them slip, and take a tiny holiday?"

"Eh?" he said absently. "It's what I need, goodness knows, but I can ill afford it."

"Leave that to me," said his wife eagerly, "I've been plotting and planning, and saving. I've enough for you to go to Hastings or Eastbourne for a fortnight."

"But you and Dot?"

"Oh, we'll be all right. To us life is all a flower-garden, but you fight the world."

"True enough," said the man. "Well, you'll have to screw down house expenses a bit. A woman and a child should cost very little. Then I'll go."

"I'll be very saving," said his wife. "Only trust me—and take care of your precious health."

And she kissed Dot joyfully that night, whispering:

"We'll pack him away, won't we? And make him get a bit of brightness into his life. Poor father, who works so hard for mother and Dot!"

. . . THE . . .
BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

IN these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver-plated pencil-cases or ten popular six shilling novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, SHORT STORIES, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by first post on Monday, July 23rd, 1900.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Mrs. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

"HAIR LIKE AN ENGLISH WOMAN."

That is the generally expressed desire of a foreigner. To have hair like an English woman. Hair is a woman's chief adornment, but hair to be nice must have nice treatment. Hair must be stimulated to live.

Continual brushing does this, and nothing else does it as effectually. Our grandmothers, and even our mothers, knew this so well that hair brushing was one of the most important features of their toilet. Half an hour at night and half an hour in the morning were thought none too long a time to devote to this. If this attention cannot be given, recourse must be had to a stimulant, and as a stimulant for the hair there is none so safe and so effective as the discovery of Mr. Geo. R. Sims, called by him "TATCHO," which is the Romany word for "genuine."

GEO. R. SIMS'
HAIR RENEWER
"TATCHO."

"TATCHO" is a brilliant spirituous liquor, the colour of whisky, free from all grease. A sprinkle of a few drops on the scalp and five minutes with the brush daily works marvels with every head of hair, but more especially with those that have not received their quantum of care.

If you value your appearance—and who does not?—get a bottle of "TATCHO" to-day. The result will surprise you and be intensely gratifying.

"TATCHO" will stop the hair falling, and will make it beautiful in texture and double in volume.

"TATCHO" gives vitality to the hair at once, and after a few days of treatment its youthful brightness; and what is more, this vitality and brightness may be retained.

Mrs. BROWN POTTER, whose beautiful hair is the envy of her sex, uses nothing but "TATCHO."

Geo. R. Sims' Hair Renewer, "Tatcho," is obtainable of all perfumers, 2/9 & 5/- per Bottle; or can be had direct in plain wrapper on sending 2/11 or 5/3.

NEW SERIAL STORY.

A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

By WILLIAM WESTALL.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.,

CHAPTER I.

The Starting of the Expedition.

I had read for the twentieth time the letter in which Araminta curtly and coldly renounced our engagement and demanded the return of her presents, and was musing bitterly over her treachery and my disillusion, when the door of my room opened, and John Callier, the famous head waiter of Limmli's Hotel, ushered in Dr. Macfarland of "Ours," a dear old friend who had pulled me through after I was so nearly killed at Waterloo.

"You look hipped, Rufus. What's wrong?" he asked kindly, after we had shaken hands.

"Read that," said I, giving him the letter.

"So, she has given you the sack! Well, I am not surprised. I did not like to say so before, but Miss Somerset's not worthy of you, and the time will come when you will deem yourself very lucky in having got rid of her."

"I daresay; in fact, I almost think so now. All the same, it is a beastly unpleasant thing; lets a man down so, and we shall have it in the papers in a day or two."

"There is no denying the unpleasantness. But you will get over it, Rufus, sooner than you think, and before long we shall hear of your betrothal to some young lady——"

"No you won't," I interrupted. "Once bitten, twice shy. I forswear matrimony for ever. I shall never be engaged again."

"Nonsense! A man with your advantages has no right to remain single. Still young, robust, and good-looking, a soldier who distinguished himself at Waterloo, a country gentleman with five thousand a year and a fine old place. You, the last of your race, too! Surely you won't let the old family die out and the estate pass to some distant relative, perhaps an old maid for whom you don't care a fig. You must marry, Rufus. It is your duty."

"I am in no hurry, Mac, and you may be sure of one thing. I shall not marry a fine lady with a false heart. The girl of my choice must be too unsophisticated to be designing, too sincere to be worldly, too good to be untrue, too——"

"Stop, stop! You want an angel, but being a mortal you will have to put up with something less heavenly."

"I can wait, and meanwhile I shall go abroad. I was looking forward to settling in the old home and taking my place in the county. That dream is at an end. I am no more cut out for a hermit than for a man about town. Besides, a change will do me good."

"Where shall you go?"

"To some wild, out-of-the-way country, the wilder the better, provided one can get sport. Bison hunting on the prairies of the Far West, or lion hunting in Africa would suit me equally well. I think I shall toss up—heads, lions; tails, bisons."

"Would not active service suit you better?"

"Decidedly, if I could get it. But people say there will be no more war in Europe for half a century, and for the sake of Europe I hope they are right. They won't let Bonaparte escape a second time, and, as you know, half the army is being disbanded, and the officers put on half-pay."

"I was not thinking of Europe; I was thinking of America."

"Where there?"

"Columbia. Another British legion is being formed to help the patriots in their heroic struggle for liberty. And it is a good cause, Rufus, the cause of freedom and humanity."

"Columbia! Is not that somewhere in Venezuela?"

"The other way about. Columbia includes Venezuela and New Grenada, and is a vast territory, almost as extensive as all Europe."

"Yes, I believe it is a big country, and, strangely enough, I have a sort of hereditary interest in Venezuela, or, at any rate, in the Spanish Main, and that is about the same thing."

"It is the same thing. Some people think that the Spanish Main means salt water, but it does not, it means dry land. And this hereditary interest, how does it arise?"

"Well, towards the end of Queen Elizabeth's reign, Gilbert Wyvenhoe, my four times great grandfather, joined a band of adventurers who crossed the sea in two barques, and sailed up the Orinoco in quest of the fabled city of Manoa. After several encounters with the Spaniards, they were obliged to abandon their ships, take to the woods, and make a long march inland. Shortly afterwards my ancestor fell ill, and was left in the care of some friendly Indians, who were very good to him, and with whom he lived till he became almost an Indian himself. In the end, however, they helped him to get down to the sea, and he eventually reached England with a whole skin. There is a full account of it all in the muniment room at Wyvenhoe, written by Gilbert himself, together with the names of all his companions. I read it so often when I was a boy that I almost know it off by heart."

"And what became of his companions?"

"Heaven only knows. They either died of hardship and sickness or, more probably, were slaughtered by the Spaniards."

"So that you have no great-love for the Spaniards?"

"Not I, indeed; they are a blood-thirsty race, as I had frequent opportunity of seeing when we were campaigning in Spain, and I should be very glad to lend a hand in driving them out of Venezuela. But how is it to be managed? I must have a commission."

"Of course you must, and one at least a step higher than your present rank in the British Army, and I have little doubt that I can get you a majority."

"If you can do that I am your man. But how?"

"Well, I happen to know Don Luis Mendez, the accredited agent of the Venezuelan Government. He has authority to grant commissions to suitable men, and on my recommendation I am sure he will grant you one, especially if you would not mind advancing £500 for the purchase of military stores, to be repaid with interest."

"Oh, hang the interest! I will make the Venezuelan Republic a present of £500. It is not much for a major's commission, and as my marriage has missed fire, I shall have more money than I need. So we may regard the matter as settled. How soon can I start?"

"A ship is being fitted out, the Campanella, once a French cruiser, which will convey to Margarita a contingent raised by Major Barnish, formerly of the old 131st, you could go with her. She is expected to sail about the twenty-fifth."

"That will give me just time enough to run down to Wyvenhoe Court, arrange my affairs, and say good-bye to my neighbours and friends. I will give you the cheque now, and if you will kindly do the rest——"

"With pleasure, my dear fellow. I shall send the commission to Wyvenhoe, and when you return you will find everything in order."

And then we parted to part again a fortnight later at Gravesend, where I joined the ship, and whither the doctor and a few other friends had come to see me off.

The Campanella, once a French cruiser, was a brig of 500 tons, and carried in her hold sixteen carronades, which were to be brought on deck when we got out to sea. Her commander, Captain Cautley, a brave Irishman, who had served in our Navy, was going out in the hope of obtaining employment under the Venezuelan Government, as he did. He had two hundred troops on board, all of whom had served in the Peninsular War, and were to call at Cork for some two hundred more, all raised, clothed in British uniform and equipped by Major Barnish, who was even a greater enthusiast in the "noble cause of liberty" than Doctor Marfarlane.

On the faith of an undertaking from Don Luis Mendez that the Republic would repay him, with interest, he had put nearly the whole of his fortune into the enterprise. The ship and everything on board had been bought with his money, except some military stores, purchased mostly with my £500.

The major had brought his wife with him, a charming woman several years younger than himself, whose face reminded me of Araminta's, though it showed more character, and she had those sweet Irish eyes, which whether bright with mirth or beaming with love are equally fascinating and equally dangerous.

I had brought with me my old soldier servant, John Ready, a veteran of many campaigns, a fellow full of resource, able to turn his hand to anything and possessing the further qualification of a colloquial knowledge of Spanish, picked up in the Peninsular.

The officers were two captains, Martley and Duckett, and two subalterns, all of whom had seen active service.

At Cork, where we waited a week, the remainder of the contingent came on board, nearly half of whom were in every way equal to those who had embarked in the Thames, but the remainder were a terribly mixed lot and as ignorant of soldiering as so many tailors.

"Never mind," said Barnish, who always made light of difficulties; "we will lick them and the recruits into shape on the voyage."

We had also passengers. At the last moment, when the Blue Peter was flying at the head of our fore-top-gallant mast, there came on board a noble warrior, a portly priest with a rosy face, and a short, broad-set, dark-complexioned man, whose ears were adorned with rings, and whose head was roofed with short black hair, which stood bolt upright, like the bristles on a blacking-brush.

The warrior was long and lanky, his countenance might have served an artist as a model for a caricature of that of the Knight of La Mancha. He sported moustachios, the points of which curled fiercely upwards, and was as gorgeously attired as a French Field-Marshal in full rig, wore high boots and gilt spurs, and, to crown all, carried a birdcage in one hand and led a poodle with the other.

"General Molyneux, of the Venezuelan army, Mr. Conroy, his Excellency's private secretary, and myself, Father Bartrum, his Excellency's private chaplain," announced the priest pompously to the skipper and those of us who happened to be on the poop.

We all bowed profoundly, and Captain Cautley, who, like the rest of us, had much ado to keep his countenance, was about to reply, when Major Barnish appeared.

"Ah! General Molyneux, I presume?" he said. "I am delighted to make your acquaintance, and to have an opportunity of thanking you in person for raising me so fine a contingent, and for all your other kindnesses."

Whereupon the general, having transferred the birdcage to the secretary and the poodle to the priest, shook hands with the major.

"And I, sir, am delighted to make your acquaintance," he answered in a booming bass voice, which, coming from a man so meagre, was rather startling. "Raising recruits for the glorious cause of South American independence has been a work of love for me. They are good men and true, and if you would kindly have them assembled on deck I should like to make the fine fellows a speech. I think they would be encouraged."

"I fear that is not possible just now, general," said Barnish with an amused look at the skipper. "We are just going to sail, the men are below getting their things into shape, the sailors, as you see, are very busy. Otherwise, I should be only too glad to comply with your wish."

"Another time, then. You were good enough to offer me a passage to Venezuela?"

"Certainly," answered the Major politely, albeit with a side glance of dismay; "but as you said nothing further about the matter, we have made no preparations for your reception. All the same, I daresay we can find you quarters."

"That is all I ask, my dear sir, suitable quarters for a gentleman of my rank. Father Bartrum and my private secretary can occupy the same cabin. I am going to Venezuela to confer with my friend, General Bolivar, on the affairs of the Republic, and solicit the command of one of his armies, and if my plans are adopted, as doubtless they will be, we shall make short work of the Spaniards—very short work."

"Of course we shall, but won't you come into my cabin and have some refreshment while your own is being made ready. Will you kindly see to it, Captain Cautley?"

And Major Barnish, followed by the general, the priest with the birdcage, and the secretary with the poodle, disappeared down the main hatchway.

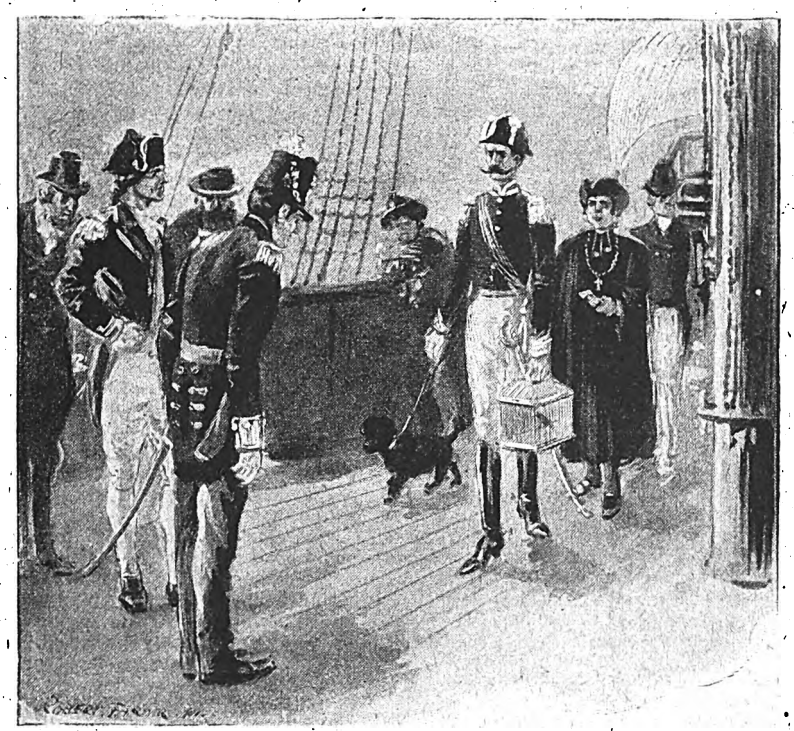
fairly intimate with my brother officers, and especially with Major and Mrs. Barnish, in whose society I spent many pleasant evenings. The amount he had laid out for the Venezuelan Government was greater than I had supposed. Upwards of ten thousand pounds. He had also made himself responsible for the men's pay until they were landed in Venezuela.

CHAPTER II.

RUMOURS OF MUTINY.

WE were now well on our way. The Western Isles had been sighted and passed, the days were delightful, the nights, whether moonlight or starlight, glorious, the winds propitious, the weather perfect, and the Campanella, spreading her white wings to the full, speeded swiftly towards the land where, as many of us believed, we should find fortune and fame.

Yet amid all the beauty of sea and sky, the harmony that apparently prevailed among the officers, both naval and military, and the seeming contentment of the troops, there were not wanting signs which made me at times fear that the voyage might end less towardly than it had begun. From John Ready, who had found some old comrades among the men and saw much of them, I gathered that there was a good deal of simmering discontent in the ranks.



The warrior carried a bird cage in one hand and led a poodle with the other.

The men did not like the drills, guard-mounting, keeping watch, and the rest, having, as it seems, expected they would have nothing much to do until we reached our destination but drink rum and bask in the sun, which did not greatly surprise me. Old soldiers are not precisely angels, and the young ones we had taken on board at Cork were utter riff-raff—gaol birds and worse, some of them, John said, who had left Ireland because they had made it too hot to hold them.

All the greater reason for maintaining a stringent discipline and keeping them well employed, and this, as Barnish left a good deal in my hands, I took care to do.

At the same time I told John to keep his eyes open and report—not tittle-tattle or mere talk, but any facts which he thought it behoved me to know.

Not long afterwards he brought a report that gave me great concern and suggested alarming possibilities.

Somebody had told the men that Major Barnish and his officers had no legal authority over them whatever, and that there was no reason why they should obey orders, undergo drill, submit to punishment, or do aught they did not like to do. Nor was this the worst. Two subalterns, Price and Bryan, who had received their appointments from General Molyneux, were making common cause with the disaffected among the men, and the chief promoter of sedition was his private secretary.

These were grave tidings, and had we been on service and Major Barnish my superior officer, I should have reported them to him without either hesitation or delay. But we were not on active service and he was not my superior officer. I was not even his guest, for when I learnt that he had fitted out and provisioned the Campanella at his own expense I insisted on paying my fare.

He commanded the battalion because he had raised it, I asked for a post because I wanted occupation, and he had made me his acting adjutant because he was not much of an organiser and had no great liking for work.

For these reasons I thought I had a discretion in the matter, and in the exercise of that discretion I decided not to tell Barnish, for the present, what I had heard.

Yet if I had thought the danger imminent, and prompt action necessary, I should have told him. But for the present, at least, I had no apprehension of concerted action amongst the men, much less open mutiny. If Ready's information were correct, they would not make a general move until the malcontents had succeeded in winning over the others.

This would take time, and as every day brought us nearer to our journey's end a day saved was a day gained. Individual acts of insubordination were, however, quite possible, and I expected that on some such occasion the offender would be backed by his comrades when, unless we were well prepared and supported by the main body of the battalion, our authority would end and anarchy begin.

In any event I did not intend to yield without a struggle, and presently found that others were of my way of thinking. For after further reflection I resolved to impart (under a pledge of secrecy) my apprehensions to the three captains, Cautley, Martley and Duckett, which I did one evening in the skipper's room.

"I guessed there was something in the wind from what my boy and the bo'sun told me," said Cautley, as he lighted another cigar.

"And I smelt a rat from what my fellow told me," observed Martley, who had been waiting to hear what the skipper said, before committing himself to an opinion.

"So did I, from what my man told me," echoed Duckett, who always took his cue from Martley.

"Well, now that the matter has been mooted, and we know pretty well how the land lies, what do you think of it all?" I asked, addressing the company in general, but Cautley in particular, who, besides being the skipper, was the oldest man present, though still under thirty and he had sailed the seas since he was thirteen.

"What do I think of it all?" he repeated. "What do I think of it? I think that if you soldier officers cannot keep your men in order we shall be in a dickens of a mess."

"Of course we shall," I answered curtly, for I felt nettled at so inconclusive a reply. "It is for that reason that I have brought the matter to your notice, and being now fully alive to the danger, it behoves us to devise a way of preventing it, if we can, or of meeting it if we cannot."

"Right you are, and the question is: What shall we do to prevent this mutiny from coming off, or, failing therein, crush it when it does come off? What say you, Captain Martley?"

"Find out who are the ringleaders, give each of them a good dose of the cat, and put 'em in irons till we get to Margarita."

"I suppose that is also your opinion, Captain Duckett?"

"It is, sir; it is the conclusion we came to when we first smelt a rat."

"And a very natural conclusion, though, I fear. However, Major Wyvenhoe having heard what his brother officers think, will perhaps give us the benefit of his opinion."

I said that in my opinion flogging would be madness, and that we could not do better than go on exactly as we were doing, getting all the information we possibly could and keeping a sharp look out for the first symptoms of an outbreak, yet acting before the men as though we suspected nothing.

"So as throw them off their guard? So far good. Anything else?"

"The magazine should be guarded. Can you put two of your sailors there?"

"Certainly. Only when all hands are piped on deck you will have to provide substitutes from your soldier men, a good many of whom must still be trustworthy. You should also post a sentry at the spirit room, it will be one of the first objects of attack if your fellows get out of hand. And how about the small arms? They are racked between decks at present, I think, those that are not in store?"

"Yes, and easily accessible as well by night as day."

"That won't do. Keep them in the cuddy. I will tell the carpenter to put up racks for them. I shall easily find an excuse."

"The orders are 'as we were,' then, major?" said Martley rising.

"Yes, the word for the present is wait and watch. If you hear anything particular don't fail to mention it to me or the skipper."

"Of course. Come along Duckett, we are due for that game of whist in Walker's den. Good evening, gentlemen."

"They won't set the Thames on fire, those two," observed Cautley with an amused smile when the two captains were gone.

"Well, they are not men of many words, nor is the little they do say of much value, but they are decent fellows for all that, and may be trusted to keep their word and do their duty, which is a good deal."

"Gad, it's everything. Almost sums up the law and the prophets. If everybody did his duty and kept his word, this would be a better world and we should be spared this bother, which is likely to be more serious than you suspect, major."

"Do you think so? How?"

"Well, if my intelligence be correct, there is a plot afoot to seize the ship."

"By whom?"

"Your soldier men; but the conspiracy is being hatched among the convicts from Cork, as I call them. The others are thinking of nothing more heinous than refusing to be paraded and drilled, and leading an idle life till we get to Margarita; but the Corkers want the ship."

"To what end?"

"That, as yet, is a mystery, and the only thing that makes me doubt the accuracy of my information. I should have thought it would be enough for these fellows to seize the spirit room. If they got the ship I don't see what they could do with her. There is no port into which they could take her without the certainty of being detected and detained by the authorities."

"How do you know that a plot is being hatched? Is it a matter of evidence or inference?"

"Both, or perhaps it would be more right to say my own inference from Carol's evidence."

"That's the boatswain."

"Yes, some time after we called at Cork he spotted among the convicts an old chum of the name of Mellican, though it used to be Flanagan. Carol says he is a fair sample of the bulk, which means, I take it, a frightful ruffian. At first the bo'sun fought shy of him; but hearing or guessing that mischief was brewing, he spoke to me, and I encouraged him to cultivate the fellow's acquaintance. This he has done, and it is from that source I have heard of this plot. Full particulars are as yet to seek; but Mellican, alias Flanagan, has agreed to act as spy—of course, for a consideration—and report to me regularly through Carol."

"So in a day or two you may be able to lay your hand on the culprits?"

"Yes, and though risky, it will perhaps be the best thing to lay them by the heels, quietly and at night. But we should have to tell Barnish first, and I think on the whole we had better."

"There I agree with you. So long as it is a case of suspicion and hearsay we may keep our own council, but if we get positive information it would not be right to keep it from the man whom it most concerns. When will Carol see this fellow again?"

"I am going to see him myself as soon as we can arrange an interview, we are to meet in the bo'sun's cabin to-morrow night, time not yet fixed, but probably during the morning watch."

On which, all having been said that, for the moment, could be said, I went on deck.

It was a superb night. In the purple sky, unflecked by a single cloud, hung a great yellow moon; there was barely enough wind to give the ship steering way; golden-hued wavelets lapped lazily against her sides, and her wake was marked by a long streak of phosphorescent foam. And the pleasantness of the evening was enhanced by music. Some of the buglers had been practising the calls, and presently one of them, an excellent performer, played several lively airs on the key bugle, another followed suit with a clarionet, and when he had done a man with a rich baritone voice gave "Oh, list, ye landsmen, list."

"Quite a musical evening, Major Wyvenhoe," said a low, sweet voice behind me, made all the more melodious by a slight touch of the brogue.

"And a very delightful evening otherwise, Mrs. Barnish," I answered, turning away from the taffrail over which I had been leaning.

"You are right. Nothing could be more delightful, the weather is simply perfect."

"For enjoyment, unquestionably, but I fancy your husband and Captain Cautley would like to be going through the water a little faster. I don't suppose we are making more than two knots an hour."

"The ship is going quite fast enough for me."

"For me, also. I don't think we shall find better quarters ashore."

"How very matter-of-fact you are! I was thinking of separation, not of quarters, of the time now not far off, when I shall have to part with my husband and the kind friends we have made on board the Campanella."

Digitized by Google

"Yes, it will be very sad, and I, for one, shall be very sorry."

"But you are going on a glorious service, to help these brave Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty. Your lives will be full of excitement and glory, while I shall be eating my heart away in solitude and suspense, and nobody will so much as give me a thought, except, perhaps, Alfred—occasionally," and she sighed deeply.

"You are quite mistaken Mrs. Barnish, I am sure we shall all think of you and of the pleasant time we had on board the Campanella. Where do you propose to pass your time while we are campaigning?"

"At Port-of-Spain, Trinidad, which I believe is easily accessible from Margarita. Do you think we shall get there easily?"

"Why not? The first part of the voyage is accomplished, and we shall soon be in the Caribbean sea, which is said to be as calm as a lake—barring hurricanes."

"That is barring a good deal, isn't it?" said Mrs. Barnish, laughing. "I was not thinking of storms and tempests, I was thinking of the danger of being captured, a danger which, as we approach the Main, is more likely to increase than diminish. It must be a danger, or the underwriters would not have refused to insure the ship against capture."

"On the ground that she carries contraband of war?"

"Yes, I believe that was their reason."

"Well, considering that the Campanella's cargo consists almost exclusively of contraband, I fear that if we were boarded and overhauled by a Spanish cruiser, it might be rather awkward."

"For us it would be more than awkward, Major Wyvenhoe. The Campanella carries both my husband's fortune and my dowry. The ship and cargo would be confiscated, and we should be ruined."

"No fear of that, Mrs. Barnish. Captain Cautley is too smart a sailor to let himself be caught, and if it were by any chance to come to a fight it is not the Campanella that would get the worst of it. For the rest, I have not the least doubt that the voyage will end as happily as it has begun."

"I am glad to hear you say so, very glad," quoth the lady earnestly. "True, my husband has said the same; but he is so very sanguine, and laughs at my forebodings. However, you are a man of sober judgment, and I gladly take your word for it that all will be well."

This was putting it rather more strongly than I liked, and I foresaw that when she was informed, as within forty-eight hours she almost certainly would be, of the danger by which we were even then threatened, I should find it difficult to reconcile my assurances with the facts, and she might think I had been intentionally deceiving her. But on the principle of qui s'excuse s'accuse I said no more, and reflected that a great deal may happen in forty-eight hours.

As to which I was quite right, the next day being one of the most eventful of my life. It began with a tragedy so sudden and appalling that even yet, though so many years have gone by, I cannot think of it without a shudder.

CHAPTER III.

THE DEATH OF MAJOR BARNISH.

THE morning was as fair as the evening had been, and a freshening of the breeze made it all the more bracing and enjoyable. When I went on deck the sun had just risen, and the Campanella with a full spread of canvas was sailing swiftly over a rosy sea. On the poop I found the skipper, and we were presently joined by Barnish, Martley, Duckett, and Haines, the senior surgeon.

"The top o' the morning to you," said Barnish merrily, "Begad! I like this. We are getting over the ground at last, Cautley?"

"Yes, sir; this is a great improvement on yesterday."

"Or any other for some time. What is she doing? Five knots?"

"More; six, at least."

"Capital! If this wind holds good, we shall be at Margarita—when?"

"In ten or twelve days."

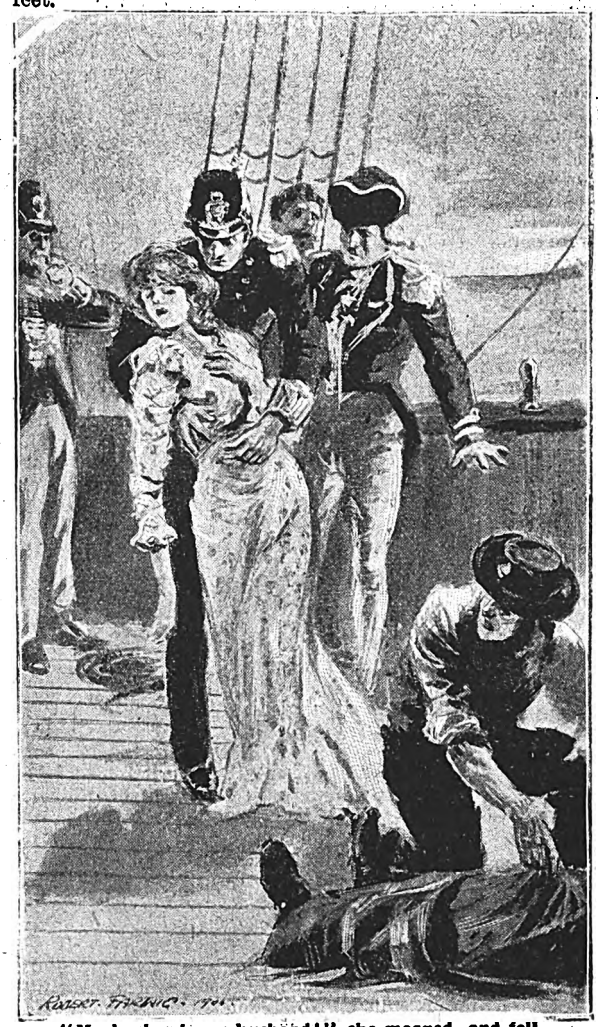
"Good! Make it ten, and I'll give you fellows a champagne breakfast. I say, skipper, get the carronades up; they may come in useful before we get to Margarita."

"It shall be done to-day, sir."

"You are not smoking, Wyvenhoe. Won't you have a whiff?" (offering me his cigar-case.)

"Thank you. I don't generally smoke before eating, but it is impossible to refuse one of your exquisite damas."

I took a cigar, lighted it from the Major's, and was in the act of returning it to him when a piercing cry rang out from aloft, "For Heaven's sake, look out," and at the same moment a great block, let fall by carelessness or mischance, descended on Barnish's head, crushing it like an eggshell, and without a groan or an exclamation he fell dead at our feet.

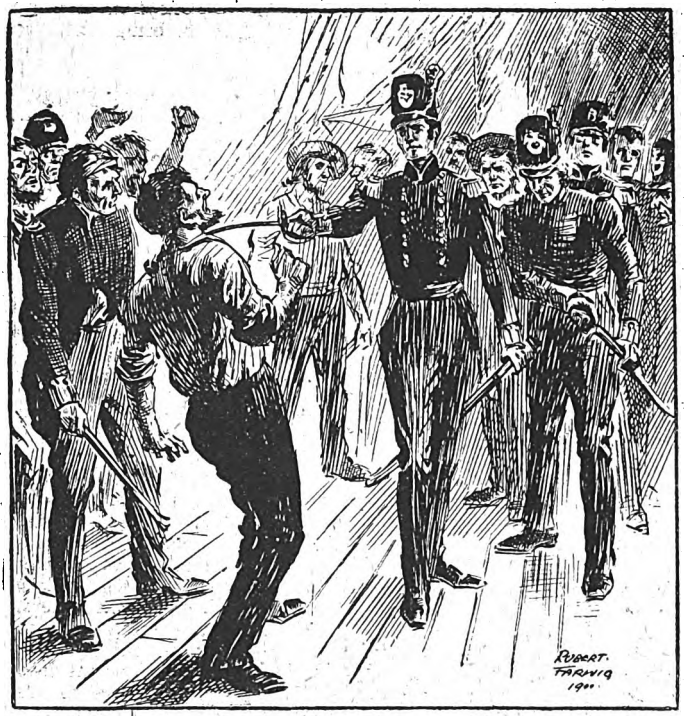


"My husband, my husband!" she moaned, and fell fainting into my arms.

For a few seconds we stood silent and motionless, blanched and paralysed by this sudden extinction of so bright a life.

Doctor Haines was the first to speak.

Digitized by Google



I whipped out my sword and let the fellow have the point in his throat.

"The head is crushed into a shapeless mass, every feature of the face obliterated," he said, stooping. "Let us cover him up and take him away."

At a sign from Cautley two of the sailors brought one of the ship's ensigns and wound it round the body.

"Poor Mrs. Barnish! Who will tell her?" asked Cautley.

Nobody volunteered. As for myself, I would rather have led a forlorn hope.

"Good Heavens! She is there—coming up the companion ladder," exclaimed Haines.

It was only too true, coming as she thought to join her husband, and there would be no possibility of breaking the news gently, or hiding the fatal truth from her until the body could be removed.

The poor woman saw, at a glance that something was wrong. Our faces would have betrayed us, even had there been no other sign.

"What is the matter? Where is Major Barnish? I thought he was with you. I am sure I heard him laughing, and then there was a strange cry——"

"For Heaven's sake don't come this way, madam," said Cautley in a voice hoarse with emotion.

"Why not? I shall. Where is Alfred? What is there under that flag? I insist on knowing," and she was springing forward to raise it when I interposed between her and what had been her husband.

"Don't, for Heaven's sake and your own peace of mind, don't," I entreated. "There has been a terrible accident."

"And Alfred is killed. No, I don't believe it. It is impossible—let me see him, let me see him."

"I dare not. You would never forgive me. His head has been crushed by a falling block, and the sight——"

"My husband, my husband! Heaven help me!" she moaned and fell fainting into my arms.

The skipper and myself carried her to the cabin and left her to the care of her maid. We would gladly have tried to console the poor lady, but knew not what to say, and in the presence of so dire a calamity mere words had been as idle wind. Moreover, it behoved us to take immediate action for the protection of her property and life and our own lives.

The Major's death was the worst thing that could have happened. It left the expedition without a chief and the troops without a commander, for my deputed authority ceased when the chief died. Cautley held his appointment only during Barnish's pleasure, though he would doubtless continue to act, and nobody competent to take his place was likely to dispute his supremacy. But that if I attempted to retain my position I should meet with opposition I had no more doubt than that if I did not retain it the ship would become a floating Hades, whether the men mutinied or not.

The skipper took me aside.

"The crisis has come," he said. "Poor Barnish's death gives the plotters and malcontents a chance they are sure not to miss. I wish to goodness we had a couple of carronades on the quarter-deck. But we must do what we can. The muskets are in the cuddy, and I will have the cutlasses brought aft, you had better treble the guard over the magazine if you can find the right sort of men."

This, with the help of John Ready and a sergeant, who had served in my old regiment, I straightway did.

Meanwhile, the portentous news had spread like wildfire. Most of the officers had gathered aft, groups of men were talking excitedly in the waist and on the forecastle, others moving about, some even making as though they would invade the quarter-deck.

"We must stop this," said Cautley. "Tell the bo'sun to pipe all hands on deck, Mr. Fritt."

Cautley was right. It was time to act, and thinking it would be a great help to have Mrs. Barnish's moral support, yet not liking to leave my post, I asked Dr. Hawkins to see her, inquire how she was, explain to her, if she were in a condition to listen, with how grave an emergency we were confronted, ask whether she would like the voyage to be continued, and the ship to remain under Captain Cautley's command and the troops to be placed under mine, or that of some other officer.

The doctor went at once, and to my surprise, in a few minutes returned with Mrs. Barnish on his arm. Though deathly pale, she stepped firmly and held her head high; only her twitching lips and burning eyes showed how deeply she was moved.

All the men who were aft uncovered.

"Gentlemen," she began, addressing the group on the quarter-deck, "I am come, and Heaven only knows how much the effort has cost me, to say that I should like the ship to proceed to Margarita, exactly as she would have done had this dreadful misfortune not happened. I desire Captain Cautley, who has done so well, to retain command of the ship, and Major Wyvenhoe, who is now the senior military officer on board, to take command of the troops, and I hope, gentlemen, you will all stand by me (here she gave a little gasp) as you would have stood by him."

"Please Heaven, we will," answered Cautley, and few were they who heard her that did not say or feel the same.

"Thank you, oh so much," she said in a broken voice, and then taking Dr. Hawkins's arm, returned to the cabin.

"Pass the word to sound the assembly. To your stations, gentlemen, I ordered."

"Sir, Captain Cautley, I protest against this proceeding," exclaimed Molyneux angrily, who had just come on deck. "I am the senior military officer on board, and by virtue of the rank I hold in the army of the Venezuelan Republic, I claim the right to command the troops."

Digitized by Google

"I don't know anything about your rank in the Venezuelan Army, Mr. Molyneux, but I know that I am the master of this ship, and that you are only a passenger," retorted the skipper, "and by Heaven, sir, if you don't stop your jaw and mind your business I will have you put in irons and locked up."

On which the general fell back; but I was sorry to see that the men were not falling in, and being openly encouraged in their disobedience by several subalterns and non-commissioned officers. The baser part of the Irish contingent were arming themselves with belaying-pins and whatever came handy, and some were flourishing pistols about—how obtained I had no idea.

Just then Ready brought my sword and pistols.

"Is the magazine safe, John?" I asked him.

"Yes, sir. Sergeant York is there with six true men, who will hold the post to the last."

"And we shall hold the ship to the last," said Cautley. "Get our men together and serve out the cutlasses and muskets, Mr. Pritt, and send somebody for my pistols and get your own."

CHAPTER IV.

THE END OF THE MUTINY.

THOUGH most of the troops were in open mutiny and greatly excited, there had been as yet no actual violence, partly, perhaps, because they possessed no more effective weapons than belaying pins, boats' stretchers, marline spikes, knives, and a few pistols. They were also aware that any attempt to seize the ship would be resisted to the last, and that as the sailors and officers on the poop, and in front of the cuddy, were armed to the teeth the attempt might fail, and they did not know, fortunately for us, that we had no ammunition, except for the pistols.

The skipper, not anticipating an immediate outbreak, and thinking that in any event we should have at least a few hours for preparation had sent all the cartridges to the magazine, down in the forehold, whence a supply could not be obtained without the knowledge of the mutineers. Moreover, the mere attempt, by enlightening the mutineers as to our true position would probably encourage them to make an immediate attack, and in a hand to hand conflict we should probably come off second best.

The skipper was very angry with himself, as I thought, needlessly. Nobody could have foreseen poor Barnish's death, and in two or three days our preparations would have been complete.

"I never made such a mistake in my life," quoth Cautley bitterly. "I might have kept a few hundred cartridges within reach, just on the off chance of something happening; however, we must make the best of it. Your plan cannot be carried out, what next? Shall we charge right into the thick of the ruffians and make an end of it one way or another? If they have the advantage of numbers, we have the advantage of weapons, though we do lack cartridges, and I fancy a good many of them would be unwilling combatants."

My plan had been to make an energetic appeal to the mutineers to return to their duty, threatening, if they refused, to fire into them, and in the event of their remaining obdurate, doing so without further warning. We were nearly fifty strong, and having an abundance of muskets, could have given them two volleys in as many minutes, quite enough, as I thought, to bring them to their senses.

But we had no ammunition.

"I shall try my plan, all the same—as far as it will go," I said in answer to Cautley. "They don't know we are without cartridges."

"But you cannot make them hear from the poop, there is too much noise; besides, they won't listen. They would not listen to Martley and the others just now."

"I shall go right amongst them. Some, at least, will listen to reason."

"Alone?"

"John Ready will go with me. He knows a good many of the Englishmen, and may be able to influence them."

"Well, it is, perhaps, the best. A bold course generally is. If you get into a difficulty, we will come to your help. If you fall, avenge you. But keep a sharp look out, or some of those wild Irishmen will be having a knife into you before you know where you are."

With this ominous warning ringing in my ears I went down the companion-ladder, followed by John Ready.

The troops were all over the deck, from the break of the poop to the bows, some haranguing each other, some brandishing belaying pins and boats' stretchers and calling on their comrades to "come on," and behaving so like lunatics that I felt sure they were drunk, while others, mostly the older men, were exchanging views without working themselves into a delirium of excitement.

Rather to my surprise I was neither molested nor insulted perhaps because, though fully aware of the perilous nature of my undertaking, I succeeded in my endeavour not to look afraid.

"Let us make for that group before the mainmast," said

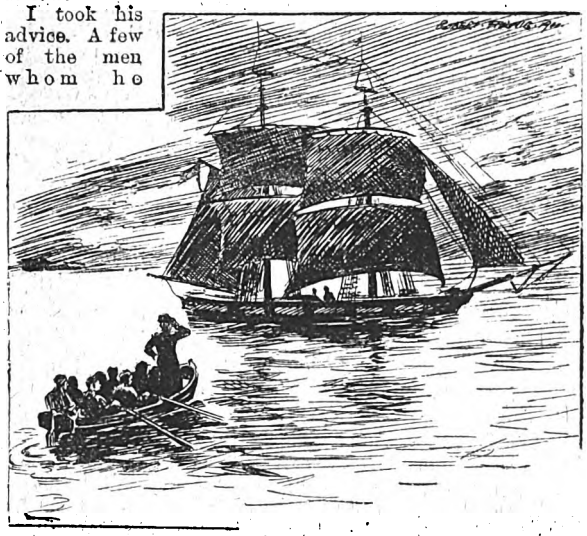
John. "I know them all well, they are good fellows at the bottom, and if we can get them on our side the others will follow."

I took his advice. A few of the men whom he pointed out I knew personally, two had served in my regiment in the Peninsular.



"What ship is that?" demanded the officer in command of the boat.

"What is all this about? I never expected to find you taking part in a mutiny, Higgins," I said to one of them.

"No more I am, Major," answered the man. "Till we are mustered into the Venezuelan service, and take the oath, we are civilians and under no obligation to obey."

"Who says so?"

"They are all saying so, and it stands to reason. A recruit at home does not become a soldier till he has passed the doctor and been sworn in before the beak."

"That may be. But you cannot deny that when you engaged with Major Barnish and took his money, you became his man, and are bound in honour to obey his orders and the orders of those he set over you."

"But you see, sir, the Major being dead, cannot give no orders, and his death breaks the contract, doesn't it? Anyway, we have been told so. Besides, it stands to reason."

I rather thought it did, and feeling that Higgins (who had evidently been well coached) was getting the best of the argument, fell back on sentiment.

"Yes, the Major is dead, most unfortunately for us all, but Mrs. Barnish is alive, and as his representative, claims your obedience, and has undertaken to carry out the contract, and do all he promised to do. If you men refuse to fulfil your part of it, she will be ruined, and I am sure you don't want that."

"Poor lady! No, indeed! We are all very sorry for her and don't want to give her no trouble. But how about that sovereign?"

"What sovereign?"

"Well, the major gave us so much bounty and a kit before we embarked, and promised us a sovereign more when we reached port. Now, are we going to get it?"

"That's it. Are we going to get it?" broke in several of them with great eagerness.

This was news to me, and I doubted Mrs. Barnish's ability to make good this part of her late husband's engagement, for it was hardly to be expected that she would obtain an immediate settlement of her claims on the Venezuelan Government. On the other hand, it was clear that without some satisfactory assurance about "that sovereign" the men would not return to their duty.

"Are we going to get it?" repeated several of them.

"Not unless you behave better and make less noise. I know that Mrs. Barnish means to keep every promise made by her husband, but as you seem to have some doubt about it, I will take this liability on myself. That is to say, I undertake to pay every man of you who returns to his duty one sovereign, or its equivalent in Venezeulan money, within an hour of our arrival in port."

"That is very handsome of you, Major Wyvenhoe, and all we want," returned Higgins respectfully, "and I think you may take it that all the men who embarked in London will accept your offer and return to their duty. Am I right?" (turning to his comrades).

"Right you are, Higgins," answered most of them, and none dissented.

"But I speak only for ourselves," he added, "though I have no doubt a good many of the Irishmen will follow our example. At any rate the best of them will?"

"Oh, will they?" shouted a half-drunken ragamuffin at the edge of the crowd, which had greatly increased during my colloquy with Higgins. "A sovereign apiece when we can have the whole ship. Sure, if the Major is able to give us a sovereign apiece when we reach port he has got the money now, and we can have it for the taking. Hit 'um on the head, boys."

And with that the ruffian thrust himself through the press and aimed a blow at me with a boats' stretcher which, had it not been warded off by John Ready, would have taken effect. Seeing that this was part of a preconcerted movement, I whipped out my sword, and let the fellow have the point in his throat, at the same time calling on the Englishmen to stand by me and close their ranks. While we were talking the blackguard section had got between us and the poop, and on hearing that I had prevailed on some of the rebels to return to their duty, made a desperate effort to disperse my supporters and extinguish me. But the Englishmen responded nobly to my call. Those of them who had no weapons used their belts, and all went at it, hammer and tongs, in a fashion which must have been very like a faction fight at Donnybrook fair. Others, attracted by the row, rushed to the spot, some taking one side, some the other, and the action became general, though many of the combatants had not the least idea what it was all about.

It was a contest with blunt weapons at close quarters, in which weight counted for more than valour, and being the weaker in numbers we were gradually pushed towards the bows, and the mutineers were shouting: "Chuck them overboard, throw them into the water," when a diversion was effected in our favour which turned the tide of battle and eventually gave us the victory.

Cautley, Martley, and the other officers, seeing our danger, and calling on the blue-jackets to follow them, charged, and thanks to the superiority of their weapons and the vigour of their attack, succeeded in joining their strength to ours. Moreover, we were presently reinforced by nearly all the remaining Englishmen, and many of the Irishmen, who, having heard of my offer or perceiving that the game was up, had decided to return to their allegiance.

This gave us the advantage. The mutineers, desperately fighting, were driven aft and there cornered. Not beaten, however, for a summons to surrender called forth only an angry refusal and an outburst of profane swearing, and (as we had emptied our pistols) it seemed as though there was nothing for it but to finish the contest with cold steel and such other weapons as we possessed.

"Very well, we will hold you here until we can get up a lot of cartridges from the magazine, then shoot you like dogs and throw your carcases to the sharks," said Cautley in a voice that could be heard by all.

On this the mutineers began to waver.

"What terms will you give us?" asked one of them.

"The ringleaders, including the subalterns and non-commissioned officers who have been false to their trust will be put in irons, the others confined to the lower deck pending an investigation," answered Cautley, after a word with me.

I thought this was treating them leniently, far more leniently than they deserved, but they did not seem to think so, declaring that unless we granted them a free pardon, without exceptions, they would fight to the last.

"That is impossible," I said.

"Of course it is, we might as well give them the ship," added Cautley. "Well, there is nothing for it but to shoot 'em all. I shall be sorry to do it, but until order is restored, the service of the ship cannot be carried on, and if anything were to happen, all our lives——"

"A sail on the starboard bow!" shouted a sailor from the foretop.

"Gad! I believe she is a man-of-war!" exclaimed Cautley, examining her through his glass. "Now look here, you mutinous rascals. Your attempt to take this vessel was an act of piracy, punishable with death. If that ship is not a man-of-war I never saw one, and unless you submit instantly, I'll bear up to her, have you tried by court-martial right away and hanged."

While the decks were being cleared and matters put to rights the skipper was watching the strange sail, which had been on a course almost parallel with ours, but was now edging towards us.

"A man-of-war beyond a doubt, but, I fear, not a British man-of-war," said he.

"What then?"

"May be a Spaniard, though I hope not."

"But England and Spain are at peace. She would not molest us on the high seas."

"She might board and search us."

"But would that be legal?"

"Well, we stopped and searched neutrals on the high seas in the last war, though I believe it is beginning to be regarded as a violation of international law. But the worst of it is that we are breaking international law by carrying contraband of war and soldiers for service in Venezuela, and if we are taken we shall have to take the consequences."

"One of which would be Mrs. Barnish's ruin."

"None of us would come off with flying colours. At the best, we should be shoved ashore and left to get home—or anywhere else, as we could; at the worst, lodged in some pestiferous gaol till the case was disposed of, which, for most of us, would mean yellow fever and death."

"A pleasant prospect. But cannot we escape?"

"You mean show her a clean pair of heels? I wish we could. But look," handing me his glass, "we have every stitch of canvas spread, while the Spaniard—if she be a Spaniard, as to which I have little doubt—is overhauling us under double-reefed topsails. If we escape, major, it will have to be by stratagem, not by speed. Just let me have another squint. Ah! there goes the blood-red flag of Spain, and she has altered her course a point. The next thing will be a shot across our bows as a hint to heave to. We must take that ship, my friend. There is nothing for it but being taken ourselves, which is out of the question."

This proposal was so astounding and, seemingly, so absurd, that had not Cautley been one of the most pert and clear-headed men I knew I should have deemed him either mad or drunk.

"Take that ship! What on earth are you thinking about? She must have——"

"Thirty guns, judging from the size of her."

"And we have not one, mounted."

"And if we had all our guns mounted we should not be a match for her. I have not men enough both to sail the Campanella and fight her. Besides, they have had no training, and yours would be of no use except for boarding."

"How the dickens do you propose to take this Spaniard, then?"

"By stratagem."

"And what will you do with her when you have got her?"

"Leave her. But listen; time presses, we have not a minute to lose."

When the skipper had explained his plan, to which I gave my cordial assent, I passed the word to sound the assembly, and in a few minutes all the troops, except the few who were unfit for duty and the mutineers, had come on deck and fallen in.

"Now, men, you have an opportunity of atoning for your misconduct, also of doing yourselves and everybody on board a good turn," I began. "That man-of-war is a Spanish ship, Captain Cautley thinks from her ways that she is going to overhaul us, and as she is faster than the Campanella we cannot shake her off, and having no guns we cannot fight her, even if it were desirable to do so, which for several good reasons it is not. On the other hand, if the Spanish captain makes us heave to, boards us, examines our papers and searches the ship, he will find that we are carrying contraband of war, and we shall be made prisoners, taken Heaven knows where, and put in gaol, perhaps worse.

"As soon as you are dismissed you will go below and receive your arms; the boarding-party cutlasses and pistols, the reserve muskets. For the rest, you must obey your officers' orders, to whom I shall presently give full instructions, to the letter. But there are two things I want particularly to impress on you. Until the signal is given not a man, officer or private, must come on deck without a direct order from me, and after the order is given for silence not a word must be spoken. This is of the utmost importance, for some of the Spaniards are almost sure to board us, and if they suspect that we have troops on board all our trouble will go for nothing, and we shall either have to surrender or be blown out of the water.

"Captain Cautley will find a pretext to lay the Campanella alongside the Spanish ship, and the signal for boarding will be the bo'sun's whistle 'all hands,' and as the Spaniards are not likely to be either armed or prepared we shall have no difficulty in mastering them. Threaten as much as you like, but use neither your cutlasses nor pistols except strictly in self-defence. Great Britain and Spain are at peace, and we are under the British flag. All we want is to restrain the Spaniards while the bluejackets make it impossible for them to molest us. To do more would be piracy, which is a hanging matter. Now you can fall out."

After a few words with my officers I went below and entered my instructions in the order book.

Then I went on deck again.

The man-of-war was bearing up to us.

"Didn't I tell you so?" exclaimed Cautley as a shot flew across our bows. "The order to heave-to. I shall obey, of course."

The man-of-war also hove-to, and presently a boat was lowered. I had already passed the word for silence, and told the officers to enforce it by every means in their power.

"You must stand by me to interpret," said the skipper. "I know a few words of Spanish but not enough to hold a conversation."

"What ship is that?" demanded the officer in command of the boat when he came within hail.

"The Campanella, of London, bound for Port of Spain," I answered for Cautley, Port of Spain being our alternative destination.

"I should like to come on board."

"Come by all means. Captain Cautley will be delighted to make your acquaintance."

The quarter-ladder was lowered and the officer mounted the ship's side. Others were preparing to follow him, when Cautley intervened.

"Only one, if you please. I am not going to have a whole boat's crew on board my ship. Well, Señor, what can I have the pleasure of doing for you? But you will, perhaps, kindly tell me the name of your ship and your own."

"Con mucho gusto. My ship is the Dulcinea, of the Royal Spanish Navy, and I am Guzman Zambrun, her first-lieutenant. Now be good enough to tell me of what consists your cargo."

"Hardware and sundries."

"You are pleased to say so. But it is not enough. I must see your papers."

"What for?"

"In order that I may ascertain whether you are carrying contraband of war. I also require to inspect your cargo."

"By what right?"

"The right of search. But I am not here to bandy words. I am here by command of my captain, Señor Don Pablo Blanco, with orders from him to examine your papers and inspect your cargo."

"Will you kindly tell Señor Don Pablo Blanco that I respectfully decline to allow you to do either the one or the other."

"I shall convey your message, of course, but Don Pablo is a very resolute gentleman, and you are under our guns."

"You will fire on us at your peril. We are not in Spanish waters, and you cannot blockade the ocean."

"I have no more to say, Señor Capitan, except that if you attempt to make sail Don Pablo will most certainly fire on you."

The lieutenant made his bow, turned on his heel, and was going over the side when Cautley, as though the idea had only just occurred to him, said, or rather I said for him (the comedy having previously been rehearsed):

"One word, Señor Teniente. I don't want to give you unnecessary trouble, and if you have no objection I will lay my ship alongside yours and have a few words with Don Pablo. I cannot admit his right to search me, but I might receive him as a guest, and, as a concession to him personally, allow him and yourself to see my papers and look round the ship."

"That is all we want," exclaimed the lieutenant eagerly. "I am greatly obliged for your courtesy, and I have not the least doubt that Don Pablo will accept your proposition, in which case we shall hoist the British ensign as a token of assent."

As soon as the Spaniards were well away, I ordered fifty men to come on deck and lie close to the bulwarks.

Five minutes after the lieutenant put his foot on the Dulcinea's deck the Union Jack was flying over her stern, whereupon the Campanella, which had the weather gage, bore down on her and brought to under her counter.

The Spaniards threw ropes, and, as they were being made fast to, the boatswain, at a sign from the captain, whistled "all hands," and in almost less time than it takes to tell, three hundred men swarmed on deck, and led by Cautley, myself, and the fifty who had been hidden, sprang over the Dulcinea's bulwarks.

The Spaniards, unarmed, unprepared, and outnumbered, offered hardly any resistance. Some of them ran to the capstan to get cutlasses, but this having been foreseen, our fellows were there before them. Others went below, for arms, on which we battened down the hatches.

All was going on well, our men, as they had been ordered, used no more violence than was absolutely necessary, and the Spaniards were being driven aft like a flock of sheep, when General Molyneux appeared, flourishing his sword and crying "Death to the Spaniards!" and ran an unfortunate sailor from back to breast, killing him instantly.

Señor Don Pablo Blanco and his first-lieutenant were very indignant, accused us of treachery, and threatened to have us hanged for piracy.

"You will have to catch us first," I said. "If you had not meddled with us we should not have meddled with you, and we are neither going to hurt you nor rob you, only to put the Dulcinea in such a condition as to prevent you from making sail before sunset."

"You mean that you will disable my ship. How can you do that without hurting us?" retorted Don Pablo fiercely. "If bad weather comes on it may cost us our lives. And what do you call killing defenceless men? I call it murder."

"So do I, and we regret the occurrence exceedingly," I answered, after a word aside with Cautley. "We cannot restore the poor fellow to life, but we will leave the perpetrator of the outrage to be dealt with as you think fit."

"I do not thank you, Señor, because it is the least you can do. The ruffian shall be treated as he deserves. I only wish I had it in my power to treat you all as you deserve."

When General Molyneux found that he was going to be left behind he made a great uproar, cursing and praying in turn, and struggling desperately with the Spanish sailors who, heedless of his cries, carried him below.

"Did you ever see a man hanged?" asked Cautley.

"Never."

"Well, if you take my glass and keep an eye on the Dulcinea, I think you will presently see somebody you know strung up to the fore yard-arm, and he will be rightly served."

"Yes, killing that Spanish sailor was sheer murder."

"And may get us into trouble later on. Nor is that all. Now that he is gone, and the mutineers are laid by the heels, we shall learn all about the plot, and unless I am mistaken—— But I won't move in the matter until after the funeral. The carpenter is making a coffin, and to-night we shall consign poor Barnish to his watery grave."

"Won't that be rather soon?"

"Not for these latitudes. The weather is very warm, and below it is very close, and sailors don't like having a dead body on board; they think it brings bad luck."

Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XV.—HE PUTS IN TWO HOURS' WORK WITH A NEIGHBOUR'S BOY.

It had been arranged that Mrs. Bowser and the lady next door should attend a sewing meeting in the evening and that the lady's four-year-old son should be the guest of Mr. Bowser and the cat for a couple of hours. The little fellow looked round in a dubious way as he was brought over, but fell asleep before the ladies got away and was tucked up on the couch.

"Don't you worry in the slightest," said Mr. Bowser to the mother. "If he happens to wake up, I'll do everything to amuse him. I always loved children, and they have always taken to me. Bless his little heart, but I wish he hadn't fallen asleep."

Five minutes later the front door closed on his mother and the boy awoke. He didn't awake with the languid gentleness of a rabbit, but all of a sudden he sat up with a howl of affright. The howls ran through all the terrace before Mr. Bowser could realise the situation, and the family cat, which had been prowling round the room, made a dive for the hall and appeared totally panic-stricken.

* * * * *

During the next ten minutes Mr. Bowser tried hard to be a mother to that boy. He drummed on the piano, knocked on the window and jumped about the room. He handed over his watch, his pocket-book, his keys and his knife. He ran to the kitchen for sugar, tea, coffee, starch and baking powder. Anything and everything was at the disposal of that boy until he ceased to howl and sob.

"Me want story," he said as he dug the tears out of his eyes with his fists.

Thereupon Mr. Bowser told him the following story:

"Once upon a time there was a bobtailed dog. He was spotted. He was three years old. He loved bones and meat and oysters and ice cream. He had no mother or father, but was not a dog to do wicked things. He didn't swear or smoke or drink, and he didn't tell stories. There were dogs who wanted to fight with him, but he would not fight. When they came round and said they could knock his eyebrows off and roll him in the mud, he jumped over the fence and ran away. Well, things went on this way for a long time, and then—and then——"

* * * * *

And then the boy began howling because there was no more bobtailed dog. Mr. Bowser got the cat in, but the howls continued; then he got down on hands and knees and said he was a horse, but that wouldn't work. He got out a book with pictures, sang "Rock-a-bye Baby" and whistled "Rule Britannia," and after ten minutes' work thrown away he was greeted with that same tearful remark:

"Me want story!"

Thereupon Mr. Bowser, who had spoilt his collar and burst the buttons off his waistcoat with his exertions, sat down and began:

"There was once a bear. He went round looking for boys who cried. (Howls of fear from the boy.) No, I mean he went round looking for girls on roller skates. This bear lived in the woods, and he was not afraid of either man or guns. Whenever he caught a boy—(Howls.) I mean, whenever he caught a girl he would carry her off to his den and eat her up at two mouthfuls. In one year that bear ate up ten thousand girls. One day when there were no girls about and he was very hungry he thought he would eat a boy. (Awful howls.) Hold on, now! I'm going to tell you how the boy killed the bear. You see——"

The boy woke with a howl of affright.

Digitized by Google

But the boy refused to see. He'd heard bear stories before, and he knew that there was something wrong somewhere.

He sat up and howled, and he lay down and howled, and the cat fled in terror, and Mr. Bowser felt chills go up his back.

There was more lively drumming on the piano, more wild gallops round the room, more singing and whistling. Exercise in gymnasium couldn't compare with it, but there were only two ways to stop that howling. The boy must be either choked to death or hear another story.

Mr. Bowser wasn't quite ready yet to do murder, and so he gaspingly began:

"Well, you know, there was once a boy named Willie Scott. (The howls ceased.) He had a goat. It was a black goat. You've seen a goat, of course. He has horns and climbs over fences. This goat loved the boy because he was so kind to it. Some boys would hit a goat with a crowbar if they got angry, but Willie never even struck his goat with a stick. If ever you get a goat and want him to love you, don't abuse him. A goat has feelings as well as a boy. Well, one day Willie and his goat were out on the footpath, and along came a lion. The lion was hungry and wanted to eat the boy up. The boy began to cry, but the goat said to him——Let's see. What did the goat say? I don't remember just what he said, but—but——"

He had just got him under his arm.

* * * * *

There was no finish, and there were howls and sobs and lamentations from the kid on the sofa. He wanted to know whether the goat ate up the lion or the lion ate up the boy, and Mr. Bowser had left it all a mystery.

He was picked up and danced round the room, but he added kicks to his howls. He was carried up stairs and down stairs, but he would not be quiet. There came half-formed ideas of throwing him out of a back window or chucking him into the coal bin, but he was at length returned to the sofa.

* * * * *

Then Mr. Bowser said about forty swear words to himself and began:

"You know that a boy should always mind what his father and mother tell him. (Howls cease.) If he doesn't, then he is a bad boy and something will happen to him. I once knew a boy whose name was Sammy. He was about as old as you are and about as naughty. One day he wanted to throw the clock out of the window, but his mother said: 'Sammy, don't do that. If you do, a wolf will come and eat you up.' What did that boy do? He waited until his mother went out shopping, and then he threw the clock out. He didn't believe that a wolf would come, but that same afternoon, when he was playing in the back yard, a great big wolf, with eyes as big as teacups and a tail ten feet long, jumped over the back fence and growled and growled, and the boy screamed for his mother, and the wolf showed his teeth, and—and—well, that's all."

But it wasn't. That wolf either ate that boy up or he didn't, and the youngster on the sofa wanted to know.

He began howling with redoubled vigour, and Mr. Bowser determined on his death. He wouldn't kill him in the house, but he would take him to the river and throw him in.

He had just picked the howler up and got him under his arm, and the cat was looking on with great satisfaction, when the ladies returned and the murder was prevented.

* * * * *

"Woman," said Mr. Bowser after the mother of the child had departed with him in her arms, "the law will probably allow you alimony!"

"But what for?" she asked.

"Separation!" he hoarsely replied. "The limit has been reached. My lawyer will serve the papers on your lawyer to-morrow, and you can go home to your mother by the ten o'clock train."

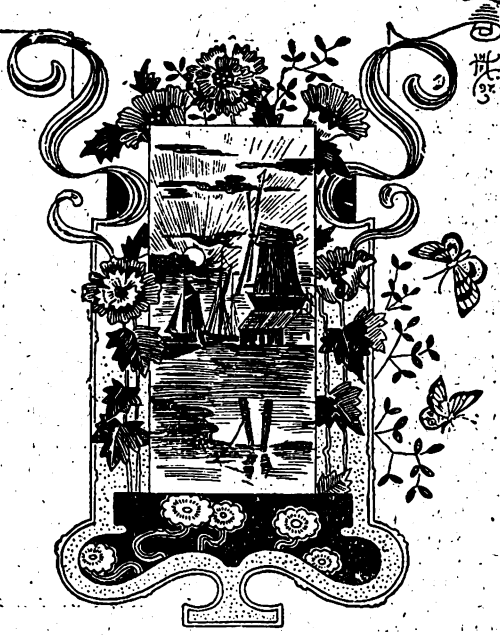
A QUIET GAME.



"WHAT place is that?"

The question was asked by a man on the deck of a steamboat plying on a Canadian river. It was evident from his dress that he was a well-to-do farmer, and it was equally clear from his question that he was not at home in those parts. The inquiry was made of one of the two passengers who had come on board the boat at the landing place from which they were just departing.

"Kerry's Landing," replied the man to whom the question had been put. "An excellent place—to keep away from. Very little more than swamp about there."

Both he and his companion, who was of much lighter build and clean-shaven, wore big slouch hats which obscured the upper half of their face. There was nothing particularly striking about them, nothing to distinguish them from any other of the heterogeneous freight which such boats usually carry.

"It doesn't seem to be a very lively spot," assented the farmer with a slight shiver. "It's chilly now and I think I'll go below. I shouldn't care to settle about here—very little business to be done I should think."

"Business of a kind can be done even there," chimed in the second stranger. "But I vote we go below and have a game of cards—there's sure to be something of that kind going on."

"I'm told that a lot of gambling goes on in these boats; and not only here, but in other parts," said the farmer, as all three made their way below.

As the bigger of the two new passengers threw open the door, a cloud of tobacco smoke came full in their faces and made the farmer cough.

"Rather cloudy in there, Bill," he said to his companion with a dry laugh. "Come in, friend," he added, addressing the farmer.

"Come in, gentlemen, come in!" called a voice. "Come in! Now that you've let out some of the smoke there'll be room for you to get in."

For choice, the famer would have probably remained outside, but his curiosity was too strong, and he entered with the other two.

They found about a dozen men seated at a table, playing cards. There was money on the table, and enough excitement on the faces of the players to denote that the game was not for "love."

"We'll ask you to join us when we begin the next game, gentlemen," said the man who had invited them to enter. "I want another card," he continued, turning to the dealer.

"Right you are, captain," was the reply. And the game continued.

The three new-comers took up positions at different parts of the long table to watch the game and listen to the conversation. The players continued both in the same free and easy style, taking no notice of the new arrivals. The money on the table changed hands in a way that excited the farmer, but the other two appeared to be unmoved,

"What's the row I heard about just before we came on board?" asked the man who had been styled "Captain."

"Some fellow named Frank had killed two men, they told me. Who is this Frank?"

"I've never seen him," answered one of the players; "but I've heard a good deal about him. Seems to be a very clever player with the cards, and has got into one or two scrapes for clearing the whole table."

"Cheating?"

"He has never been caught at it. He appears to have the biggest kind of luck at it and wins a good pile every time he sits down to a game, but it seems to me all straight. Must be as cute as——"

"Just so," agreed the captain. "But what about this killing affair?"

"Steamboat Frank—that's what they call him because he made two or three good hauls on the boats in different parts—killed two of them right off without winking, and would have settled the third if he hadn't cleared out."

"Tell us the yarn," requested the captain, his request being backed by a chorus of approving murmurs.

"Frank had settled down there for about six months, and was earning a living at general dealing, with card playing to fill up the time. One or two of them didn't like him—I heard from an outsider that it was on account of his being too sharp, and getting ahead of them in the dealer business—so they tried to upset him.

"Frank is about as smart as they make 'em. He is a strong fellow and very quick-witted, and just as ready with his revolver as he is with his wits. He is as straight as a die, they tell me; and many people believe that, although they can't account for his extra good fortune when he handles the cards."

"He isn't the only one who has a run of luck at times," interrupted one of the players sagely.

"I take your money? captain," broke in a voice with a decided French accent.

And one of the players took in a goodly pile of Canadian currency.

"Whenever anyone tries to make things uncomfortable for Steamboat Frank," continued the narrator, "he raises trouble. Frank doesn't let things stand still; he gets to work at once and makes as much of a jangle as a whole peal of bells at Christmas time.

"They didn't like his luck, so two of them tried to put up a job on him. They said he hadn't been dealing fair in his regular business, and they made an attempt to get him up before the sheriff on a faked charge.

"But Frank heard of it and met those two fellows in a quiet spot, where he thrashed them both at one time until they wished they hadn't been born."

"But I thought he had killed two?" queried the captain.

"Hold on a bit; I'm coming to that. Frank, so it seems, only uses his six-shooter when the occasion demands it; and this particular occasion did demand it.

"That's were he differs from some of the fellows, who think nothing of shooting down a man unarmed. He acts square enough.

"There was a girl down there that they called Lizzie—leastways, she was about thirty. Several of the boys were after her, but only two had any chance. Oh!" concluded the story-teller, as he had to hand over his money to the winning man.

"Now, gentlemen," said the captain, looking at each of the three new passengers in turn, "your opportunity has come and you can take a hand."

Four of the men at the table had decided to drop out of the game, having arrived at the end of their resources. Jack and the farmer signified their willingness to join in the game, although the limit was rather high, but Bill quietly declined on the ground that he hadn't enough cash to embark on so risky an undertaking.

"I'm so confoundedly unlucky at that sort of thing," he said apologetically. "And it will be safer for me to look on."

"The two men who stood a chance with Lizzie, were Blazer and Frank," resumed the narrator when they had settled down again.

"Blazer was one of the two men who put up the job on Frank, and instead of bettering his chance, as I suppose he thought he would, he just spoilt it, for Lizzie was mad about it and married Frank right off.

"So Blazer and two of his friends made up their minds to get even and not to be particular about the way they did it. They waylaid Frank one night; they posted themselves a short distance from each other along a quiet part of the road, and had their guns ready. If the first missed him, the second might hit, or the third; he was certain to fall before he was clear of the three.

"The first man fired and Frank went down off his horse and lay in the road. They were joyful over their success, and came out of the hidding places to gloat over their victim, but he wasn't hit at all and had dropped because he thought it was safest.

"The nearest man got his dose of lead from Frank's revolver, and so did the second one, who couldn't get away quick enough; but the third man escaped. That was Blazer."

During this narration the game had proceeded very quickly. The stakes had been increased and bets had gone higher and higher.

One by one the players dropped out, having lost all the cash they could venture, leaving only the captain, the man with the French accent, the story-teller, and Jack still playing.

At this juncture, the man who was recounting the exploits of Steamboat Frank was forced to give up.

The farmer, having lost a goodly sum, had gone on deck to get cool, but Bill was still watching the game, although his continual change of position from one part of the table to another indicated a lack of interest.

Of the three men who continued the game, Jack betrayed the least excitement, which was probably owing to the fact that he was winning considerable sums.

"I know Blazer by sight," remarked the captain as he made a big bet in response to a challenge from Jack. "I fancy, by the look of his face, that he is the kind of man who will do his best to get even."

"I'll take your money, captain," observed Jack quietly as he turned up a card.

The captain said something impolite and pushed the money across the table.

The man with the French accent decided to double the stake for the next deal; the captain was about to follow his example, when Jack said he was quite prepared to make it four times as large, and the other two—galled by the touch of sarcasm in the tone—agreed to the larger sum.

"Blazer will get even if he can," continued the man who had been telling the story.

"I heard that he and some friends intend to do for Frank and are waiting for a good chance; they don't intend to have their little game spoilt this time by rushing the thing."

"But they will have two to reckon with, I should say; for Lizzie is just the kind of girl to help her husband in every way. People say she ought to have been a man."

"You seem to know all about it," observed one of the on-lookers. "S'pose you know them?"

"No, I don't," was the reply. "I'm telling you what was told to me, and you can take it for what it is worth. More passengers," he concluded, as the boat came to a stand. "Must be Harry's Wharf."

But little attention was paid to the stoppage, which was of brief duration; it was quite a usual thing, and in addition to that all the men were greatly interested in the game which was becoming more exciting than ever. Both the captain and the man with the French accent, nerved to desperation by their losses, had determined to stake all that was left to them on one final deal, and their countenances showed how great was the nervous tension.

"They say that Steamboat Frank has gone to another part and isn't likely to return," said the man who knew all about it. "He hasn't been seen here for the best part of two months, and I expect Blazer has got tired of looking out for him. Frank worked the boats pretty strong, and perhaps it was the healthiest thing he could do, to go away. He may not have cheated, but a man gets a bad name anyhow, if he always wins."

At this moment the captain uttered a big oath and sat back in his chair; the man with the French accent said something in French which corresponded in strength and quality with the captain's remark, and rose from the table.

Jack drew the money to his side and stuffed it into his pockets.

"I'm willing to pay for drinks and smokes all round," he said in the same cool tone. "Fortune has been with me and I'm much obliged to her; I haven't seen much money lately. Times have been hard."

"Your hard times are all over, Steamboat Frank," said a voice from the door. "Make one movement and you're a dead man. Hold up your hands!"

There was a cry of surprise from those present. They looked in the direction of the door and saw three men with revolvers levelled at Jack.

"Steamboat Frank!" ejaculated everyone. And the captain added something more forcible.

"You've cornered me this time, Blazer," said Frank with a careless laugh, as he held up his hands. "What are you going to do?"

"I'd shoot you right away," replied Blazer emphatically, "if it wasn't for the company. As it is, I shall make you shell out that money and come on shore with us. See?"

The intention was obvious to all present, but no one interfered. Those were lawless times, and the man who interfered might have received a piece of lead instead of the gold and notes which were to come from Frank's pockets.

"Go and turn out his pockets, Jimmy," ordered Blazer.

One of the men thrust his revolver in his belt and walked towards Frank, who was still standing with up-lifted hands.

"Make haste about it," said Blazer, as Jimmy reached the victim. "We don't want to waste time."

Jimmy put forth his hand to feel in Frank's pocket, and then something happened.

There was a howl of rage and pain from the men at the door. Blazer's right hand had received a heavy blow from the butt of a revolver, which made him drop his weapon and caress the wounded member with his left hand. The other man had had his wrist seized so quickly after Blazer had been disabled that it was almost impossible to believe that the same person had done the two things. But it was Bill who had done both.

Jimmy, with one hand just entering a pocket, was seized by the throat and his revolver was taken from his belt. And almost before the spectators knew what had really happened, Blazer and his two companions were holding their hands in the direction of the sky in obedience to orders enforced by the barrels of three revolvers, two in the hands of Frank and one held by Bill, who was none other than Lizzie in disguise."

"Now, gentlemen, right about face, march!" cried Frank. "Mind the stairs! that's right, up you go!"

The men stumbled upstairs to the deck, still holding their hands upwards. They knew enough of their intended victims to understand that any attempt to do otherwise than he ordered would result in their "getting hurt."

Frank marched them to the side of the vessel and then bade them jump overboard. There was no help for it, and with muttered oaths the men complied.

They were about twenty yards from the shore, so they had every chance of reaching it.

"I want you to put us ashore at the first likely spot," said Frank to the steamboat captain. "We are in a hurry."

The captain of the boat was wise in his generation, and made no demur. A few minutes later Frank and Lizzie were on dry land and the boat was steaming away.

"The gentlemen in the cabin didn't come on deck to see us off," laughed Frank. "Very rude of them, eh?"

"Not at all," replied Lizzie. "Do you think I am a fool? I thought it best to lock the cabin door as I came out. We can't afford to have our chances spoilt by overlooking small details."

"Blazer nearly had me that time," said Frank kissing her. "Only he overlooked a detail. That was very bad management on his part, for nobody could call you a small detail."

"Not quite," she answered merrily. "My signal code worked as well as ever, but I really thought once that the Frenchman had found me out when I was telling you about his hands."

Cricket in the Island of Koro.

WE are having great times in Koro, and life here is hugely exciting.

King Senka says he never was so free from liver complaint, and has lost quite twenty pounds in weight.

When you hit a ball, a piece of the ball would fly off, and in many cases hit a fielder who happened to be near.

Nothing pleases King Senka more than to find that through some cause or another he has lost weight for, as he remarked to me, just think of the grand time he will have in making up the loss.

So when King Senka found that three weeks cricket had rarified him to the extent of twenty pounds adipose tissue, he smiled extensively and said "I will now eat for a week."

This is the week during which the twenty pounds aforesaid are to be reinserted; so thus I have time to relate certain incidents connected with the installation of cricket in the island of Koro, of which Senka is the extensive ruler.

You will remember my telling you of the introduction of football into Koro, and also how a certain bicycle brightened the weary hours of the King and inspired agility into the natives.

Well, King Senka said he was growing tired of funerals, and suggested that football should be given a rest.

Then again the bicycle had lived too fast and was showing signs of it.

We could no longer make the tyres air-tight, and blowing them out with sand instead of air rather slowed the pace. However, no one would have objected to the slight decrease in speed produced by the sand, if the bicycle itself had not objected to be fed on sand, and so to speak, all might have been well.

But it was very evident that putting sand in the tyres seemed to take all the grit out of the machine.

It grew kind of sullen and refused to work; its temper also got very uncertain.

For instance, after King Senka had put himself to the trouble and expense of placarding the island with the fact that he intended to break the ten-mile record, the bicycle refused to be partner in the scheme by the simple but effective method of leaking to the extent of half a pound of sand every five yards.

So cycling got rather tame; and King Senka asked me to suggest something to relieve the monotony of the passing hour.

These were not his exact words. What he actually said was:

"I'm getting 'orrid fat and 'eavy, so do think of some game which will make me once more enjoy an 'earty meal, and I will reward you 'ansome."

I had taught King Senka English but never could get him to sound his h's.

I therefore resolved to teach the King cricket, and so much progress did I make that very night that, when I left the palace, the King was sufficiently educated in the game to remark that he would stir the stumps of half the population of Koro.

The formation of a cricket club is a comparatively easy undertaking in England; but it was horse work in Koro.

In the first place, bats had to be fashioned, stumps made, and cricket balls manufactured out of the trees growing upon the island.

But willing hands made light work; and King Senka inspired a great deal of willingness by remarking, at the outset, that he would break the head of any man who did not work hard. It was quite a week before a sufficient number of bats, balls, etc., had been manufactured, and I hardly think that these articles would have found a very ready sale in England.

King Senka kept on running, and smiled as he ran.

The balls were not absolutely round; but you could easily distinguish the handle from the blade part of the bats.

We did not go in for such luxuries as cane-splicing, and cork handles, but what the bats lacked in this respect they made up in weight and extent of surface.

Any batsman throwing his bat at a fielder who is about to catch a ball will be ruled out.

There was none of that monotonous evenness of surface which characterises the English-made bat, they appealed rather from the picturesque point of view in presenting an undulating surface suggestive of hills and dales, mountains and valleys.

Again I found, when once we had got properly started, that much more fun could be gained from the implements we played with than with those generally used.

For instance, when you hit a ball, a piece of the ball would fly off, and in many cases hit a fielder who happened to be near.

The balls also added to the fun and kept all interest from flagging.

You could never tell how much of the ball would be left after you had hit it; and very often it would take several fielders to gather it into the bowler's hands.

King Senka once made a great hit and the ball went into the state called "smithereens." Of course, Senka began to run, and continued running until the ball had been collected.

No one could cry "lost ball" since parts of the ball were soon found, and so really only a fraction of the ball was lost.

Thus King Senka kept on running and smiled as he ran.

He stopped and had ten minutes' interval for refreshments when he had run fifty; after which he once more resumed his trot.

He ran 147 runs before the ball had been brought home.

At first some of the players quite mistook the spirit of the game.

Thus when the wicket-keeper once got his eye in the way of the ball he could hardly be persuaded from fighting the bowler.

But little incidents like this kept the game well alive.

It was rather dangerous work wicket-keeping, and no umpire would give a man out unless he could fight him.

A certain amount of diversion was always displayed at first during a game.

Supposing a fielder caught a man out; the man would look upon this as a deliberate insult on the part of the fielder to himself and would take steps accordingly, their respective wives doing ditto.

But in a month's time the natives began to understand the game better; and I had added certain rules which I thought were necessary.

The rules I drew up in addition to those generally used were:

(1.) The wicket-keeper is not allowed to hit the batsman on the head when he is about to play a ball.

(2.) The umpire must not sit on the stumps during actual play.

(3.) In the case of a ball being hit into the air and going to bits, the largest bit must be caught before it touches the ground for the batsman to be given out.

(4.) Any batsman throwing his bat at a fielder who is about to catch a ball will be ruled out.

(5.) All indirect attempts at intimidation such as kneeling on the umpire and pounding him with a bat are not to be indulged in.

(6.) Any batsman using his head to stop the ball may be ruled out leg before.

(7.) If any lady whose husband has been given "out" by the umpire wishes to present that umpire with a bat, she must not steal up behind him and present it across his head, as the umpire is wanted until the game is over.

By the time the rules had been thoroughly digested and the natives had been brought to understand that cricket was not a species of sham fight, with the sham part left out, Koro could boast of several good elevens.

No one has as yet dared to bowl King Senka, so his average is rather a good one.

Last week we had our first great match. I picked an eleven to oppose one King Senka had chosen, and the whole island turned out to see the game.

Three dozen bats had been got ready and a good stock of balls. A large number of balls is always necessary for the wicket-keeper very often uses his head to stop a ball and the ball suffers.

King Senka won the toss and elected to go in first; so I set out my side and the crowd cheered in anticipation of some fun.

Very soon King Senka and another emerged from the Pavilion (save the mark!) and took their stand at the wickets.

Now I had always bowled easy lobs to Senka because I knew he liked them, and did not know how my usual style of bowling would appeal to him.

I used to bowl an exceedingly fast ball with a break from the leg, but had as yet only bowled easy underhands in Koro, with an occasional slow round-hand.

But that day I decided to try my old style. The first ball I sent sped, as we used to say, like "greased lightning," and the ground being rather hard, it rose somewhat, the King receiving it full in the ribs.

He immediately dropped his bat and ran as for dear life to a palm tree, which he quickly scaled.

Finding that the earth still kept relatively in the same place, he climbed slowly down again after a minute or two, and came up to me.

"Did you not feel the earthquake?" he said, looking at me with a terrified expression.

The wicket-keeper is not allowed to hit the batsman on the head when he is about to play a ball.

Digitized by Google

"No," said I, "I did not notice or feel anything."

"Most remarkable!" he said. "Just as you were going to bowl the whole earth seemed to shake and a thunderbolt hit me in the ribs."

If any lady whose husband has been given "out" by the umpire wishes to present that umpire with a bat, she must not steal up behind and present it across his head.

"Perhaps it was a sudden attack of indigestion," I suggested.

This set the King thinking; then suddenly looking up he smiled and said:

"You are right; one of my wives gave me some fricasseed cocoanut to-day for breakfast and I ate three or four pounds of it. I remember having a similar pain before, after partaking of what a wife of mine—she died shortly afterwards poor thing—called a chef d'œuvre."

He then walked slowly back to the wickets with the air of a man who had solved a difficult problem.

However, I did not try any more swift bowling on Senka, who carried his bat with the good score of eighty-five; but I was not so merciful with the other members of his team who only made twenty between them.

It was very funny to watch the antics of the batsman when I sent down a very swift ball.

Sometimes he would fall flat on his face and then gradually raise his head to see if the cannon ball had passed, and how many men it had killed; or perhaps he would spring into the air with a terrific yell and hurl his bat at the ball as it was coming towards him.

King Senka enjoyed all this immensely, and once when a ball laid out the wicket-keeper, he asked me to show him how to do it.

He also asked me to bowl a ball into the crowd to see what damage it would do; but I was afraid of what damage the crowd might do and so did not indulge in this luxury.

King Senka had a very good wicket-keeper on his side, and it was chiefly through him that my side got out for forty-six runs.

He was exceedingly clever with his feet and could pull out a stump with his toes.

Thus he would stand with one foot very near to the wickets, and when King Senka bowled a ball which happened to go close to the bails, he would aid Senka's good intention by bringing off the bail by the simple but very effective method of shaking a stump with his toes.

In this way Senka took a number of wickets, mine included; not by having a big break on the ball but by a big toe on the wicket.

With the aid of this wicket-keeper King Senka could do the hat-trick or any other feat of bowling he might wish.

However, it was a very enjoyable game all told, and I am rather looking forward to the next, which takes place a week hence.

For I have been practising bowling slow balls with a big break from the off, and am wondering how they will suit the King, who said to me to-day:

"I 'ate a ball to come along too 'urriedly; but give me slow balls and I can fairly 'ammer them."

The first ball I sent sped, as we used to say, like "greased lightning," and the ground being rather hard, it rose somewhat, the King receiving it full in the ribs.

THE few persons who constituted the "society" of the Siberian village, situated at such a distance from what the world termed civilisation, were surprised for the second time in three weeks—an altogether unprecedented experience.

The government officials, the warders and others in charge of the mines and the prisoners, and their families, led a quiet, perhaps monotonous, existence; it was not devoid of amusement, and there were occasions when they were really gay, but they saw little of the outer world during the period of residence at the penal settlement.

The first surprise was the arrival of Madame Louise Barette, a lovely Frenchwoman on the right side of thirty; she was travelling through the country with a view to demonstrating to the world at large that Russia, and especially Siberia, was not the miserable, mirthless place it was popularly supposed to be, and that the prisoners of the powerful ally of her native country were not cruelly treated.

She had a passport and a semi-official letter which secured for her the opportunity she desired of spending three or four weeks' stay, and she put up at the inn, as it was styled.

But she was such a charming and gifted woman that she had the entrée of the houses of all the officials before she had been in the place three days.

She made no attempt to disguise the object of her stay, and laughingly declared that she would truthfully state all she saw, so they had better not allow her to see anything they wished to keep secret; but she captivated them so that they spoke freely in front of her, saying that they could trust her not to repeat what had been mentioned to her in confidence. To this she smilingly assented.

And now they had received information that Gruzineff, the Governor of the province, was about to pay them a visit. What possessed the old fellow to do that? The mines were not of great importance in point of size, and although they sometimes counted a political offender of some magnitude among the prisoners, that was not the case now.

The reputation enjoyed by these mines was to the effect that the life of those sent there was a veritable inferno, but the Governor would not trouble about paying a visit on that account.

"Perhaps he is coming to see the prisoner you call Oscar Sobieski," observed Madame Barette to one of the ladies of the small party who were taking tea out of a samovar, in the house of the chief resident official. "He is a political offender."

"Oh, no!" chorused all present.

"He is a nobody," added the lady particularly addressed.

"But he is supposed to be a descendant of a former King of Poland," objected Madame Barette, "and you told me that his offence was an attempt to throw a bomb at the carriage of a Grand Duke—and that it was even supposed that he intended that bomb for the Emperor."

"We don't count that for much," returned Madame Skoleva, smiling condescendingly. "He may be regarded as an aristocrat by some foolish Poles, and of course it was a terrible crime to make an attempt on the Grand Duke; but he is not one of a gang or one of a band that might do a lot of mischief."

This reasoning did not appear to be very conclusive to the Frenchwoman, judging by the look in her eyes, but she signified her complete approval by a nod and a pretty remark to the effect that she feared that she was rather dull, for she ought to have understood the position. Then she fell to thinking of what she had heard concerning Oscar Sobieski.

He had been sent to this far-distant part of the Tsar's dominions, because there were but few prisoners in the settlement and its position made the chance of escape almost impossible; and because of the severity of the treatment meted out to those who were unfortunate enough to be drafted there.

Madame Skoleva had hinted that orders had been given to her husband to make the life of the prisoner as unbearable as possible, without unduly shortening his existence. And from what she had gathered during her brief stay, the Frenchwoman was convinced that this order was being carried out. She had endeavoured to gain permission to see this interesting prisoner, but in spite of her charms and feminine wiles she had not succeeded. Skoleva had remained obdurate, and his wife had declined to comprehend the hints thrown out by the visitor.

"I suppose that there would be no chance of pardon for such a man?" asked Madame Barette a few minutes later.

"None whatever, I should say," rejoined the Russian lady emphatically. "Who would wish to have the fellow pardoned? Political exigencies bring about many a strange thing, but it is not conceivable that they could lead to the release of Sobieski."

"The power to pardon him—would it be vested in the Governor?" persisted Madame Barette.

"No, my dear madame," said the commandant himself, who had just joined the little group with three other officials and had overheard the question. "The pardon would have to come from St. Petersburg, but it would be sent to the Governor and he would forward the order to me."

"Perhaps he is coming on purpose to have the man released?" suggested the Frenchwoman, jestingly.

There was a laugh at this joke, and the commandant changed the subject by engaging Madame Barette in conversation concerning her travels. This gradually led to some complimentary remarks about herself.

"I am sure that the Governor will be delighted to make your acquaintance," Skoleva assured her. "I know that he is a great admirer of the French people and no one could fail to have the highest admiration for so charming a member of the French race."

The official grew quite enthusiastic; the woman's beauty fascinated him whenever he came in contact with her.

"I am glad to learn that he is not likely to have me driven away," returned Madame Barette.

While the commandant was lifting his hands in horror at the idea and explaining volubly that the Governor would be charmed and so forth, his wife was once more singing the praises of the Frenchwoman whose presence had transformed their lives during the past few days, and who had in some subtle manner thrown a spell over the whole community.

"She is simply a wonderful woman," she said, as though the others knew nothing about it. "She sings and plays divinely, and she knows—well, all about everything, I really believe. She is very pretty, I suppose I ought to say very beautiful. And she is as attractive as—but there, you know that as well as I do!" she added. She was at a loss for a simile, and that was the easiest way out of the difficulty.

"I quite agree with what you say," said Madame Alexovitch, the wife of another official, "but there is a certain fierceness about her beauty, and her manner is rather weird at times. You remember when she chanted that strange song last week? It made me feel rather creepy, especially as she had the lamps turned low."

"Y-e-s," assented Madame Skoleva reluctantly. It was a half contradiction, and although she admitted the truth of the observation, she did not like to have her words questioned.

"I fancy, if I may be permitted to say so," the commandant was saying to Madame Barette just at this moment, "that you are not exactly French."

Madame Barette shot a swift glance at him and her lips twitched ever so slightly; then she smiled and complimented him on his shrewdness.

"I come from Perpignan," she replied. "You know that Perpignan is almost Spain. I really belong to a Basque family. The Basques are a strange race and nobody knows much about them."

"Ah! I thought as much. I haven't forgotten that weird song of yours the other evening."

"If I were an official here," continued the Frenchwoman, "I would soon tame all you prisoners. I shall try my art on the Governor. Do you know"—this quite suddenly—"I have a presentiment that he will order the release of Sobieski."

The commandant shook his head and again turned the conversation.

Six days later, His Excellency arrived. He was attended by a limited suite and took up his residence in the commandant's house.

He was to stay three days and had come on a visit of inspection.

On the second day of his stay Madame Skoleva entertained a small party in his honour and Madame Barette was the chief guest. She had evidently been impressed by the fact that the Governor was a high state dignitary and had made up her mind to exercise all her powers in order to please him.

That she did so was proved by a remark of Gruzineff very soon after he had been introduced.

"Beautiful and clever; I can find no words that will properly qualify those adjectives."

By virtue of his rank, Gruzineff should have been the central figure of the party, but Madame Barette assumed that position, and everybody, including Gruzineff, did homage to her. Everyone came under the spell which this gifted woman exercised over her fellow creatures.

"Will you not sing something to us?" asked Gruzineff of Madame Barette. "Skoleva tells me that you sing divinely—those are his very words—and I quite believe it."

"Gruzineff is bewitched," murmured Skoleva to his deputy. "Look at him! He is quite under the spell."

In response to the Governer's appeal, backed by a murmur of approval from other guests, Madame Barette sang to them in French. When she had finished the song, she offered to repeat the strange chant to which allusion has been made. The Governor eagerly accepted the offer; the others were not so eager, for they had heard it and were a little afraid.

Candles were extinguished and the only light was that of a lamp with a red shade. The Frenchwoman seated herself so that the reddish tint fell full upon her. The guests grouped themselves in a semi-circle in front of her, with the Governor in the most prominent position. They did this under her instructions, because "it helped her imaginations and enabled her to give full expression to the words.

Although they listened intently—their eyes fixed on her, not daring to move, scarcely able to breathe, so intense were their feelings—yet they hardly knew what they were listening to.

It seemed that she was playing the part of an old woman searching the battle field for the body of her son who had been killed; that she found it and carried it to a camp fire where she wailed over the loss of her only child.

No one was more fascinated than Gruzineff; she has done her best to please him and she had succeeded. That was what Skoleva thought as he noted the dazed expression on the Governor's face when the chant was finished.

Madame Barette withdrew from the room to an adjoining chamber as she concluded, and Gruzineff followed her. The effort exhausted her and she retired to Skoleva's little den or study to rest awile, as she had done before; the commandant assumed that Gruzineff had followed her in order to thank her.

It was quite twenty minutes later when Madame Barette returned, alone. She was much agitated and held an envelope in her hand.

"I am dreadfully worried," she cried in distressed tones, "I fear that I have quite upset the Governor with my song. He followed me in order to thank me, but he seemed to be quite ill and has gone to his room. He gave me this letter for you, Monsieur Skoleva, and said that the order was to be carried out immediately. He will explain in the morning, when he is better. Oh! I wish someone had come to us."

There was some consternation at the information that the Governor was indisposed. Skoleva took the letter and hurried off to the bedroom occupied by His Excellency. Madame Barette was so much upset that she declared she could stay no longer, and expressed grave fears that Gruzineff would visit his wrath upon her on the following day.

"I am terribly afraid of your Russian high functionaries, because they can punish you so severely if you offend them."

Madame Barette was gone when Skoleva came back with the intelligence that the Governor was in bed and comfortably asleep. He had learnt this fact from Gruzineff's valet, who said that his master appeared stupefied, but otherwise well. Skoleva also seemed disturbed and said he must go to the prison at once, as he had something important to do.

So the party broke up rather unceremoniously.

When Gruzineff descended on the following morning his first words were:

"What happened last night? I can't remember anything after that song."

"Your Excellency became indisposed," replied Skoleva deferentially. "I hope your Excellency is better this morning."

"H'm! I can remember nothing that happened after she began that chant."

"I carried out your Excellency's orders last night as soon as Madame Barette gave me the letter," said Skoleva, thinking that this would stimulate Gruzineff's memory.

"What orders? What letter?" asked the latter with eyes wide open with surprise.

"The letter, written by yourself and dated from St. Petersburg, ordering me to release Oscar Sobieski."

Skoleva was fairly startled by the outburst which followed his words.

The Governor raved that he had written no such letter and accused Skoleva of tricking him; but when the commandant showed him the letter he subsided and stared vacantly at his own handwriting.

After gazing at it for at least a couple of minutes, he looked at Skoleva and continued quietly:

"Skoleva, that woman has tricked us. I can only suppose that she hypnotised me and made me write this letter. You have released Sobieski and you will find that Madame Barette has gone also. I don't know how she did it; tell me what you know about last night."

Skoleva quickly explained.

"It won't do for this to be known, Skoleva," said the Governor, uneasily. "They have a long way to go, but I doubt whether we can recapture them. The woman has no doubt laid her plans well, and we know that the inhabitants are always ready to assist escaped prisoners. If we try to recapture them, we also lay ourselves open to—— No, I think it best to say nothing, and in two or three weeks you can contrive to forward a report that he is dead. See?"

"It is rather risky, sir," answered Skoleva. He was a man of intelligence and saw an opportunity for promotion. "I will do it, and your Excellency will not fail to remember me for early advancement."

The Governor said he would remember, and he did; for in three months Skoleva was transferred to a better place.

Before they left the village, Madame Skoleva received a note from Madame Barette; the letter, after apologising for her abrupt departure, volunteered some explanation. It ran as follows:

"When my husband was sent to Siberia, I determined to release him if I devoted years to the task. I relied on the gifts which nature has been good enough to bestow on me. I came to you and learnt all I could. I wrote to the Governor anonymously, telling falsehoods about the management of the prison. I knew the kind of man he was, and I believed that if I could get him near the prison I should succeed in my plan. I could not hope to carry it through if he remained at a distance. If he did not come, I was determined to direct my efforts towards you and your fellow official; but I did not wish to injure you, because you are only the stupid tools, whereas I had a debt to pay M. Gruzineff, and it amused me to think of releasing my husband and bringing disgrace upon that man at the same time.

"Fortune favoured me. I hypnotised Gruzineff and made him write that letter and then sent him to bed. I told him to date it from the capital, because it looked more plausible, although I am convinced that you would have suspected nothing had it been dated from your own house. I had prepared you for the order to release my husband, by pretending that I had a presentiment that M. Gruzineff would bring an order for the release of Oscar Sobieski.

"It was a fatiguing journey, but money will do much, even in Russia. We are beyond the reach of the Tsar's creatures. We shall have to work against Russian tyranny from a distance in future, but we shall not cease to work.

"It will interest you to know that I am not a Frenchwoman, even in a remote degree. I had to invent a little story to satisfy you. I am not a Basque, but a Finn; this will help you to understand why I so heartily assist my husband in his fight against Russia."

They Had Got Cronje.

AT the time of Cronje's surrender a gentleman sent his servant, Bridget, to the fishmonger's to buy some plaice for dinner. Bridget, who was a bit uncultivated and who knew nothing of the war and its doings, set off for the fish.

When she arrived at the shop a lady was inside buying plaice, which was the kind of fish she herself had come for.

The fishmonger, as he was serving the lady, happened to remark:

"They've got Cronje."

"Have they?" asked the lady, and nothing further was said.

Bridget misunderstood the meaning, she thinking that the fishmonger meant that the plaice had got a disease called "cronje."

When Bridget got back with the fish she went straight to her master and said:

"Oi've got the plaice, sor, but the fishmonger said they'd got Cronje." G. D.

A Bad Bargain.

A FARM servant was married last year, and, being short of the amount necessary to defray the fees, he promised the officiating clergyman that he would repay him by giving him a bag of potatoes when they were ready for digging up.

The clergyman waited a considerable time but no potatoes were forthcoming, so he called on the man to inquire as to the reason of the delay.

"Well," was the despairing reply, "to tell yer the truth, guv'nor, she ain't wuth it!" W. C.

A New Fashion.

A SERVANT girl happened to be engaged at a farm-house where the mistress was known to have a rather hasty temper.

On the first Saturday night the girl was told to clean the boots and shoes for Sunday.

Coming into the kitchen a short time afterwards, the mistress, seeing that the maid had cleaned her own boots first, was so enraged that she lifted them and threw them into a tub of water which stood near.

The servant made no sign; but when all the boots were cleaned she also lifted them and threw them into the tub of water.

"Why, whatever possessed you to do that?" gasped her mistress in a fury.

"Oh, I jist thocht it was the fashion o' the house," calmly replied the girl. A. D.

Not a Cannibal.

MRS. JONES was engaging a servant, and after describing the duties expected of her, said:

"I hope you are fond of children and animals, because——"

"Lor, mum, I ain't no bloomin' cannybil. What do you take me for?" and she left the house in disgust. S. R.

Would He Bring It With Him?

AMONG the servants of a Scotch family is one young woman of native wit who never is at a loss for an expedient.

She answered the door-bell the other day, when a stranger presented himself, and asked to see the lady of the house.

"What name shall I say?"

"Mr. Stiltzenheimer," said he.

"Beg pardon, sir," said she.

"Stiltzenheimer," repeated he.

The girl hesitated at the name, which was evidently beyond the intricacies of her speech, and then, opening the door to the parlour, said with a laugh:

"Step in, sir, if you please, and—and bring the name with you." W. P.

Another Injustice.

MISTRESS: "Woman, alive, you have cooked the fowl I got for Sunday instead of the beef."

Servant: "Shure Oi didn't know it was the mate ye wanted fur to-day."

Mistress: "You might have known I wanted the fowl on Sunday without my telling you."

Servant: "Moight I, indade? Did yez expict ter git a moind reader fur foive bob a wake?" C. E. S.

Baby's Medicine.

"BABY was taken very bad while you were out, mum," said the new servant girl.

"Oh, dear!" said the young wife. "Is he better now?"

"Oh, he's all right now, but he was bad at first; he seemed to come over quite faint, but I found his medicine in the cupboard."

"Found his medicine? Good gracious! What have you been giving the child? There's no medicine in the cupboard."

"Oh, yes, there is, mum! It's written on it," and then the girl triumphantly produced a bottle labelled "Kid Reviver." W. G.

Not Class.

KATIE, from the North, got a "place" in a West Edinburgh house. A few days after her arrival her mistress gave her a list of groceries required, and told her to go to the establishment of a big firm in Princes Street with the order.

"Eh, mem?" said Kate dubiously. "It's only the swells that gang tae that shop." T. O'B.

The Method of Exhaustion.

IN the North of Ireland the other day a servant girl was brought to a hospital suffering from the effects of an over-dose of poison.

When questioned as to her motive for taking it, she replied:

"I wasn't feeling well, and I went to missus's medicine-chest. There was a bottle marked 'three drops for an infant, six for an adult, and a teaspoonful for an emetic.' I knew I wasn't an infant, I wasn't sure about an adult—so I thought I must be the emetic, and took the spoonful." J. McD.

She Misunderstood His Meaning.

A SERVANT GIRL was sent to a certain bookmaker at Leicester to take her master's selections for a race.

The girl asked the bookmaker if she were to put a shilling on a horse, and it won, how much she would get?

"If the horse started at twenty to one," he answered, "you would get twenty-one shillings back; if at ten to one, eleven shillings; if at five to one, six shillings back."

"But supposing," asked the servant, "the horse started at one o'clock, how much should I get then?"

The bookie gave it up. J. B.

Taking Instructions Literally.

"IF anyone should call this afternoon, Mary, say that I am not well," said a mistress to her newly-engaged servant. "I'm afraid I ate a little too much of that rich pudding for lunch, and it or something else has brought on a severe headache. I am going to lie down."

A few moments later the mistress, from her room near the head of the stairs, heard Mary say to two aristocratic ladies who called for the first time:

"Yes'm, Mrs. B. is at home, but she ate so much pudding for lunch she had to go to bed."

W. J. B.

She Knew Her Business.

A YOUNG woman answered an advertisement for a servant, and the lady of the house seemed pleased with her, but before engaging her there were some questions to ask.

"Suppose," said the lady—"now only suppose, understand—that you were carrying a piece of steak from the kitchen, and by accident should let it slip from the plate to the floor, what should you do?"

The girl looked the lady straight in the eye for a moment before asking:

"Is it a private family, mum, or are there boarders?"

"Boarders," answered the lady.

"Pick it up and put it back on the plate," firmly replied the girl.

She was engaged. R. S.

Rather Warm.

A LADY had occasion the other day to administer a seidlitz powder to her Irish servant. She put the contents of the blue paper into one glass of water in the usual fashion, and the contents of the white paper into another. When she put them together and the mixture effervesced violently, she handed the tumbler to the patient, saying:

"Drink it quick."

But the girl, instead of swallowing it, sat down precipitately on the floor, and exclaimed:

"Why, ma'am, yez surely wouldn't expect me to drink it bilin' hot!" A. W.

A Doorstep Comedy.

MRS. B. is one of those unfortunate ladies who are rarely out of communication with the servants' registry office. Tradesmen and others who frequently call at her house are met at the door by a perpetually changing staff of domestics.

On one occasion, when a ring was heard, for some reason or other, Mrs. B. herself went down, and opening the door, found outside the milk boy with the afternoon's milk.

On seeing her, he leant against the doorway and gave vent to a prolonged whistle. Then imagine her feelings when he addressed her thus:

"What! another fresh 'un! You won't stay here long, I lay. She's a 'orror, she is." L. B. S.

Tableau!

THERE was a little dinner-party at No. 9.

"Mrs. Johnson," said one of the guests, "how prettily you have ornamented the crust of this game-pie."

"Yes," replied the hostess, "it is rather neat, isn't it? I'll ask Mary how it was done," and calling the maid she said:

"Mary, do you know how cook got such a novel design on the pie-crust?"

"Oh, yes, mum," replied Mary innocently. "She did it with your false teeth!" A. L. T.

A Misunderstanding.

ANCIENT PARTY (from the provinces): "I want a pair of shoes, young man."

Polite Assistant: "Certainly, madam. Something neat and tasty, I suppose. Now, there's a nice shoe that's been worn all this spring."

Ancient Party (with fervour): "Law, bless the man; I don't want nothing that's been worn all the spring. I want a new pair of shoes!" C. C.

Working to Music.

A LADY, who had a very slow servant, noticed that it took the girl almost half the day to scrub the kitchen—a piece of work that should have been accomplished in an hour. The servant always accompanied her scrubbing with a song; and one day the mistress became alarmed at the slow progress she made.

"'Mid pleasures" (scrub) "an' palaces" (scrub) "tho' we may" (scrub) "roam——"

"Jane!" called the mistress sternly, "I am tired of hearing 'Home, Sweet Home'; sing 'The Campbells are Coming.'"

Nothing loth, Jane did so, and fell into the trap so cleverly laid for her. Her scrubbing-brush flew over the boards with lightning rapidity. The poetry of motion had made swift work. E. D.

MR. PHILIP BROWN.

HELEN ARMSTRONG closed her hand-bag and gathered together the scattered belongings that had accumulated during her long journey; she drew on her gloves and rearranged her hat and veil for not the first time in the last half-hour. She knew that the train speeding on was surely, rapidly, bringing her to Eglington; in a few minutes more she would be in her father's embrace.

How she had begged to join her father; she had endeavoured to convince him how unhappy she was away from him and how much to their mutual advantage her presence at Eglington would be.

At last she wrung a promise from him that she should go to him at the end of her schooldays.

The train slackened its speed, the friendly porter came to help Helen off with her hand luggage, and in a moment she found herself on the platform in front of a miserable-looking station decorated with the sign "Eglington."

She gazed around seeking the dear familiar figure she had pictured all these last few days, but instead she saw advancing towards her a tall, brown-bearded man. He lifted his hat courteously, and said in accents which little accorded with his rough mining dress.

"Miss Armstrong, I presume; I am Philip Brown."

"Oh, are you Mr. Brown?" she asked, almost rudely. "Where is papa? I thought, of course he would be here."

Her voice trembled.

"I know it must be very disappointing, but he couldn't come; it was impossible; he is ill."

"I never knew him to be ill before," she said, half dazed.

"It is very sudden. He seemed quite well up to a day or two ago, but yesterday morning the stroke came—I mean, you know—oh, don't be alarmed, Miss Armstrong—I—we all hope for the best."

Philip broke off, feeling utterly helpless as he saw the tremulous lip and the blue eyes filling with tears. Philip silently helped her into the dog-cart that was to conduct them home, and it was only after they had left the desolate station a half-mile behind that the silence was broken.

"Mr. Brown, please tell me all about it," Helen said; her voice sounded hard and cold, even in her own ears; she felt stunned and numb, and was conscious of an unreasonable dislike for this strong, bronzed man beside her.

Philip had told her how he had found Mr. Armstrong lying in an unconscious state the morning before. He did not mention that he had ridden miles at a breakneck speed to the telegraph station in order to summon the doctor in time for the evening train, nor that all night he had sat by the bedside of his friend watching for the faintest signs of returning consciousness, until at daybreak, before he had started to meet Helen, his vigil had been rewarded by a few broken sentences from the stricken man.

"Helen—Philip—Helen—go before it's too late; bring my little girl."

When Philip paused Helen asked firmly, though her face was white:

"Is it the end?"

Philip for one moment hesitated, but as he looked down into her questioning eyes he could but answer the truth.

"I fear so, but I hope we will be in time."

At last Helen knelt by the side of her father's bed.

"Papa. Papa. Dear daddy," she cried, as she kissed her father, and the sick man smiled contentedly as he answered:

"Daughter."

Philip and the doctor left the room, and Helen laid her soft young cheek against her father's face and clasped his hand almost fiercely, as if to hold him back. He read her thoughts and answered:

"It is no use, little girl, I am going! it was only the thought of seeing you kept me here so long."

"No, no, papa; don't leave me."

"Be brave, Helen; I'll leave you in good hands, dear; the fortune-hunters won't get you."

It seemed to Helen that his mind must be wandering.

"Call Philip, Helen; I must speak to him."

She called him reluctantly.

"Did you want me, sir?"

"Yes, Philip, my boy, I want you." His voice was growing weaker with each breath. "I wish you to take care of my little girl; I am dying, and I can't leave her alone in the world; she must have someone whose right it is to guard her. You are the only man to whom I could trust her. Will you marry Helen?"

"Mr. Armstrong, dear, kind friend that you have been to me, your wishes are my laws. I will take care of your daughter always." Why didn't he say, "if she will let me." But his only thought was for the friend who lay dying.

Helen knelt down by the bed, and, throwing her arms round her father's neck, burst into tears for the first time.

"Papa, not that; don't make me marry anyone."

"It is my last wish, dear; I must know you have a protector; go, Philip, bring someone to perform the ceremony; my time is getting short."

Indeed, Helen almost regretted her remonstrance as she looked at the pallid face of her idolised father, and during Philip's brief absence she said no more, but caressed him whose life-long care had made her forget that she was motherless.

Just as the sun was setting Philip and Helen were married at the side of John Armstrong's bed. As the last words were said, a peaceful smile illumined the face of the dying man, and, grasping a hand of each, he said, "God bless you," and passed away.

The memory of that hour remained with Helen many a day; the utter strangeness of her surroundings added to her desolation. Philip saw to her physical comfort, but dare not offer a word of consolation to the girl whose sorrow seemed crushing. She appeared not to be aware of his existence and only answered in monosyllables any remark he made.

"You will return to London, I presume?" he said as they walked back from the grave after the funeral.

"Yes, immediately," Helen answered.

* * * * *

In the early spring of the following year Helen went to Burfield with the mother of her dearest school-friend, Lena Horton, with whom she had made her home since her father's death.

She found herself growing brighter and happier, the change and out of door life doing her much good.

One morning as she was bicycling over the long bridge that connects Burfield and the village of Hampton, she passed a man who looked at her very steadily for a moment. He was tall, rather dark, clean shaven and well-dressed.

"By Jove, it's Helen, as sure as I am alive," he exclaimed. "I hadn't hoped to see her so soon," he thought; "my boat has been in an hour and I have been putting off the evil moment of sending up my card; I fear she won't receive me very warmly."

Suddenly he saw her dismount and examine her machine. She looked about helplessly, and seemed to be at a loss to know what to do. Philip hurried towards her and said:

"May I be of service to you?"

"Oh, thank you, I am afraid I have punctured one of my tyres," she replied, and Philip was surprised at her beauty as she turned her face towards him. "I am not an experienced cyclist. I hardly know what to do."

"Do you carry a repair outfit? I may be able to mend it."

"Why, I don't know, there are lots of things in that little satchel, perhaps there is a repair outfit."

Philip could scarcely repress a smile at the woeful ignorance of this young woman in regard to her machine, but he looked into the little sachel and brought to light tools with which to mend the tyre.

While he was busying himself about it he thought of his peculiar position. There he saw he was gallantly assisting his own wife. He saw that she did not recognise him in his changed dress and shaven face, and he was glad that she did not, as he felt sure that she would not have smiled so brightly or talked so pleasantly had she known.

"Do you ride much? Don't you think you ought to learn what to do in case of accidents?"

"I am a beginner and I never go far from the hotel yet. I suppose I ought to learn about my machine, but I don't believe I am a mechanical genius," she laughed. "It's really much nicer to have someone to do it for me."

"I hope I may always be so fortunate as to appear at the right moment."

Helen drew herself up to her full height of five feet four and replied as coldly as she could:

"Thank you very much; it is finished, I believe."

She took the bicycle from him, and mounting rode back in the direction of the inn. As Philip stood, hat in hand, he reflected that she might be a little difficult. He fell to wondering if it were possible to hire a machine, and about decided not to make his identity known just yet.

Mrs. Horton and Helen were at dinner when Philip stepped into the dining room, and in following the waiter to his seat he passed their table. Helen inclined her head very slightly; she evidently did not consider her morning meeting a sufficient introduction.

In the afternoon he lit a cigar and strolled along the verandah. Only a sense of duty had brought him here—the promise to his friend, the best friend the world could give, had been his guiding star the last eight or nine months, and the time had come when he felt it right to see for himself how his little charge was. Now that he was here and had seen Helen he was unaccountably happy.

"A man must have someone to live for," he mused, "and even if it's a young girl, who, for all you know, doesn't care whether you live or not, it's better than a selfish life."

His thoughts were interrupted by a few words that came from the group of ladies.

"Yes, I love to ride."

"Alone?"

"Oh, I don't mind that; the country is so pretty about here that I could never be lonely."

How clear and childlike was her voice. He could not hear the words of the others, but her answer was plain.

"Not a bit of it. Why should I be afraid? Nothing ever happens—I mean, of course, that nothing is likely to happen."

"Then you are going to keep our little encounter to yourself," thought Philip. "Very well, then, my lady; you and I have a secret between us."

After some search Philip succeeded in hiring a bicycle and before he had been at Burfield twenty-four hours he started for a ride. He went slowly over the bridge hoping to find Helen, and sure enough he soon over-took her. She acknowledged his bow, and thus encouraged he rode beside her.

"Your tyre is all right, I hope?" he remarked.

"Yes, indeed; thanks to your dexterity, it's as good as new," replied Helen graciously.

And Philip found himself thinking that a girl never looks so pretty as when on a bicycle.

"It is a charming morning for a ride," said Philip,

"Yes, I am glad it's pleasant, as I am going to the training school."

"Why, so am I," said Philip, coming to a sudden conclusion on the subject, "May I ride with you?"

"Since we are bound for the same place we may as well go together," consented Helen. There was no need to be priggish, and, besides, she thought dolefully, a married woman is always safe.

"Don't your friends worry about you when you go off alone? Now, for instance, since you punctured your tyre yesterday, won't they fear some accident?" questioned Philip artfully.

"Oh, no, you see I did not tell them about the tyre," she coloured slightly, "it was such a little thing."

"So they do not know it? Well," he continued, musingly, "perhaps that is better."

Helen looked at him inquiringly, but he rode on studying the view so intently that she could learn nothing from his face. She felt, just as he had meant her to feel, that their meeting had a clandestine element.

The morning passed quickly and pleasantly, and when they drew near the hotel Philip asked her if he might accompany her the next morning.

"Yes, if I go out," she assented coolly.

"Our acquaintance is a little unconventional, I suppose you don't even know my name, which, by the way is Brown."

"Oh, not Brown," Helen burst out impetuously.

"Yes, as common a one as that, Don't you like it?"

"It has rather unpleasant associations for me. But, of course, as you say, it is not a rare name. It would be foolish to allow it to prejudice me."

The morning ride became a habit with Philip, and he and Helen always met, sometimes by accident; sometimes they planned to do so. Each day Philip became more convinced that life without Helen would be flat, stale, and unprofitable. There were times when she became almost confidential, but she always checked herself and withdrew into the prim dignity that amused him immensely.

"You have never told me anything about yourself," said Philip once, when they were resting in a shady nook after a hard spin.

"You ought to know a great deal about me, having ridden with me every morning for the past fortnight," answered Helen. "Riding a bicycle is a great test of disposition, they say."

"I do know a great deal about your disposition, so that I am anxious to know about your life," said he looking tenderly at her. "You have never told me your name and I have evaded finding it out at the hotel in the hope that you would tell me yourself——"

"I haven't told you my name, because——" she paused, and then continued defiantly, "because I hate it, and it's the same as yours. Please don't ask me why. Please go away and leave me—I am miserable."

She turned her face away and Philip fancied she was crying. He longed to take the pathetic little figure in his arms and tell her how glad he was that their names were the same, but he only said:

"Forgive me if I have hurt you; I would rather die than cause you to suffer. Please let us be friends again."

He took her hand for a moment, and Helen turned her flushed, tear-stained face towards him, and, withdrawing her hand, said, in a brave effort to be calm and forceful:

"Mr. Brown, you must not speak in that way to me."

"But, don't you see," said Philip, taking her hand again, "that you are very dear to me?"

"I can't let you; I am not free."

Her voice trembled, and she released her hand from his grasp once more.

"Please do not make it any harder for me. I am married."

She burst into tears and Philip felt altogether guilty and despicable.

"Poor little woman, poor little woman," he said caressingly.

"I am the victim of a marriage that was forced upon me; I couldn't refuse it; I was not consulted. My dear father did what he thought was right. The man he chose for me thought nothing of me. To him I was a child—a piece of property to be taken care of—but as to my having any feelings on the subject of my own marriage—that never occurred to him. If papa had given him a pet dog he would have taken it in the same way."

Philip winced, but she, preoccupied with her wrongs, continued:

"I have not seen him since, and I never understood till now how horrible my bondage might become."

Helen blushed as she realised what her words might seem to imply, but her companion appeared not to notice them and asked:

"Has the man—your husband—fulfilled his duty to you?"

"Yes; he has been unfailing in his care for my interests. He manages my business affairs and writes me quite regularly. Mere letters of business, of course. He has never forced himself upon me; I am grateful for that."

"What will you do when he comes to you, as he certainly will do?" asked Philip, almost sternly.

"I don't know. I shut my eyes to that."

"You must open your eyes." He grasped her wrist. "Helen, look, he has come."

Helen pulled herself away, and rising to her feet, said with indescribable expression:

"Philip."

EINAR OF THE LONG SWORD.

. . By George C. Wallis . .

Author of "The Winning of Gunhild," "The Gladiator," etc., etc.

PALE with rage and mortification Hardrada bade some of the men bring Einar out, and they placed him, still bound, in a sitting posture against the wall. His eyes met Astrid's, and the glance that passed between them was pitiful to see, yet a prouder light came into Astrid's face because of it, and into her lover's a strange calm.

"Now say your say to each other and be done with it," said Hardrada. "It will be your last chance. As to Einar's life, though it irks me to let him go, I will grant him a whole skin for your sake. If you will wed me peaceably to-day and he will take oath never to draw weapon on me again, he shall go free to-morrow. If not, he will never see the light of to-morrow, and whether you will or no, you will become my bride."

"These are hard terms," said Einar, speaking to Astrid alone; "but our enemy the coward has all the advantage, and it might be better for us, after all, to yield. It is not for myself, love, for if I may not have you I care not for life, but for your safety. I will take any oath now, but it will go hard with me if I keep it after."

"Nay, Einar," said Astrid, kneeling beside him and kissing him so that all might see, "I will not keep my life at the price of your happiness. Let Hardskull do his worst; I have yet means to defeat him. But tell me first how it was between you and Thora, for Alfdane brought me a sorry tale."

And she told him quickly of Alfdane's message, for even in that time of despair a pang of jealousy lingered. Einar heard her with wonder, then with anger at the meanness of his foes, and when she had done told her the truth before he could be stopped. Then, as Hardskull stepped towards him, he cried derisively:

"It was a pretty lie for a coward and a troll to cheat an honest man with, most noble host. Yet you can make the last part good, if you dare. If Astrid wills, let the wedding-feast go on, but before it is done and night comes, let me fight with you and with Hrolf—aye, and with Alfdane, too, until you three, or I, be sent to Hela. I am weak from binding and scant food, as you know, but I am in desperate case, and I dare you to go on holmgang with me, one after the other."

Now he looked so worn and weary that they could scarce refuse the challenge, seeing that it could have but one end, and many of the men around cried shame on Hardrada because he hesitated. Hrolf Red-Hand was for taking up the challenge at once, but Hardrada and Alfdane talked apart before they decided, and then the former said:

"If Astrid will wed me, it shall be as you say, Einar, lest men should deem us cowards, but seeing that you have no weapon of your own we will make our fight a wrestling bout, and it shall be on the cliff by the beacon, where he who is thrown will go headlong into the sea. You are famous for throws of that kind, friend. And Hrolf, because of that, shall have first bout."

"It were better to agree even to this," said Einar to Astrid. "If you are wedded what matter? I shall make an end of them all once I get my arms free and my grip on them, and you will be mine alone by nightfall"

"Then be it so," said Astrid. "For your sake be it so, Einar, and Odin grant you victory, Thor give you strength."

So when the twilight drew on and the great fire blazed ruddily on the many faces, the tables were set for the feast. The wine was brought in in great flagons, the loving-cup set by Hardrada's right hand, and the silver shoes placed near the bridal seat. They took Einar back to the small chamber and bolted him within, leaving him to listen alone, and the women brought a bridal dress for Astrid, and lit the lamps around the hall.

Then, pale, but tearless and firm because she thought only of Einar in doing it, Astrid suffered herself to be led in. She stood before Hardrada, and he smiled as fair a smile as his evil visage would allow—which was half a frown, after all—and gave her his hand to help her up the step into the great chair. He would have pressed her slim fingers, but they were cold as ice, and chilled him, so he forebore.

And Astrid sat at his side in the bridal-seat, and Thyra the maid put the silver shoes upon her feet and the golden crown upon her head, and Hrolf poured out the offerings to the gods, and chiefly to Bragi, god of happiness.

And then the loving-cup was filled, and Hardrada and she must both drink, and they were made man and wife.

* * * * * *

Einar, from the darkened chamber, heard fragments of the talk, and knew how things were going, and that Astrid was now the wife of his enemy, and the knowledge was very bitter. His heart misgave him of Hardrada's good faith. He struggled in his bonds again with fiercer effort, and rolled on the floor, trying to wear them out upon the hard stones. This time he was successful, and at last one arm was free. Then slowly he undid the other knots and shook the coils from him, and stood unfettered.

The small chamber had but one window, yet it was large enough for a man to creep out, and, scarcely knowing his object, he climbed through and stood in the open air. His first thought was to get round to the back of the house and seize some carle's weapon so that he might not be defenceless. He had taken but one step forward when a man with winged helmet sprang from behind the corner of the gable and seized him by the throat in a violent grasp.

* * * * * *

Now the wine was mounting into the heads of the men, and Hrolf Red-Hand was singing grim songs of fight and fire, and Alfdane was telling fey stories, and Hardskull was grinning knowingly from the bride-seat. Astrid thought the time passed slowly, yet all too quickly, for no sign was made of fulfilling the promise made with regard to Einar, and in her fear was impelled to question her lord. He laughed.

"Think you I keep every promise I make?" said he. "And did I say to-night? Never fear, we shall wrestle with this old love of yours, sweet wife, but I think it will be best to leave it till daylight. We are but new wed, and it would go hard to part so soon. And, perchance, Einar will be better for a good night's sleep."

And leaning over, with wine cup spilling its red stain on the floor, he whispered to Alfdane with a chuckle:

"And in the night a sharp knife can easily find a particular muscle, troll; and that muscle short, 'tis little wrestling our champion will do. It was a good thought of yours, troll."

Alfdane smiled evilly, but said no word.

At that moment there came a clatter of sharp blows upon the door. Hardskull sat upright startled, then he called thickly:

"Come in, stranger, out of the cold. This is our wedding feast, and all are welcome!"

The door opened, and I, Sigmund the Skald, stepped in.

CHAPTER XIV.

How Einar's Battle-axe was Broken.

It will not take long to tell how I came there.

Pressing south under all sail, not daring to draw in even one stitch of canvas for the fierce storm that lashed the sea into fury and chilled us to the marrow with its icy breath, the Long Dragon made good speed. When we saw the Garfreda lying off Tvedestrof we thought at first that she was the Eagle we were pursuing; but to find Algar, with eighty warriors, was the next best thing. Even then we scarcely hoped to equal the number of men under Hrolf and Hardrada.

Though the storm still continued we both sped on towards Hrolf's lair, where we of Raven's-nest shrewdly suspected our quarry to be. Labouring and tossing through the angry sea, baling out the bilge water without cessation, we came in sight of Strongness Rock on the evening of the second day. We perceived it bulking dimly ahead in the last faint light of the west, and then the shroud of the night hid us.

We had much to do to keep from running ashore on the jutting crags at the base of the rock, but at last we found anchorage to the lee of it and got to land in the yolles. Algar's first intention was to take Thora with us to lull suspicion, but Othnar would not hear of it, and we left her tied fast to the mast of the Garfreda. We took every man from both ships and crept up the long hill to the homestead under cover of the darkness. What little noise we made was drowned by the shrieking of the gale round the promontory.

Unseen, unheard, we reached the red-lit house, from whence came snatches of songs and the clatter of daggers and dishes. All Strongness was at the feast, it seemed, and doubtless Astrid was Hardrada's wife by now, and Einar, perchance, had been sacrificed to Thor. We whispered our plan quickly, fiercely determining that if we were too late we would take a terrible vengeance. Algar, with a hundred men, went round to the back of the house; Othnar, with the others, gathered before the great door. Three men we sent to the cliff edge to make an end of the sentry by the beacon if there should be one, and to fire it, so that we might have light for our work after the first surprise.

I stood with Othnar, waiting the signal that Algar was ready, when Algar himself came along the side of the house struggling with a great, unarmed man. It was a desperate struggle while it lasted, and I know not how it would have been ended, but within a few moments of their appearance the red tongue of the beacon shot up into the black sky, and the men saw each other.

"You have a strange way of greeting a friend, Algar Erikson!" gasped Einar, letting go his hold. "It is almost as bad to fall into a friend's hands as into a foes, methinks, at night. But whom have we here, by all the gods?"

We told him quickly, and in turn he told us how the feast had gone. Then, not giving himself time to rest, so fired and strengthened was he by the thought that both Astrid and vengeance were his now, he seized a shield from one of the men, his own sword and axe and the charred axe-head of his father's from Algar, and bade me knock on the oaken door.

"If all goes well," cried he, "there will be another wedding feast before many days, and it will be mine. Thunder on the door, skald; 'tis cold waiting out here."

So I knocked, and heard Hardrada bid all strangers welcome, and went in, half-closing it behind me so that those who stood without might not be seen. The men turned in their seats and stared at me in amaze, the knives and cups falling from their hands, the jests and laughter dying away on their lips.

Astrid gave a cry of joy and half rose from the seat, but Hardrada and Alfdane, whose heads were near together, glanced at me fearfully. And while they sat and stared, each man with hand on weapon, I stepped forward.

"Surely, Hardrada Hardskull," cried I, "you have a word of welcome for me? It was ill of you not to bid me to your marriage—me, Sigmund the Skald, who has verses for any man's ear. Let me sing now."

And I sang them this song:

Light are the windows,
Ruddy the logs burn,
Full are the wine-cups
At the wedding of Astrid.
Hrolf's at the wedding—
Hrolf and Hardrada,
And Alfdane the Rat—
At the wedding of Astrid.
But lighter the windows
And redder the fire-glow,
When those not invited
Sit down at the feast board.
When Sigmund the Skald comes,
And Othnar, named Wolf'sfang,
And Einar the Wonder,
And Algar, and others!

As I shouted the last lines those I named burst into the room, and the feast became a fight that men shall remember while skalds sing.

First Einar came, with Erikson at his heels, and then Othnar Wolf'sfang, with Kolbi of Raven's-nest behind him.

"You thought not I had so many friends, Hardskull," cried Einar. "You thought not to bid me welcome in this fashion. Come down from the bride-seat, niddering, and let me send you to Hela; or, if you are timid, this will perchance give you courage. You will know where I found it."

And the blackened axe-head, with the piece of charred shaft yet in it, went whirling over the people straight to Hardrada. He saw it coming, and lowered his head to escape it as he sprang down, but it was cast with a true aim. The yet keen point struck the top of his skull with a dull ring, and, glancing off, was transfixed in the wood of the chair-back.

"You are well named Hardskull," said Einar. "That would have split most men's heads open. And now, Algar, leave him, and see to Hrolf Red-hand."

"That will I," said Algar. "As I sent his father's brother, Killing-Hakon, to Odin, so will I send him. It is ill to keep families apart. Here's a sword, Red-Hand; let us test its worth."

"If you want a sword testing, my own will do," said Hrolf, and as he spoke the two blades flashed and smote in the flickering light.

The fight was general now, and most of the house-folk had got their backs to the wall, for the men we had sent to the rear were now at the inner doors, and there was no escape. Yet our enemies were stronger in number than ourselves, and for a time held their own in the riotous confusion. The women fled out into the cold night, unheeded by any, and in the midst of a mad turmoil of overturned tables, spilt ale and wine, and a food-strewn floor, the axes rose and fell, the swords clashed and rang, the javelins and arrows hissed, and cries and oaths were as thick upon men's tongues as falling leaves in Valhambrosa.

Now Einar had cut his way through the press of the opponents with the flaming strokes of Longsword, and now he met Hardrada face to face. In the bride-seat sat Astrid, having no way to turn, but she sat without fear through the clamour and the rain of missles, because Einar was near her, and free once more. But he looked not at her as he rushed on Hardrada. He thought only of his father and mother and the blackened ashes of the stead at North-hold, and his passion was terrible to see. He shot Longsword back into its sheath, and drove Hardrada before him with the terrific blows of his great axe until the traitor came to the fire, and could retreat no further.

"Now, craven—niddering," cried Einar, "if there be any manliness in you, look to yourself. By Heindall, the old god, who can hear the grass grow and will hear my vow even if he be asleep, I will send you to Hela to-night—I will strike you down to its uttermost depths!"

Thus taunted, the traitor made some show of fight, and for a while their axes rang and clashed without advantage to either.

Not far from them the swords of Algar and Hrolf were flashing and striking, but Algar was the better man, and before Einar had done with Hardrada had sent Hrolf's sword spinning from his hand and beaten him down to his knees. Then, with a swift, downward thrust, he gave Red-Hand his bane. But no sooner was Algar recovered from the overbalancing of the winning-blow than Swerkur the Strong attacked him, and there was a struggle worth seeing. Othnar Wolf'sfang was busy keeping the door, and on all sides men were falling, and groaning, and dying.

Now Hardrada's time was come, and Einar pressed him hard. With one swinging stroke of the battle-axe he dashed the other's weapon from his hand, with another he broke his foe's right arm, with the third he struck Hardrada full upon the crown of the head. The red-stained axe-blade crashed through the hard skull, splitting it open to the chin, and with a shrill, unfinished cry of fear, Hardrada fell forward and was no more. But as the awful crash of the breaking of the skull rang through the tumult, the steel of the axe fell apart upon the floor, shivered in twain by the mightiness of the blow, and the shaft snapped off short. And I remembered then the runes that I had read on it at Raven's-nest.

Einar had taken but one step forward when a man with a winged helmet seized him by the throat.

Einar laughed, and, seizing Longsword again, joined in the common fray. The house-folk were beaten already, but fought doggedly, selling their lives dearly, and there was work for all weapons yet. On our side fell Unod and Jon, and Thorlak Astrison and Kolbi, four very good men; and of the enemy, Thorgrimur, and Arslaw, and Sigismund Sour-face, and Eric Longbow, and Coll the Wrestler, all men of note. Othnar had a flesh wound on his sword-arm, but he kept on.

Algar and Swerkur yet strove in the midspace, and so far neither had touched the other so well were they matched. As the fight died out as our foes were ended one by one, some of us formed a ring round the two.

At last Swerkur's sword slipped from his hand. He threw his shield in Algar's face and regained the blade, but Algar was upon him as he stooped to seize it, and his end seemed near. But at that moment Alfdane the Wereman threw from behind the bride-seat, where he had hidden, a javelin that caught Algar in the left side and proved instantly his death.

I saw the Wereman half rise from his hiding-place, and called out to Othnar Wolf'sfang, who was nearest, but Einar had seen the deed also. Before the cry had well escaped me, Longsword had risen and fallen, and the Wereman had received the reward of his treachery.

Swerkur was now fighting with Othnar, who was yielding slowly because of his wounded arm. Othnar was very glad to see Longsword coming to his rescue for the second time.

"You are a brave man, and a strong one, Swerkur," cried Einar, "but you will ride with the Valkyrs to-night," and the next fierce flash of the rune-written blade sent our last foe to Valhalla.

Now the fight was fought and won, and Einar rested on his sword awhile, listening to the noise of the wind outside. Then he said:

"It has been a fight such as few have seen, Skald, and will do for you to sing of when men are in their warlike moods, but I am glad that it is done. It has cost us dear, if only for the loss of Algar Erikson, and I am weary of slaughter and feud. Let us get away as soon as may be, for the moon should be up now, and the storm seems to abate. Nay, Othnar, we will not fire the house. I have no grudge against Hrolf's women-folk, and they will find it, even as it is, but a sorry biding place till dawn. And you, Astrid, come with me. I have won you at last, and none can part us, but we will fulfill the condition that your father laid upon me, if it be possible."

So we left the house, full of the dead and the dying and the wreckage of the feast, as it was, and by moonlight and the last flickering glare of the beacon on the cliff, went slowly down the hill to the ships. The Long Dragon we found easily, also where the Vulture and Eagle lay, but there was no sign of the Garfreda, except the broken end of the grapnel chain on the rock. Einar and Astrid glanced at each other, speaking not, and it was I who said:

"The storm-god has taken vengeance on the fey one, by the Tree Igdrasil! It is well when the gods take these things out of our hands."

Still they looked silently at each other; then Einar turned and bade the men place the body of Algar on a bier of shields upon the deck of the Vulture and set her alight and adrift. They obeyed in wordless sorrow, and presently the ship, aflame from stem to stern, moved out upon her last voyage. At first a waving sheet of fire, and then a glow of vivid redness, and last a leaping spark far out to sea, she sailed away.

Then we put what few were left of Borg's men on board the Eagle, and Einar bade them return to the Fareys as best they might, and that for the lost Garfreda Borg might keep the Eagle. After that had cleared the headland the rest of us boarded the Long Dragon, and sailed for Nidaros.

We found the Destroyer safe and taut and ready for sea, and forthwith, leaving Othnar to his own ship, we of Raven's-nest went on the swift galley and put her bow for home. Through storm and calm, with matchless speed, we held on. The ship walked the watery glades of the ocean as a living thing, and the ceaseless hissing of the spray at her prow was sweetest music in the ears of Einar and Astrid, who were ever together, and had now neither eyes nor ears beyond each other save for the swift way of the vessel. By day they watched the passing coast and counted the waves; by night they considered the stars.

The year wanted but one day to its completion since Einar had sailed away in the Eagle to fulfil his vow when the oars of the Destroyer rippled the water of the fiord, and she drove proudly up to the landing-stage, and Sweyn and Alfifa met us, and little Arvak—now grown a very sturdy youth in his own opinion—and Norri, and all the other folk who were able to walk.

There were tears and laughter, much talk and long silences, songs and feastings and great stir in the hall at Raven's-nest when Astrid came home again, and I told them how Einar had passed the fateful year, and never was known so great a wedding feast as that of Astrid and Einar Longsword. Folk came from long distances to see and hear of those who had done such deeds; and Othnar Wolf'sfang, having reached Raven's-nest in the Long Dragon by then, must needs invite himself to the merrymaking.

Men drank more than was good for them that day, and next morning there were many dull heads to go away through the snow. But there was talk of another feast soon, when Einar would be made Sweyn's house-man until Arvak should come of age, and as Othnar went down to his ship he was full of that.

"I shall not go on Viking cruise now," said he. "I have seen enough fighting for the season, and I will stay at home if only for another feast so glorious as this. I shall come early, have no fear, although it will not be by way of Saddle-back Ridge, as Sigmund came to Trollfell. But the wine and the merriment made me forget, Einar, what I heard at Tvedestrof where we touched coming up. They said that an old galley had been found wrecked on a rock near by, with the body of a dead woman bound to her broken mast. And the woman, they said, had been fair to look upon."

"The gods are stern," said Einar, looking at Astrid fondly. "But what is done we cannot undo; let us try to forget."

And the Long Dragon, amid many farewells and promises, sailed slowly up the fiord towards Trollfell, and we turned back to the warm house.

And this is the end of the saga of the wooing of Einar Longsword and Astrid the Beautiful.

The End.

Miss Emilia: "My sister fell and broke her limb."

Old Mr. Jones: "Which limb?"

Miss Emilia (blushing): "Well, if I must tell you, it was her left walker."

Jack Dashing: "She's the most uninteresting girl I ever met, though she is rich. She can't say anything but 'yes' and 'no.'"

Priscilla: "Which did she say to you?"

A six-year-old little fellow was forced to wear a shirt three sizes too large for him. After strutting about a little while, he burst out with:

"Mother, I feel awful lonely in this shirt!"

"Dear me," said the girl with black, snappy eyes; "I wish I was a football player!"

"What do you mean?" asked her mother, aghast.

"Just what I say. I wish I was a football player, and that hateful little Sallie Giggles was on the other side."

"I hear you intend naming your paper The Record, Faber?"

"I had thought of that name with favour, Pennibus."

"Don't do it, I implore you."

"Why?"

"The record is so easily broken now."

CARE OF THE SKIN.

We wish to urge on all readers of this paper the extreme importance of having a healthy skin. If the pores are clogged, whether by the neglect of the ordinary rules of health, or by some skin disease, ill-health is sure to result. Apart from the unsightly appearance of an ever-present rash, the intolerable itching causes broken rest, and a variety of unpleasant symptoms.

ECZEMA.

The chief Skin Trouble to which the skin is liable is known as Eczema, which is merely a light-sounding name for a cold or catarrh affecting the skin. If Eczema is acute the part affected is red and hot, and burns and weeps. If it is a chronic variety, the surface is dry, often scaly, and there is great skin irritation.

Mr. Geo. C. Fellowes Simmons, of R.N.T. College, Devonport, writes: "The cure affected by your 'Antexema' was such that it has given me perfect faith in your remedy, and I am now taking your Blood Granules, which I only hope and believe will cure me internally as your 'Antexema' has cured the external eruption."

ECZEMA OF THE LEGS.

Simple eczema of the legs is quickly removed by means of the "Antexema" treatment. For particulars see Page 11 of our Booklet.

Mrs. E. Cufflin, of 10 Grove Street, Bedford Street, Leicester, writes: "I thank God and you for the relief I have got from your 'Antexema.' For two years I have suffered great pain in my legs. About two months ago they began to be rough and inflamed. Seeing your advt., I sent for a free sample, which I received from you the following day. By the time I had used the sample bottle of 'Antexema' my legs were healed."

INFANTILE ECZEMA.

Eczema affecting children is frequently caused by the use of strong soaps, and by wearing underclothing from which the soap or soda has been imperfectly removed. Fevers, teething, and a diet containing too much sugar are also said to be frequent causes.

Mr. Richard Bell, of 13 Spring Gardens, Hawthorne Avenue, Hull, writes: "Some seven weeks ago two of my children were attacked with infantile eczema. I was recommended to write for a sample of your 'Antexema,' which was quickly sent. I purchased a further supply, and in less than a fortnight my children were quite cured of the eczema."

ECZEMA OF THE HANDS.

With a little care it is not difficult to have nice hands. Do not wet them more than is absolutely necessary, and do not use strong acrid soaps. People who use their hands freely, as in nearly every trade, and especially those engaged in laundry work, always suffer more or less from hand troubles. "Antexema" is an excellent remedy for any form of eczema caused by the action of irritants, and it is an equally necessary household requisite to keep the skin in good condition, when red, rough, and dirty-looking.

Mrs. A. Chapman, of Riby, near Stallingboro', Lincs., writes: "'Antexema' is a wonderful specific for eczema. I had it in my hands, and after using a bottle of your 'Antexema' it disappeared."

Miss R. P. Dovey, of 234 Old Christchurch Road, Bournemouth, writes: "'Antexema' is so good that she will always keep it for toilet use. She hopes this testimony will bring you many customers."

IN these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver plated pencil-cases or ten popular six shilling novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, SHORT STORIES, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by first post on Monday, July 30th, 1900.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

THE BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL*—Article on "Drugged Foods," June 4th, 1898—says:

"There is a general concensus of opinion that the addition of active drugs, belonging to the classes of nervine stimulants to beverages and articles of dietary in ordinary domestic use is not for the benefit of the community, and is likely in time to produce a deterioration of the public health. . . At the present moment we are beset by another danger arising from the addition of kola to certain articles of food. . . Kola has been found on analysis to contain 2·13 per cent. of caffeine. Caffeine is undoubtedly a useful drug when employed in suitable cases and in appropriate doses, but if taken habitually in large quantities it is capable of inducing an undesirable condition of over-stimulation of the nerve centres."

A RIVER STORY.

Two young men in flannels stood on the landing-stage of Messrs. Daws' boat house, which is situated under the bridge at Great Marlow. They were of the ordinary type of young Englishmen who spend five and a half days in the City and the remainder on the river.

"We want a canoe," said Adam to Daws, who was asking their requirements.

Daws was sorry but there was not one.

Adam's eye drifted among the punts and boats tied up to the stage, and rested inquiringly on a white canoe, with green silk cushions, that rocked daintily at the end of her white line.

Heathcote, of the red hair, went over and rested his shoe on the little white boat.

"Can't we have this?"

No, that was a private one.

Heathcote moved it and saw the name, My Queen, in gold letters. It was a very small Canadian canoe and evidently new.

"Smart one that; whose is it?" he asked.

"Don't know, sir, I'm sure. Came down from Wilders', of Maidenhead, last night with no name; just an order that the owners were coming to-day. Belongs to two ladies, I think one of the men said," replied Daws.

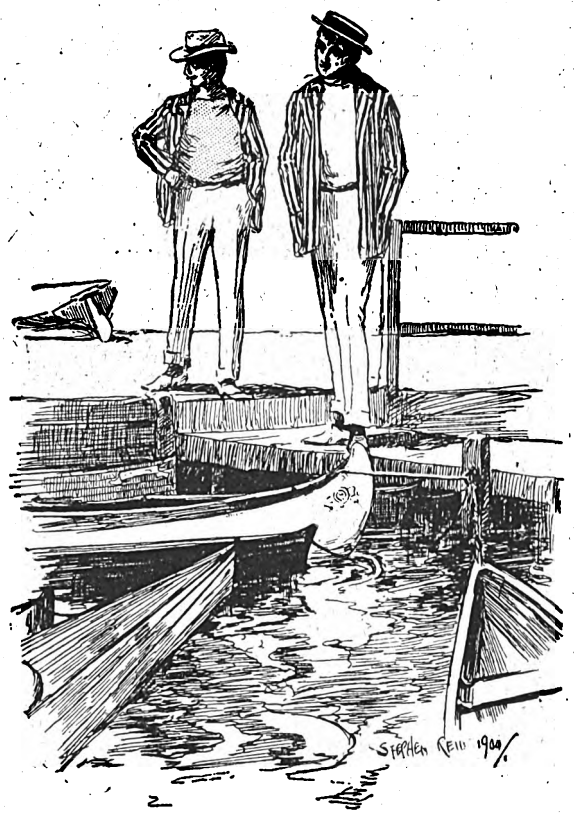
Adam fancied himself with one lady in the canoe, but said nothing. Adam very often did fancy himself. He was dark and slim, with grey expressive eyes and gifted with more than the ordinary amount of self-complacency that is usual amongst young men. But then he was his uncle's heir and that made a difference.

So he took a skiff and sculled away across the river with Heathcote engaged, behind a big cigar, in the ardous task of steering. It was a magnificent Sunday with an Italian sky overhead and scarcely any stream at all. Heathcote's eyes closed and he let the lines fall slack.

Adam looked at him with amusement. His head had fallen back on the turkey red cushion and his cigar had gone out. Then he slipped the sculls and settled himself down to lazily enjoy the perfect afternoon. The boat drifted a little, unnoticed by its occupants, then a little more, and then got caught in a few weeds and roots and swung round.

Suddenly both young men felt a violent shock that nearly capsized them and found themselves being rudely shaken back again.

Heathcote sat up, his face as red as his hair and a strong expression came from Adam's end of the boat. Their assailant was a tall young man in grey flannels who was sculling alone, and at a good rate, and quite close to the bank, too.



"Smart one that; whose is it?"

"What the dickens do you mean, sir?" cried Heathcote angrily, "Can't you look where you are going?"

"Sorry," was all the offender vouchsafed as he laid vigorously to his oars with the apparent intention of making up for lost time.

"Sorry be hanged!" retorted Adam, "If you don't know the way to row, get someone to teach you!" which was a somewhat unnecessary remark, as the stranger was a good oarsman. But Adam was nettled. The sudden collision had startled him.

"If you don't know the right side of the river, tie your boat up and walk!" came the reply of the fast disappearing man in grey, and a punt full of girls, which was passing, laughed.

Heathcote looked round him suddenly. They were on the wrong side!

They were both silent. Both wanted to blame the other because there is nothing so humiliating as being made a fool of on the river. Both were experienced boatmen and then to be caught over such a simple matter as the wrong side of the water!

Adam put the oars out and pulled savagely across to the other side.

Heathcote did nothing—one of the girls in the punt, which had just passed, knew him, and he felt sure that the little incident would get repeated and that he would not shine as the hero.

"I hate a boat!" said Adam suddenly. "With a fool in it like you that can't steer, it's no pleasure."

Heathcote opened his eyes wide, "By jove! I like that," he said. "Go back and get a punt, old chap."

And Adam did.

Daws shook his head.

"Just too late, sir, 'ad a nice one five minutes ago, that gentleman just gone out with two ladies in it," and he indicated a party in the distance.

Adam looked. Two sunshades in front of several cushions and a tall man in grey who stood behind and punted with long graceful strokes.

"Well, I'm hanged!" was all he said as he recognised the figure. "I wonder who that fellow is?"

"Let's go into the George and Dragon and find out," remarked Heathcote as he put on his coat and lit a cigarette.

"Yes, I owe him one. I'll find out all about him."

But somehow they didn't.

Nobody seemed to recognise the description or know anything about him; which was curious, as the George and Dragon was held to be the great authority on those matters in the whole of Marlow.

"Some bounder down from Saturday to Monday, I suppose," said Adam, to ease his own feelings, and then they both went home to tea.

In the evening they went on the water again.

The little white canoe was up under cover then and her cushions were put carefully away. Her owners had not come.

On Monday morning the London train was ready to start, the guard's whistle was in his mouth, and comfortably ensconced in the corner seats of a first class smoking carriage, sat our friends of the day before.

Then there was the scatter of porters and the babel of excited voices.

Then the door of their carriage was flung violently open and a man jumped in.

Both occupants looked up.

The new comer was tall and slight and dressed in grey.

Adam looked across at Heathcote. Neither wore a very pleased expression, but the latter turned away and looked out of the window.

As they passed the end of the station he saw a dog cart, in which were seated two girls. Heathcote had as keen an eye of feminine beauty as any man and he started up with a short exclamation.

"By Jove, Adam! Look at those!" They were both young and yet evidently not sisters although somewhat alike in figure. One, who was driving was dressed in a rather severely cut light green dress while the other who was fair was in pink.

That they were both exceedingly pretty was all that the two men could see, as the train was gathering speed.

"I wonder who they are?" said Heathcote, who prided himself that he knew everyone.

"That's three to find out," replied his friend with a side look at the third occupant of the carriage.

"I wonder if Deacon is in this train; I hope not," said Adam presently.

"Wouldn't be a bit surprised; he is staying down here with his wife somewhere, he told me so."

Deacon, be it known, was the head of the large stock-broking firm of which the two young men were junior members.

"I wonder what sort of wife he has got this time; some old one I suppose who has caught him for his money," said Adam.

The stranger rustled the leaves of the paper he was reading.

"Not he! I hear she is quite young and pretty too — plays the guitar, and sings or does something. Deacon knows what he's after. Mrs. D——, number one, was enough of the old kind to satisfy him. This one is young enough to be his daughter, they say."

"Good gracions, girls will marry anything," said Adam.

"Yes, my boy, with £14,000 a year, they will!"

The leaves of the paper rustled again.

Adam looked across the carriage. The stranger was frowning as if the news were unpleasant.

Adam wrote on the margin of the Telegraph:

"The Johnnie does not like our conversation; perhaps he knows her."

Heathcote read it and wrote underneath:

And they both laughed.

The same evening they were in Hurley lock The gates were open although there were several boats already inside. Adam was leaning back in the punt and watching three fat Germans who were trying to get a hold with the boat hook, and he did not notice Heathcote (who was standing up) become suddenly very intent on the open lock gates.

A canoe with two occupants shot through the gates.

Suddenly he heard him say in a low, rather intense voice:

"Adam, look what's coming in!"

The young man turned to see a canoe with two occupants shoot through the gates, propelled by one swift stroke, and ride coquettishly alongside their punt.

All eyes were directed to the little craft. It was white, with gold letters and green silk cushions.

Gracefully reposing at one end was a girl with fair hair and a pink dress, while paddling, was another in green.

Adam gave a gasp, and having his hand over the side,

My Queen passed and crushed it between the two boats.

"Sorry," said the girl in green, giving him a look out of her large brown eyes, and Adam straightway felt as if he were honoured in having the skin taken off his knuckles.

He bowed gracefully.

"Pray, don't mention it," he said gallantly, hiding his hand so as not to let her see the blood.

The fair girl turned at the sound of his voice and regarded him with a slow inquiring glance.

The young man was unable to decide whether the girl in green with the magnificent eyes and the hair done à la Merode was prettier than the more fragile beauty of the girl in pink with the fluffy golden hair and the white sun-bonnet, or vice versa.

He was most anxious to prolong the conversation but could find no way to do so.

"Got any change, Adam?" demanded Heathcote, whose eyes had been fixed on the fair paddler ever since the canoe came into the lock.

Adam put his hand into his pocket and the girl in pink saw it was covered in blood.

"Oh, Cecile!" she said in a pained voice. "Look at his hand, you did that with the canoe. How horrid of you."

Cecile looked at the hand—rather indifferently. "I'm sorry, but you should not keep your hands outside the boat. They are apt to get hurt," she said.

Adam was delighted.

He acknowleged he was wrong but pronounced his intention to err again if he thought they would again honour him in a like manner.

The girl in the sun-bonnet pursed up her little red mouth, and Cecile did not reply at all.

The lock gates were opening and there being no launches to go first, the white canoe shot forward ahead of all the other craft and was soon out in the open river.

"Poor young man, you did hurt him, Cecile," said the girl in pink.

"Do him good. He was so much taken up looking at you, that he wouldn't have minded if I had cut his hand off!"

"Ditto, Mr. Redhead with you," was the reply.

Cecile shuddered.

"Can't stand red hair, my dear," she answered.

"No, you seem to prefer them rather bald!" replied her companion.

"Less hair—more intellect,' said Cecile.

Her companion suddenly sat up and the canoe rocked perilously.

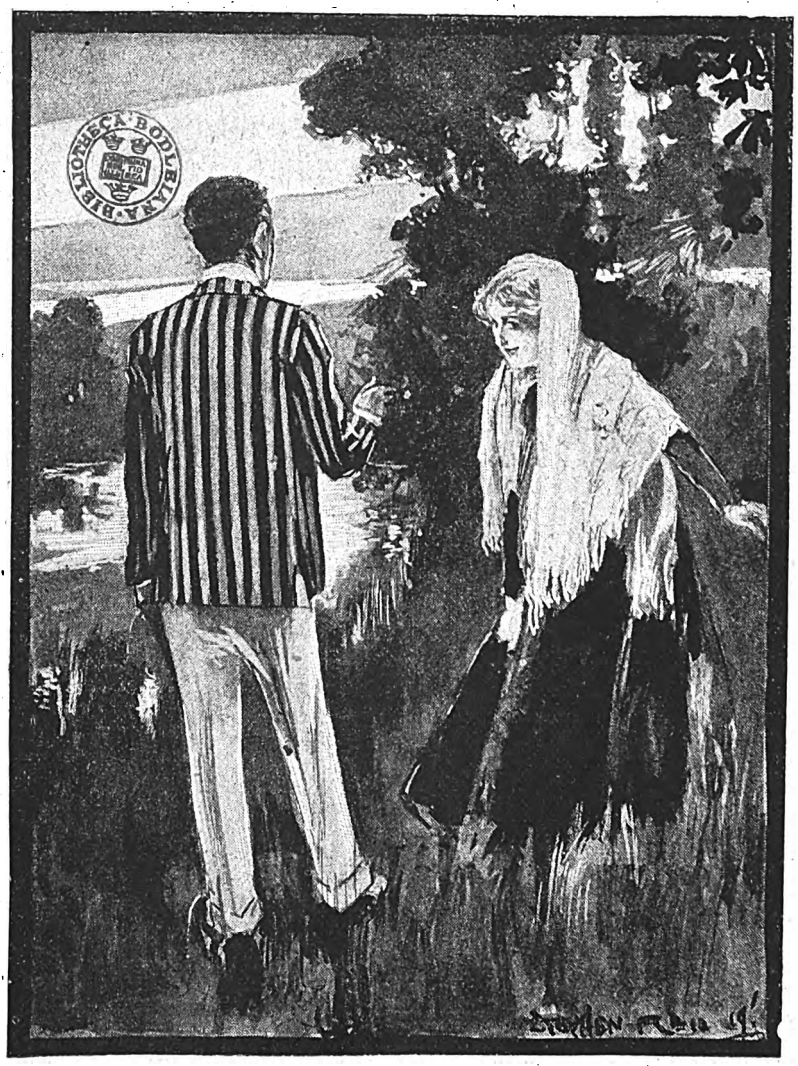
"I say, Cecile," she said, her blue eyes dancing with fun. "Shall we ask them if they would care to change places with us for a little while? Red hair can come in with you, and I will go in the punt with the injured hand."

Cecile rested the paddle and stared at her.

"You must be quite mad! I shall take you home if this is how you intend to behave!" she said severely.

"On the contrary, it is I who will take you home now, you have been working long enough. Get up against that tank and we will change places."

Half an hour later, Adam and Heathcote who had now got ahead passed the canoe, going at a smart rate, the figure in pink being now at the end. Adam raised his hat, to which the canoeist responded by a saucy little nod, but Cecile's eyes were shut and she made no movement, which cast down the heart of Heathcote.



"That's a good thing. Cecile doesn't like boys."

"Going to the wedding?" inquired the landlord of the Chequers, as Heathcote strolled in that night.

"What wedding? I haven't heard about any wedding!" he retorted rather testily.

The landlord raised his eyebrows. "Thought you knew everything!" he said with a chuckle. "Well, I'll tell you. Lord and Lady Martin's daughter, the Hon Miss Blair is to be married here on Friday. They've taken the big house up by Hurley, and the wedding is to take place in the church on the river. It's to be a grand wedding, I'm told."

"Oh, indeed. I've heard of her, she's pretty, isn't she?"

"I don't rightly know that. she doesn't come into the town here much, so nobody knows her. They are very select people, and keep themselves very much to themselves."

"Who is she going to marry?"

"Gentleman in the Guards, sir—Fitzhoward, I think his name is, you should go to the wedding, sir, it will be a grand affair."

"I daresay Deacon's going. I'll get him to get me an invitation."

"They might be there," said Heathcote in an undertone to Adam.

The landlord caught the name.

"Deacon—yes, Mr. Deacon came in here and told me all about it," he said.

Adam was dubious. It was one thing to be employed in a rich stockbroking firm, but it was quite another to ask the head of it for invitations to select weddings.

But Heathcote determined that he would ask, whether his request was granted or not.

They had met the two girls in the white canoe several times but could never get a chance to speak to them.

Adam, it is true, raised his hat to them, and the girl in pink always smiled, but further than that they could not get.

However, one night, when Adam was strolling alone by the riverside smoking a cigar before turning in, he met the girl in pink as they called her dressed in some clinging black material, and with a fleecy white shawl over her head.

She started when she saw his solitary figure and seemed half inclined to go back. However she changed her mind and ran on calling "puss, puss!"

Here was Adam's opportunity.

"Allow me to help you look for your cat," he said. raising his cap, inwardly thankful that Heathcote wasn't there.

She recognised his voice directly.

"Oh it's you!" she said with a little laugh. "How glad I am! I thought you were a tramp! Yes, do help me find the cat. It is a grey Persian and one of the presents, so I dare not lose it," she said.

Adam passed over the humiliating fact of having been taken for a tramp and hunted diligently.

"Was it a birthday present?" he asked.

"Oh, no—one of the wedding presents. The wedding on Friday, you know, so it mustn't be lost. Besides it is very valuable," was the reply.

The wedding? Adam's mental vision brightened considerably. He would get in ahead of Heathcote yet!

"I want to go to the wedding, awfully," he said. "I've heard that it is to be very pretty."

"I can get you a card, if you like," she said readily.

"Oh, it is too kind of you. I should like it so much—and—will you be there?" he asked.

The two young men read the name.

There was silence for a minute. Then she said:

"Yes, I shall be there."

"Then I shall enjoy it much more—shall I see you?"

"Oh, I dare say you will if you look," she said archly.

Adam replied fervently that he would look.

"There!" she said suddenly, "I think I saw its tail disappear in those bushes!"

"Mind, they are at the water's edge and you might fall in. What should I do then?" asked the young man.

"It wouldn't matter if I did fall in. You are here to save me!" she said with a side glance from her laughing eyes.

Adam felt his heart begin to beat rather fast.

The girl continued:

"It is a good thing Cecile isn't here, she would be shocked."

"Would she?" looking with admiration at her dainty little figure.

"Yes, she's very severe, you know."

"She looks it—I don't like severe women"

Digitized by Google

"That's a good thing. Cecile doesn't like boys!"

Adam said nothing. He was twenty-three years old and felt the word "boy" to be a thing of the past.

Just then he felt a soft rubbing against his leg and looked down to see a small grey kitten beside him. He handed it to the girl.

"Oh, thank you so much. I am so glad you found it Good-night, I must run in now. Tell me where I am to send the invitation to?" she said.

He took out his card and gave it to her.

Another moment and he was alone.

Thursday came, and Thursday drew towards a close, and Heathcote had got no further with his intention of asking Mrs. Deacon for the invitation.

Adam, the silent, hugged the square of pasteboard in his pocket book and got leave for the day.

He had put up with the boastfulness of Heathcote long enough he said, and besides hadn't the prettiest girl in Marlow sent it to him herself?

It was a stifling day in town and both young men gave a sigh of thankfulness as they got into the train for Marlow.

Heathcote wore a very long face. He confided to Adam that Deacon had looked him up and down and told him he was very sorry he could not get him the invitation.

"You see," he said, "the Martin's are so very particular, and do all their own inviting—I am only one of the guests."

The train was now full of people and three other men got into their carriage, one of them by a strange coincidence, being their old enemy the man in the grey suit.

It seemed as if the presence of this man was the crowning blow to Heathcote. He acted upon him like a red rag to a bull. To start with, he was over six feet and was dark, whereas Heathcote was only medium height, with fiery red hair, one of the banes of his existence.

He grumbled at the heat, the dust, the stuffiness of the carriage, the tobacco somebody was smoking and the dearth of news in the papers, all the way down.

Adam smiled on.

"It makes me mad about that wedding. Those girls are sure to be there, and I'm out of it," Heathcote cried.

"Did you ask Deacon to invite me as well?" put in his friend.

Heathcote raised his sandy eyebrows.

"Hardly," he said. "If a man can't do that for himself he can stay away!"

"Oh, it didn't matter in the least—because I'm going!" replied Adam easily.

Heathcote's mouth opened. "Who invited you?" he asked in amazement.

"She did," answered Adam, with unmistakable emphasis on the pronoun.

The tall man in grey was looking at him, his brows slightly contracted.

"By jove!" ejaculated Heathcote his face getting redder than usual. "Didn't you ask her to invite me?"

"Hardly!" responded Adam.

"If a man can't do that for himself, he can stay away!"

"Well, I'm hanged!" was all the answer.

As they slowly drew into the station, who should they see but two familiar figures, one in green, and one in pink, standing on the platform.

Heathcote jumped up excitedly.

"There they are! I'd give a bob to know who those two girls are," he cried.

"I think I can help you, and it will save your money," said the cool voice of the tall man in grey, as he reached up for his hat.

"The lady in green is my sister—Mrs. Deacon, and the lady in pink is the Hon. Miss Blair. Allow me to give you my card!" and he stepped out.

And the two young men read the name: "Captain Laurence Fitzhoward—Royal Horse Guards—"

Erroll Stanhope.

ELSIE EVANS' STEPMOTHER.

The Story of an Elopement and a Misunderstanding.

ELSIE EVANS and Herbert Drew were riding along a country lane one bright July morning. This was an almost daily occurrence with them, but to-day, instead of cantering gaily along, the ponies, Bangs and Dixie, were allowed to make their own pace.

They trotted along slowly, coming down at last to a walk in which they edged closer together and finally stopped altogether under the shade of a large oak-tree. This seemed to suit their riders, so Bangs moved up to where he got the benefit of Dixie's tail-swishings and flapped his own little brush impotently on the other side. Both waited for orders.

"Is there nothing that will alter your decision, Bert?" the girl was saying.

"No, my dear, nothing," he answered. "You see, father is so opposed to the newspaper business. He believes all that cheap talk about prying reporters and he thinks I can't be a gentleman in that life. If he would speak a word for me I might get a good job in Southampton, but he won't, and, in fact, I think he kept me out of the last thing I tried for.

"Well, Jack Leonard has found this berth for me on a Glasgow paper and I have accepted and shall go. It will be a bit of a drudgery, for the pay is small, but I shall succeed at that and at nothing else. I'm a good reporter and the training I shall get on a newspaper I can get nowhere else. I shall write a book sometime, but it will be after I have lived long enough, so that it's all reporting—all about real people and things."

Elsie only sighed at his enthusiasm.

"Herbert," she went on, "I simply can't let you go. Life is so uninteresting since father married again. They are not actually unkind, but they don't care where I go or what I do. I'm number three at home. It's tiresome, Bert, and I do love you so. Oh, take me with you if you must go!"

"My darling, I wish I could, and I shall come back for you just as soon as I can. But I shall have to sell Bangs to get money to buy my ticket."

Bangs' ears went up at the sound of his name, and Bert leant over and scratched the delicate ears.

"Heard me, did you, old fellow? It's a crying shame to sell him at an auction, as I must do. I don't suppose I'll get half what he's worth. He's all I've got that's my very own except my watch, and I can't very well get on without that."

"When do you go?" asked Elsie.

There was a weary tone in her voice. She had given up arguing with him and was trying to learn the first page of a woman's lesson, that decisions were not her part. She must stand by and wait.

"I suppose I shall go to-morrow night. To-morrow morning I must arrange about Bangs, get him sold, if possible. This evening I must have a final interview with father. I'm not going to run away, and I don't mean to quarrel with him. To-morrow will be more than full with packing and the last little things that must be done. I'm afraid this must be 'good-bye' for us, dearest. Don't grieve, little girl. I'm going to succeed and come back for you."

"I'll do my best, Bert, but, oh dear, so many things can happen and I've nothing to do but wait."

They rode in silence back along the lane and then took the road leading to Elsie's home. In a quiet spot they stopped and said "good-bye."

Elsie was too proud to make a scene, and she waved quite bravely to Bert as he rode away; but as soon as he was out of sight her head went down on the pony's neck and she sobbed till Dixie became restless and, taking the law into her own hands, walked out into the road.

As her young mistress straightened up and arranged her habit Dixie ventured to walk quickly for a few yards, and as Elsie further recovered and Dixie felt a firm knee against her shoulder, she trotted along easily till they reached home.

The next morning Bangs was surprised to find his head turned towards Southampton instead of towards the pleasant country roads. He resented this change of programme heartily, and in a moment of abstraction Herbert found himself going in the opposite direction to that which he intended.

"You want one more canter through the lanes, old fellow?" he said. "Well, all right, only you must not get too heated or you won't look well when I get you in town." So they ambled slowly along till they came once more to the tree where they had stopped the day before. There they stopped and Bert dismounted and began to caress the pony and examine his points critically.

"There isn't a pimple on him," he said at length; "it's a shame to let him go for less than fifty."

Bangs took the petting Bert lavished on him absently. His bright eyes were fixed on the road ahead and at last he gave a little snort of delight.

Elsie had started out to take her usual morning exercise with a heavy heart, and hardly noticed where Dixie was taking her till they clattered over the bridge at the end of the favourite lane.

"Oh, Dixie," she cried, "not there to-day."

And she reined her in sharply and turned her round. But Dixie had a mind of her own and she wheeled again and started off down the lane.

Elsie did not check her again, and she soon saw Bert under the tree and blessed the little mare for her instinct.

The ponies and their riders greeted each other warmly.

"I never supposed you would be here to-day," said Elsie, with rising colour, "but as we have met by accident you must tell me how you have got along so far."

"Well, I told father last night and he simply said: 'I'm disappointed in you, my son, but as you are so headstrong I must let you go your own way. You must not expect me to help you.' Then I told him of our engagement and he sneered right out and said: 'Why don't you elope with her and take her along, since your hopes are so high?'"

Herbert stood looking down dejectedly. Finally Elsie said shyly:

"Why don't you, Bert?"

He came close to her and read her eyes in silence, and the temptation became too strong and he yielded.

"I believe you mean it, and if you do I'm going to take you with me, though I won't elope. I won't steal you away as though we were ashamed. How can I, though, unless Bangs brings more than I think he will?"

"Dixie is my own, too," Elsie ventured timidly, "why not sell her? And as for stealing away with me, no one cares where I go, or would bother to come and see us married except my chum, Nellie Grant. I'll arrange it all right at home. I know it isn't the right or usual thing for me to urge you to take me, but I have only you, Bert."

She hung her pretty head and cried a little, so Bert agreed to take both horses to town, make all arrangements, and meet Elsie and Nellie at five o'clock.

Then they rode back to Elsie's home and she told the groom who came out to meet her that Mr. Drew was going to take Dixie over to Nellie Grant's for her to ride in the afternoon. "Miss Grant's horse is lame," she finished glibly.

Bert looked at her in some astonishment. He could have told the necessary lie, but the unnecessary embellishment was beyond him. He did not know women very well.

Elsie ran upstairs with a careless "good-bye" and Bert rode away leading Dixie.

Elsie changed her riding habit for a tailor-made gown, filled a small hand-bag with small necessities, and rang for a maid.

"I don't want to go down to luncheon. Bring me up something light, and ask Porter if father or his wife say anything about my absence at the table."

When the girl came up for the dishes she brought the report that master had said, "Is Elsie out to lunch?" and mistress had said, "I suppose she is at Nellie's."

"Much they care where I am," muttered the girl. "Marie, bring me my writing-case," she said aloud. Then she penned the following bitter little note:

DEAR FATHER,—I was not at Nellie's at lunch time, but as you seem to care so little where I lunch, I think I will lunch to-morrow in Glasgow. In fact I am going to be married to-night to Herbert Drew. I am not eloping with him, as his father knows we are to be married. We have sold our ponies and Herbert has a good position in Glasgow, so you need not trouble yourself even to provide an allowance for me hereafter. I know it will be a relief to you to have me out of the way and provided for.

ELSIE.

Having written this cold little note, Elsie cried bitterly and would very likely have torn it up had not the sound of wheels drawn her attention to the window.

There was her handsome father gallantly handing his young wife into the carriage. He even kissed her hand as he sat down beside her, and a loving look passed between them. That settled it, and she placed the note in a conspicuous place on her desk.

Then a new thought struck her. "Why should she go without her clothes?" So she drew out a small steamer trunk and hastily packed it with clothing. Then she summoned John the gardener and said she had a trunk of clothes she wanted to send off, and would he take it down to the station for her, and she would go later and attend to it.

John was stupid and willing, so she had no trouble, and she soon followed him out of the house and made her way to her friend, Nellie Grant.

Nellie was younger and more indiscreet than Elsie, and she entered very readily into her plans, and the two accordingly met Bert at the appointed time and place.

Bert was radiantly happy; he had obtained an advance of fifty pounds on the two ponies, he had his license, and already felt sure that success and happiness were all the future had for them.

They were married at a registry office, and the two young people started away with hearts free from care, sure that love and pluck were to make them the happiest of young couples.

"We may get more money for the ponies, dear; you see I had to leave them as there is no auction till to-morrow, but Mr. Buckley is an old friend of father's and he gave me the advance willingly. He looked a little sharply at Dixie, but I could not tell whether he recognised her or not. Well, here we are together for all time, and free to go where we like and make our own life."

A week later when they were comfortably settled in a modest but home-like boarding house in Glasgow, two letters came for Elsie over which she cried her first tears since she became Mrs. Drew. But the tears washed away all the bitterness of her heart and left her quite happy. These were the letters.

MY DEAR DAUGHTER,—You have quite misunderstood my wife and myself in regard to our feelings towards you. We thought you resented our marriage and that the best course to pursue was to let you entirely alone. We now see our mistake, and that we appeared to you entirely selfish. We hope the new life will bring you great happiness and that you will write and tell us how you are getting on. I will do as you wish about not sending your allowance, but will place it in the bank to your account, and if it should ever be that you need it you can draw on it. I attended Buckley's auction last Wednesday and bought two ponies that answer to the names of Bangs and Dixie. Mrs. Evans has convinced me that I am not too old to ride, and we propose to use them till their former owners come south again. They are rubbing noses now down in the small meadow, and no doubt wondering where you and Bert are. Tell your husband, my dear, to write and ask me to forgive him for stealing you. I will do it, though I would rather have made it a gift.

YOUR LOVING FATHER.

DEAR ELSIE,—I have cried over your note many times. Oh, dear little girl, if you only knew how much I wished you would love me and be like a sister to me. I never expected to be your mother; why, there is only three years' difference in our ages. But you south-country people are so cold—I never could seem to get near you, and your father always laughed when I told him and said: "Well, Elsie is odd, but she will come round." And you never told me of your engagement! I should have liked to plan your wedding, and if it had had to be in a hurry because of that cross old dad of Bert's you could have had my veil and things. But never mind that. Sometimes marriages like yours turn out the happiest. I hope yours will, and that you will soon come home to visit us.

Your loving friend,

AMELIE EVANS.

Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XVI.—HE GOES IN FOR PRIVATE THEATRICALS BUT DOESN'T SUCCEED.

THERE was a furtive smile of triumph on Mr. Bowser's face as he sat down to his cigar the other evening and at the same time took a dozen pages of typewritten matter from his pocket and began to look them over.

It was two or three minutes before Mrs. Bowser's womanly curiosity forced her to ask:

"Is that an article you have written for the newspapers?"

"Not exactly," he replied as his smile deepened.

"Perhaps it's a poem?"

"Hardly."

"Is it a contract?"

"My dear woman," said Mr. Bowser in his most fatherly way as he turned to her, "I have got a little surprise for you. I hadn't meant to tell you for several days yet, but as your curiosity has been aroused and as I may need your assistance, I'll give the thing away now. You know, of course, that I belong to the Booth Dramatic and Literary Club?"

"Yes."

"Well, we are to put on a play in about two weeks, and the proceeds are to go to the war fund."

"You don't say so!"

"Why don't I say so?" he demanded, as the smile chased itself round to the back of his neck all of a sudden. "Is there anything strange in the Booth Dramatic and Literary Club giving a play by amateurs?"

"But none of you are dramatic or literary," she protested. "You simply play billiards and poker and drink whiskies and sodas."

"You'd look nice being dandled!"

Mr. Bowser rose up and looked down upon her with a look meant to squeeze the life out of her body under a pressure of four hundred pounds to the square inch. He fully intended to annihilate her then and there, but he suddenly remembered that he wanted her assistance, and so he contented himself with saying:

"Perhaps you are not to blame for your ignorance, but please don't be malicious. We are to put on a play. The title is: Why Mr. Dobbins Didn't Get Married. It may please you or displease you to know that I have been chosen for the part of Dobbins."

"Is it really so?" queried Mrs. Bowser with a puzzled look on her face.

"It is really so. Here is my part.

Digitized by Google

I just got it this afternoon. I also have the part of the Widow Winkle, and I want you to read it and give me the cues. We shall have a rehearsal in four or five days. I haven't the slightest egotism about me, as you well know, but I am ready to declare that I expect to make a great hit as Dobbins. I have been told over and over again that I should have chosen the stage for a profession."

"But you never said anything to me about it."

"No? Well, several things have happened which I never said anything to you about, and this is one of them. Will you read the part of the widow?"

"Why, Mr. Bowser!" she exclaimed, after glancing over his part, "how can you ever play this character of Dobbins? Dobbins is supposed to be a little stumpy man weighing about ninety pounds. That is to set off against the widow, who is a large woman and weighs about half a ton."

"But I'm going to make up for the part, ain't I?" he queried with a note of alarm in his voice.

"Can you chop your legs off to play this part? And, you see, Mr. Dobbins makes his entrance through a dumb waiter. Just imagine your trying to squeeze yourself into a dumb waiter. And after he makes his entrance the widow picks him up and dandles him on her knee. You'd look nice being dandled!"

Mr. Bowser grew as white as a bleached snow-drift, and there was a glint of pounded glass in his eyes, but he held on to himself and simply said:

"Go on, woman—go on."

"Well, in the first act the widow demands that you sing a song. She stands you up on a table and you sing. Mr. Bowser, even if you could turn yourself into a bandy-legged little man, what about the singing? The house would either be convulsed with laughter or rise up and bombard you off the stage."

"I understand. Anything else?"

"Let me see. In the second act you are brought on to the stage in a bandbox. You might possibly get one foot into a bandbox, but what about the rest of your body? The widow discovers you and you are put into a cradle and rocked to sleep to the tune of 'Mary's Little Lamb.' I want to be there. I want to see you in that cradle."

"Have you finished with your insults?" hoarsely inquired Mr. Bowser as every individual hair above his ears stood on end.

"Let me look. There seems to be another woman in the play and she wants to marry you. While you are seated at the table in a high chair and the Widow Winkle has gone out to get you some bread and butter and sugar on it, the villainess comes in through the window and steals you and carries you off under her arm. Oh, Mr. Bowser, it would be too funny—too ——"

For three minutes Mrs. Bowser laughed and cried by turns, but Mr. Bowser never made a gesture or opened his lips. He simply stared at her with a large and varied assortment of cold-blooded murder in his eye. When she could control herself she took up the parts again and said:

"Haven't you noticed that after you have been stolen away the woman dresses you up as a girl to escape detection? You are supposed to be a dear, sweet little miss of twelve, who kneels down by her bed every night and says: 'Now I lay me down to sleep.' I can see you in your night-dress, with your hands clasped and an innocent look on your face! You'll make a great hit, Mr. Bowser, and you'll have hundreds of offers to play the part of 'Little Eva' afterwards. Well, let's get to work. I'll help you all I can."

"Woman!" gasped Mr. Bowser, after several efforts, during which his knees knocked together.

"Yes," gently replied Mrs. Bowser.

He wanted to go on, but he couldn't. There was a bone in his throat and sparks danced before his eyes. Apoplexy might have come in another minute but for Mrs. Bowser's action. She rose up and took him by the arm and led him to the sofa and helped him to stretch out. Then she put the camphor bottle to his nose and gently rubbed his forehead.

In about ten minutes the threatened attack passed away, and he sat up with the intention of asserting his dignity and self respect and humbling her to the dust.

"You have ridiculed me—you have insulted me!" he thickly exclaimed, but she seized the arm with which he was gesturing and pressed it down, patted him on the head in a wifely way, and as he sank back on the sofa and closed his eyes and groaned in despair, she said:

"You have ridiculed me—you have insulted me!"

"Poor Mr. Bowser! There is no doubt he was born for an actor, but the part of little Dobbins is not for him—not for him! Some other time, but not this time!"

A TRANSVAAL CINDERELLA.

BOER women have very often fought alongside their husbands and fathers and brothers in the wars of the republics of South Africa. Some of them are capital markswomen and nearly all have the fanatical courage which is noticeable in religious enthusiasts of all climes.

The women, who in the present war fought in the trenches against the British, were doing no new thing.

Their mothers and grandmothers assisted in the defence of many a laager against the rush of Zulu impis.

Far from detracting from their womanly fascinations, the young men of the Transvaal look upon such masculine prowess as greatly enhancing them. Rifle skill and Amazonian dash in time of war on the part of the maids compel the admiration of the young men, as witness the recent case of Marie Dutoit.

Marie was a little Cinderella of the veld. Not all the glamour of fairydom could, however, have persuaded a prince that little Marie was pretty. She was indeed, quite homely. The child was an orphan and lived with the Van Pelts, her uncle and aunt, and her elder cousins, Hendrick, a young man, and Greta and Anna, who may be said to have taken the place of Cinderella's ill-conditioned sisters.

These latter were belles of Boerland, and well-portioned, but Marie had been left, a skinny babe, without a penny. This, with her homeliness, lessened her chance of ever being ni ely married, for the shrewd Boer has a careful eye on a girl's dowry. An old maid, or a bachelor, is a by-word and a thing of abhorrence in the Transvaal. So Marie's lot was sad.

Oom Kris van Pelt was not a bad man by any means. He was a typical farmer and hunter of the Transvaal—a tall, broad, bearded, grave, religious patriot.

When Marie's parents died, he gave the child a home, more from duty than affection or pity, and after that paid little heed to her.

Tante Anne, his wife, was another matter. She would never have turned away the little Marie, partly from a sense that such conduct would scarcely have been Scriptural, but chiefly from a fear of what her neighbours would say; but she did not conceal her opinion that the Dutoits had sinned greatly in dying without leaving a provision for their child.

In the hard years when the mealie crop was burnt by the sun and the oxen perished from lack of water, Tante Anne made things unpleasant for little Marie, for she was a feverish, complaining woman.

"Another such year," she would cry, "and we will be ruined! Providence knows best, but there are so many mouths to feed, so many mouths!"

Such outcries were absurd, for the Van Pelts were better off than many burghers. Her neighbours knew this and smiled at the worrying old woman; but Marie took it all very seriously and redoubled her labours.

From babyhood she worked, until her hands were hard as a boy's, and her face was darkly tanned. A hard, hard childhood was that of Marie Dutoit, whose older cousins were in no wise distressed to see how she slaved.

There is only one career open to the average Boer girl, and that is marriage. Marie was plain, Marie was poor.

Greta and Anna complacently and leisurely looked forward to taking their choice of suitors, but Marie could only sigh and be resigned and secretly dream of some impossible day when the prince would ride over the veld and sound his bugle horn.

She always roused herself sharply from such extremely foolish dreams and dashed, more reluctantly than ever, at all the drudgery of the farm.

Yet one great delight was hers, and that was when Hendrick, her big silent cousin, took her out on the broad plain when he was shooting at the targets and taught her to handle a rifle.

Sometimes he even took her on a hunt, and so keen were her eyes, and so firm her grip, and so steady her open-air-trained nerves, that Marie Dutoit, when sixteen years old, was nigh as good a shot as Hendrick himself.

When she was sixteen the troubled days began, and the Transvaal declared war against Great Britain.

Veld-Cornet Hausmann brought the news, but it was not altogether news. All night the beacon fires had been burning on the higher kops. All night Kaffir runners had been scouring the country with messages from the commandants to the burghers.

All night in many farm houses the women had been at work preparing the rations of biltong, and cleaning the arms of the patriots. All night, throughout the length and breadth of the land prayers had gone up and the veld had echoed the deep-voiced songs of David.

The cornet was a close friend of Hendrick van Pelt. A rich man was he, and influential in so much that he was even in the councils of Paul Kruger himself.

Very popular also was Rick Hausmann, and so good-looking that, even without his wealth, the maidens would have been gracious to him. It may be imagined that, in some of the little Marie's day dreams, the Prince who galloped so cavalierly over the veld was not altogether unlike the young cornet.

"It's war," he said gravely, as he sat down in the farm-house. "I have come for Oom Kris and Hendrick. If they are ready we will join the commando together. Yes, thank you, Greta, thank you, Anna, I will take coffee."

Marie had made the coffee, but her cousins served the cornet. Tante Anne and they hovered about him and chorused denunciations of the rooineks and eulogies of the Boer patriots.

Then first Rick Hausmann smiled on Greta, and again he was cordial to Anna. When Greta smiled, Anna frowned, and when Anna beamed, Greta tossed her handsome head and sniffed. But Marie made coffee, and hid her homely face and looked not at all at the prince of the veld.

When the Van Pelts were ready the women hung about their horses, delaying them to make sure that nothing was forgotten, the biltong, the coffee, the sugar, the home-grown tobacco.

Tante Anne, in tears, caressed her spouse and son, but the daughters were more solicitous about the rich and handsome veld-cornet. They were quite cheery. They had no doubts of the outcome of the war.

"Slay them as the Philistines were slain," they cried to Rick. "Drive the Uitlanders into the sea! Oh! how I wish I were a man to go and fight them!"

"Oh! yes, to be a man!" cried Greta, "to be brave and strong——"

"To be such a horseman!" cried Anna, cutting out Greta.

"To be such a sharpshooter!" cried Greta, rudely interrupting Anna.

"We will make much of you when you come back victorious," they cried together.

"And reward me, I hope," said the handsome cornet; but he looked at both and smiled at both, so that the girls, when they had smiled back at him, frowned on each other.

"Good-bye, Marie," said Hendrick.

"Good-bye, cousin," said Marie; "I wish I were going with you."

Then they rode off to join the commando, and Rick only waved his hand to Marie, and all the veld for her grew chill and grey.

The prince was galloping over the veld, but no glad bugle horn had sounded its call for her. Tante was more peevish than ever. The girls were sulky.

"Marie, you've let the coffee get cold!" Tante Anne screeched.

Marie was at the open door, staring after the horsemen, and did not hear nor answer.

"Come in and attend to your work," her aunt cried. "What are you about? Do you think the cornet will kiss his hand to you?"

The sisters laughed shrilly, but Marie hung her head.

"No," she thought, "he will never wave his hand to me, I am ugly, and too poor, but—I should like to take a rifle and be beside him and fight the Englishmen, and—and watch over him."

* * * * *

The fight had begun in a series of skirmishes, but when morning came, the Boers and British were in pitched battle. The speaking of the great guns could be heard at the farm. Sometimes even the rattle of the rifle fire reached across the plain.

The women-folk were terribly excited. War was now very close to their doors, and it was not so easy a thing to sneer at the courage of the rooineks.

Tante Anne rocked in her great chair; the girls were white and unnerved; Marie was restless, with great bright eyes.

All night long spider carts and waggons and litters had been jolting across the veld with burdens of dead and crippled men who were being carried by native servants and friends to homes at hand, for burial or for nursing.

Suddenly, before the glaring sun had yet reached its noontide height, a ragged Kaffir came running and leaping from the distant kopjes, where the battle raged and roared. His eyes were protruding with fright, and his dark face was now grey.

"It is M'Pangwe!" Marie cried, as he came, and they all went out to meet Oom Kris' servant, who had followed his master to the war, as, in olden times, the henchmen followed the knights and squires.

The Kaffir ran up weary and exhausted. A dirty rag bound his arm where a bullet had pierced the flesh.

"Why have you left your baas?" the women cried, and Tante Anne shook her fist at the trembling boy. "You coward dog, if you have run away, I will use the sjambok on you myself!"

"Ni," cried the servant. "No run, Baas Hendrick, him dead in trench. Big baas, him fight and shoot, shoot, Big baas—him say to M'Pangwe—get cart take baas Hendrick to Tante Anne. Me come, run all way."

There was a wailing then in the farmhouse, and terrible cries for vengeance, but the Van Pelts were too sorrowstricken to obey the poor stern father's will.

On Marie fell the task, as on Marie usually fell the harder tasks. She had loved Hendrick, but she was dry-eyed.

Her face was still and stern.

"Is Oom Kris hurt?" she asked the boy, and he told her the old man was safe as yet, as they harnessed the horse.

Her back was turned to him.

"Did you see the Veld-Cornet Hausmann?" she asked.

"He shoot, shoot, shoot with Big baas," said the boy.

When the cart was ready, Marie went inside and filled a great canteen with coffee.

She took some biltong and bread also. Then she got Hendrick's old rifle, which she had often used, and went into the house for a belt of ammunition.

"Tante Anne," she said, "I am going to the trenches with M'Pangwe. He says the battle is hard. The commandant must need every good shot he can find, and I am a good shot. Besides, they have killed Hendrick—and I loved him."

Tante Anne screeched again.

"I need you here!" she screamed. "What can my girls and I do, broken down as we are? Who will help in the house?"

"Greta and Anna must do that unless they will come with me."

At that the girls cried out.

"The trenches are no place for girls," they said.

"Oh!" said Marie Dutoit hotly. "There are women there already helping the men. A woman also has a right to defend the fatherland. My mother fought the Zulus with my father in laager, and Tante Anne herself, when she was younger, could hit a deer."

She drove off with the Kaffir, sorrowing much for Hendrick, her childhood's friend, but hot with bitter anger and vengeful wrath against the British. Also there was a dread in her heart that, arriving, she should find yet another lying dead in the trenches on the hillside.

No doubt this would seem unmaidenly conduct in the eyes of school girls, but, you see, Marie had never been to school. She could only with difficulty spell out her Bible, was quite uncultured, and a very simple and natural product of the veld, possessed with all the primitive passions of love and hate and jealousy and revenge.

The trenches were reached from the rear of the army, with only the rocky difficulties of the kopje to overcome. When, however, they came near to them, the Kaffir shook with fear as the great shells came shrieking from the British guns to plunge into the earthen breastworks or burst close by, scattering horror.

He cowered in the cart, but Marie sat erect, although her face was white, and her lips drawn in.

They halted some distance away in the shelter of a great rock, and Oom Kris himself carried his dead boy to the cart. Poor old patriot—he was weeping, but he could not leave his place to accompany Hendrick's remains, anxious though he was that they should be buried at home near the old farm, and not in the dreadful trenches, perhaps by British hands.

He dispatched the Kaffir's cart, and expressed no surprise when Marie followed him, on hands and knees, creeping to Hendrick's place.

"It is right, little Marie," he said simply. "He loved you, my Hendrick. Say a prayer and aim carefully."

On the Boer girl's other side lay the veld-cornet. He nodded to Marie and smiled approval.

"Who shall conquer us?" he said, "when our girls are ready to die to defend the land? Why did not Greta and Anna come? They are fair shots, and Hendrick was their brother."

Marie said nothing, but colour came back to her cheek for it was the first time the prince of the veld had spoken to her so cordially.

She grew warm with the fierce excitement of the thing, but her aim was steady and her bullets sped truly. Rick was earnest in his encouragement.

"I did not know," he said, enthusiastically, "that you were such a brave girl, and capital shot. You were always so quiet."

Then Marie, even in the middle of horrors, was almost happy.

All the afternoon the shells came shrieking. All the afternoon cries and groans and hoarse commands filled her ears, with the ceaseless crash of the rifles, and the thunder of the big guns.

Then, along the line of the trench the deep voices would rise to heaven—now in the heart-stirring melody of a volkslied, now chanting the solemn measures of a psalm.

At last, when the day was far spent, the enemy tried new tactics, since their artillery could not disperse the Boers in the trenches. From far in front a body of kilted Highlanders moved forward with a great cheer, and the shells came plunging down in a more furious storm than ever.

One of these burst near Marie. A piece tore past her face, and hit old Oom Kris. The fine old man's rifle fell from his hands. He gave one short, sharp cry, and fell back. He had followed his dear son.

So hot was the fight, so urgent it was that now if ever the Boers should not slacken their fire, that little Marie could only murmur a prayer, but dared not cease firing. Rick Hausmann found time to touch her hand and whisper in sympathy.

"It was for God and country," said he. "It is well with him."

Tears were in Marie's eyes as she looked at him gratefully.

"For God and country," she repeated, and turned steadily to the approaching rush of Highlanders.

They were coming on with tremendous dash, not cheering now, for every breath was needed as they faced the steep hill. With fixed bayonets they came on and on and on.

The fire of the Boers was furious, a continual roar of volleying rifles. The Scotsmen suffered cruelly. Here, there, like twigs in the wind, men wavered and dropped, but the rest came on and on and on.

At sight of the cold steel, glancing in the sun, Marie began to quake. Not she alone; the Boers all round were paling.

"Cornet Hausmann," Marie cried, quivering, "I must go—I must fly. I cannot stand and face those—things!"

Hausmann looked up to speak and then another shell burst and he fell with a broken leg. At the same instant many Boers, unaccustomed to face such a weapon, began to fall back, leave the trench, and retreat.

Hausmann saw them, and, in spite of his agony, ordered and implored them to stay.

"Stand firm!" he cried; "they are exhausted. Stand firm—continue firing and we'll drive them back yet. Oh, cowards, will you fly! Marie, show them an example. You are no coward. Steady, Marie! Keep on firing! You won't desert me, will you?"

Marie's strength was renewed. Even her awful dread vanished at the prince's entreaty.

She stood beside him as he reached up to her hand.

"No," she said, "I forgot for one moment. No, I will not desert you."

Now the Scots were within a hundred yards. They came on, but they were staggering and gasping.

"Firm! Stand firm!" cried the wounded Boer chief to the Boers who had not fled.

"Rush them, lads!" roared a tall British officer.

They came. Marie covered that officer steadily. He fell, as she fired, but his men came on and on.

Their bayonets were within fifty yards, and the Boers without any such weapon to meet them, broke at last and scattered.

Marie looked down at the cornet. He had fainted from pain. With a great effort she lifted him up, for she was strong with much outdoor work, and staggered with him from the lost trenches to the shelter of the great rock, which had previously hid the cart.

Behind the rock Marie gave the cornet water and eased his agony as best she could, while waiting for the surgeon and ambulance.

Hausmann's eyes were always on her face.

"Marie," he said at last, "these fellows would have killed me if you had not stayed by me. You saved my life when you did not desert me like the others. Marie, little Marie, Oom Kris has gone and Hendrick has gone and you are alone. I, too, am alone. Stay with me then—never desert me!"

And she never did.

In the Orchard.

FEDORA, in her long white apron and big sun hat, colour-box and palette in hand, sauntered out into the orchard and sat down under the shade of an apple tree.

A light breeze stirred the boughs on which the sunlight gleamed in great gold patches and countless songbirds darted from limb to limb, making the air vocal with their music.

One plump red-breasted fellow perched himself directly in front of Fedora, and with head on one side regarded her intently.

The girl returned his gaze, first with amusement, then with interest, and finally with sudden inspiration.

She selected a crayon from her box and dexterously jotted down a few outlines. Then she consulted the bright bits of colour she had placed on her palette, and with a sweep here and there of her long paint brush transferred the nucleus of her small feathered observer to a sketch card.

She held it up to the light and looked at it critically for a moment, then laid it on the long grass beside her and leant back against the trunk of the tree, her hands crossed loosely behind her head, her eyes resting in dreamy contemplation on the gleaming fields beyond. Above her the faint rustling of the wind in the leaves drowned the silence.

Presently a shadow cut across the glimmering sunlight. Fedora glanced up and a faint colour tinged her cheeks. It was the professor.

"If you are too busy—" he began, looking down at her a little dubiously.

"Oh, no," she broke in quickly, smiling up at him as she spoke, "I am never busy."

Fedora prided herself upon that accomplishment.

"Do sit down," she went on, with a bright look, pointing to the grassy plot opposite her.

The professor hesitated for a moment, then suddenly complied with the request.

"A nice day," he remarked, carelessly, as he sat down.

"Charming," returned Fedora, surveying him with a smile.

It had suddenly dawned upon her that the professor was a singularly good-looking man to be so old—almost forty. And in spite of his two-score years she found herself looking with approval—almost admiration into his deep, clear eyes, above which the thick masses of brown hair waved back from an intellectual forehead. (All professors have intellectual foreheads.)

"I don't like to interrupt you," he said, with a doubtful glance at the incipient sketch and Fedora's small paint-stained fingers, "but there is something I wanted to say," he went on, tugging at his watch chain.

"Really!"

She gave a little cough and turned her eyes expectantly upon him.

"It's—it's important," faltered the professor, awkwardly, meeting her gaze.

Fedora broke into a little soft laugh and two dimples came into her face.

"What's the matter?" he said looking at her in astonishment, a suspicion arising in his mind that he was being treated with unnecessary levity.

"You looked so—serious," she replied, with such a charming little grimace and a look so profoundly innocent that the professor immediately dismissed this suspicion as unworthy.

"If you don't mind, though," he pursued, a little uneasily, his eyes on her face, "I would rather you would not—that you would be a little serious."

"Yes, certainly," assented Fedora with alacrity, pulling a straight face, but with a glimmer of a smile showing about her mouth.

He looked at her searchingly for a moment, then cleared his throat and went on with slight hesitation:

"I have a proposition."

He stopped short and looked at her in a helpless sort of way.

"Ah, I see," she exclaimed, with a merry laugh, "and you want the—hypothesis."

"Precisely so," returned the professor, his face brightening. He thought that his task would not be a difficult one, with such an appreciative young woman.

"And now to the point——" he continued, giving her a serious look.

"A point indicates mere position, and has no magnitude," interposed Fedora, flippantly.

"I suppose not," replied the professor, with slight sternness. "But it is not a problem in geometry—this time," he concluded, the glint of a smile hovering about his lips, his voice calm and meaning.

"Oh!" exclaimed the girl with wide eyes, as she folded both hands in her lap and fixed upon him a look of grave attention.

He shifted his position a little, pulled at a tuft of grass, then looked across at her with sudden resolution and spoke:

"Suppose—that a—man——"

The professor stopped short and cleared his throat again in a disconcerted sort of way. Fedora met his gaze with a mischievous smile, and chewed the end of her long paint brush.

"Well?" she said dropping her chin into one small hand.

"That a man is——"

"Yes?"

"Well—in love, you know," he blurted out in desperation, blushing to the brim of his scholarly hat.

Fedora's face was suffused with sudden colour and she gave an inarticulate little murmur, quite beyond interpretation.

There was an interval, during which neither spoke, for several minutes. The professor was the first to break the pause:

"Madly, terribly, foolishly—in love," he said, emphasizing the last adverb, as though it included the sum total of human imbecility.

Fedora shot at him a glance of bewilderment.

"To think," she said, making a mental observation, "that he could be so violent."

There was another pause. She dug one dainty hand into the soft turf and looked at him shyly out of the corner of her eye. The professor spoke again.

"What do you think of it?" he asked abruptly, his gaze resting upon her face with suppressed eagerness.

"I—don't—know." She said it slowly and blushed as she spoke.

A mingled expression of doubt and perplexity became visible on the professor's face, as he waited for her to go on.

But Fedora remained silent, her eyes resting dreamily upon a little white cloud, drifting across the horizon.

The situation was growing awkward. The professor felt that his grasp was slipping away from him, and went on a little anxiously:

"You know about such things—girls generally do. Tell me—what shall I do?"

He toyed nervously with a dead twig as he spoke, and searched her face narrowly for encouragement.

Fedora reflected for a moment, then nodded with decision.

"It depends," she said dryly, fixing her eyes upon his with a serious look.

"Yes?"

The professor turned to her with a quick smile.

Fedora pondered again, then dropped her eyes half-timidly and twisted the corner of her handkerchief.

"On—the other one, you know—the girl," she went on with a soft blush.

The professor gazed at her in silence, his kind eyes full of perplexity.

"Does she—care for you?" asked Fedora in a low voice, looking away.

"That's precisely the point," said he, pushing back his hat. "I want to find out."

"Is she pretty?"

"Beautiful," replied the professor, with sudden enthusiasm. "She has the most magnificent brown eyes in the world, and hair—how do they say in novels?—like spun gold, that's it," he concluded, impulsively, his eyes aglow.

Fedora's cerulean orbs were suddenly misty and her dusky brown head averted.

There was silence for a few moments. After a little she leant forward to pick a flower, her heart throbbing violently and the colour faded from her face.

The professor drew a long breath and sighed.

"She doesn't give me any encouragement," he ventured, regarding her with a questioning, half-wistful look.

"Perhaps," said Fedora, faintly, as if to herself, "she cares for someone else."

The professor stared at her in consternation.

"I never—thought—of that," he said slowly, dismay stealing into his tones, as his eyes sought hers with an intense look, as though searching her inmost soul.

The pause that followed was unbroken for some moments.

Finally he spoke.

"I hope you have not made a mistake," he said, rising to go, "because it means so much to me—everything."

He was looking down upon her and there was something in his eyes she had never seen there before.

"There is only one way—to find out," she said, speaking heroically, but with a dreary little smile.

The professor's face brightened.

"Well?" said he, almost holding his breath.

The girl did not immediately reply, something seemed to clutch at her throat.

Presently she lifted her eyes—suspiciously bright—to his and said slowly, her voice half tremulous:

"Just tell her—in a straightforward, manly way, that you—love—her, and want a—serious answer."

She dropped her eyes suddenly, as she encountered his look—not easy to evade.

There was an inaudible stillness. Fedora was looking away like one in a dream, her hands lying cold and passive in her lap.

The sunshine circled about her red-brown hair in a shimmering rainbow.

The professor looked across at her, his eyes full of unexpected admiration, his hands knitted close together.

After a while he leant suddenly towards her and with a quick movement seized both her hands in his own.

"Fedora, I love you! Will you marry me?"

The girl gave him a swift, startled glance, and the colour flamed to her cheeks, while the tears and smiles struggled for mastery.

"But—but my hair is not gold." she exclaimed with a puzzled little laugh, looking shyly at him, "and my eyes are—blue."

"And mine," said he, taking her in his arms, "are colour-blind."

NEW SERIAL STORY.

A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

By WILLIAM WESTALL.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

Major Wyvenhoe leaves England on the Campanella with a detachment of troops, raised by Major Barnish, to help the Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty. Major Barnish is accompanied on the vessel by his wife. At Cork a detachment of Irishmen is taken on board together with General Molyneux, who is connected with the Venezuelan Army, his secretary and chaplain. When the vessel has been out a few days Major Barnish meets with a fatal accident, and on that same day a mutiny breaks out among the troops, but it is speedily quelled. On the day of Barnish's death a sail is sighted, and the vessel proves to be the Dulcinea, a Spanish warship. The Campanella is ordered to stop so that her cargo may be examined. The captain (Cautley) objects, and while negotiations are going on, the Dulcinea is boarded by a party from the Campanella, when the guns are spiked and the vessel put out of working order. General Molyneux, who had come with the party unasked, kills a Spanish sailor, and is left with the Spaniards as a prisoner.

CHAPTER V.

THE VENEZUELAN COAST IS REACHED.

I KEPT an eye on the Dulcinea, as Cautley had suggested, not from any morbid desire to see Molyneux hanged, simply to ascertain whether he was hanged. But my curiosity had to remain unsatisfied, for though I watched until the man-of-war became a mere speck I saw nothing.

"I thought they would run him up to the yard-arm right away," said the skipper, "but they are perhaps too busy putting the ship to rights, or Molyneux may be trying to save his life by making revelations, bogus and otherwise."

"What revelations could he make?"

"Well, he knows all about the formation of a British legion, when the expedition will sail, of how many ships it will be composed, and for what port they are destined."

"And the Spaniards may send a squadron to intercept them. Would it not have been better to bring Molyneux with us?"

"In one respect, perhaps, though, as the Spanish Government has spies in London, I doubt whether he can tell Don Pablo much that he does not already know, and it was not only the right thing to do but the only way of purging ourselves of complicity in the crime."

"But we are not responsible for Molyneux, he was neither under your orders nor mine."

"I am afraid we are though, if only because we did not bundle him back the moment he appeared on the Dulcinea's deck. I don't think our boarding her, under the circumstances, was an act of piracy, but it was undoubtedly illegal, and when people engage in an unlawful enterprise, and one of them commits a crime—murder, for instance—they all participate technically in his guilt. And you heard what Don Pablo said about making it an international question. That means a garbled and exaggerated report to our Government. Anyhow, I shall be chary of returning to England, or landing in any British colony, until the matter has blown over; and one thing is sure, if we fall into the hands of the Spaniards they will make short work of us."

"They will do that in any case, if it be true that they give no quarter. That would be the fortune of war—all in the day's work—but I should decidedly object to being indicted for piracy and murder."

"Well, perhaps my apprehensions are rather far fetched, and I don't think our people will give much heed to Spanish complaints, their sympathies are all with the Venezuelans. Besides, things are soon forgotten, and we have a deal to go through before we see England again."

And so we had—a great deal more than we knew.

"Would you mind seeing Mrs. Barnish, and telling her?" said the skipper presently.

"Very well; but suppose she objects?"

"Say it is a rule of the sea—anything you like; only it must be to-night."

So I went to Mrs. Barnish's cabin, and found her lying on a couch, her face pale and troubled, her eyes red with weeping; but on seeing me she roused herself and inquired what all the commotion had been about. On which I told her how great had been our peril, and how Captain Cautley had saved the ship.

"But for his boldness and address," I added, "we should have lost everything."

"For which I thank him with all my heart," she said earnestly. "You also, Major Wyvenhoe, for, though you say nothing about yourself, I am sure you were as bold as he. I thank you for your kindness and devotion, which I shall never forget."

Then briefly, and I fear too bluntly, I delivered my message.

"So soon! So soon! Only this morning; Heavens! what shall I do?" she cried wildly, sobbing as though her heart would break.

As soon as the poor lady had composed herself, which she did by a great effort, she said that, feeling sure we would act for the best, she left it to Captain Cautley and myself, then added:

"As it must be it had perhaps better be soon."

We buried our late commander an hour after sunset by light of moon, with military honours and all the pomp and ceremony meet for the occasion. The troops and the ship's company were paraded on deck, with arms reversed, the officers in full uniform with crape on their swords. Cautley read the service for those buried at sea, and then the body, inclosed in a heavily-weighted coffin, was committed to the deep "in the sure and certain hope of resurrection."

It was the first funeral at sea in which I had taken part, and it impressed me, and I think most of us, both deeply and painfully. For Barnish, who had been much beloved, would be greatly missed, his death was a veritable calamity, and augured ill for the happy termination of a voyage so auspiciously begun.

But, whatever befalls, work must be done and duties performed, and on the following day an informal court of inquiry was appointed to investigate the causes and origin of the mutiny and apportion the guilt. More we could not do, having neither legal right to try the prisoners nor the means of enforcing any sentence we might pass on them, except a term of imprisonment that would end with the voyage, or death, which we had no right to inflict.

But the mutineers did not know this, they were afraid of being hanged, and several of the ringleaders were clamorous to save their lives by betraying their friends. Of those whom we called as witnesses, some denied everything, others lied first and prevaricated afterwards; very few, I imagine, told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. The only absolutely contumacious witness was the one who knew the most—Conroy, the private secretary. When asked a question, he looked as stupid as though he had been deaf and dumb, and said never a word.

Cautley, however, was not to be baulked, and found a way of loosening the fellow's tongue, which reminded me, with a difference, of the peine forte et dure which not very long ago used to be inflicted on accused persons in England who refused to plead. A rope being fastened round Conroy's body, he was cast into the sea and dragged at the ship's stern.

"As soon as you have made up your mind to speak, you have only to raise your hand or sing out 'yes,'" said Cautley; "and if the sharks make a meal of you, you will have nobody to blame but yourself."

Conroy was very obdurate, and before he was thrown overboard showed no sign of yielding, but five minutes in and under the water, mostly under, with the prospect of serving as bait for a shark, brought him to reason. He gave token of submission, and was hauled on board, more dead than alive, and so exhausted withal as to be physically unable to speak until he had swallowed a stiff glass of grog.

Had I not been assured that Conroy was an arrant rascal I should have interfered in his favor, but as Cautley observed afterwards it was probably the only punishment he would get, and far less than he deserved.

Nevertheless, we were unable to extort a full confession from him, he would only answer questions, but his admissions, together with the evidence of the other plotters, disclosed all the essential facts.

As John Ready had surmised, Molyneux was at the bottom of it all. Most of his eccentricities were put on in order to give us a mean idea of his capacity, whether for mischief or aught else. The two subalterns and several of the non-commissioned officers and men who had joined at Cork were his creatures, Conroy his factotum and alter ego. Their purpose, after gaining over as many of the men as they could, was to destroy the officers and all who took their part, sail to Pampatar, sell the ship and her cargo to the Venezuelans and share the proceeds. This, in addition to a large sum in silver and gold, which, as Conroy asserted, Major Barnish had with him, his wife's jewellery and whatever cash and valuables the mutineers might find on the persons of the officers or among their effects, amounting to several thousand pounds. The ordering of everything, including the command of the troops was to be taken by Molyneux, who would pretend that they were the first contingent of an Irish brigade which he was raising for service in Venezuela and claim the bounties and cost of their equipment. He proposed, in fact, to step into the Barnishs' shoes, which necessarily implied the previous removal both of the major and his wife.

The details of this scheme were imparted only to the initiated, but some of them oozed out in a more or less incomplete shape and reached me through Ready, and Cautley through the boatswain. Sedition was sown among those not in the mutiny by Conroy and the other conspirators, chiefly by Conroy. It was he who had told them they were under no obligation to obey their officers, and suggested that the men were by no means sure of receiving the remainder of their bounties. Moreover, it was rumoured, and by many of the more ignorant believed, that the ship's true destination was not Pampatar, but St. Jago de Cuba, where Major Barnish meant to sell them all to the Spaniards to work in chains on sugar plantations.

He gave token of submission.

All was ripe for a rising, and but for the removal of the arms and the Major's death, it might have succeeded. The latter event both precipitated a crisis and led to dissensions among the conspirators. Some of them, thinking that all authority had disappeared with the chief, wanted to mutiny at once, others wanted to wait a while longer, the unruly section got out of hand, a good many of them got drunk, with the result that instead of a massacre by night, as had been planned, there was an outbreak by day, which was suppressed as we have seen.

Father Bartrum, who had been sea sick in his cabin the greater part of the voyage knew nothing either of the plot or Molyneux's true character. He believed in the scoundrel so thoroughly that he had given him money for the "Cause of Venezuelan Liberty," and when Molyneux proposed to take him out to the Spanish Main as his private chaplain, and promised him the chaplaincy of the Irish Brigade, the simple-minded priest eagerly embraced the offer. He was greatly distressed, poor gentleman, when he heard the story of his patron's villainy.

"There was a time when we were unable to determine whether Molyneux was more fool than knave. We know now," observed Cautley, as we were talking matters over after the inquiry.

"He is both. Knaves generally are," I said. "Even though he had succeeded in cutting our throats and taking the ship, I don't see how it could have profited him. He could neither have controlled the men, nor, the ship's officers being all gone, could he have navigated the ship."

"There you are mistaken. Conroy understands navigation, as I accidentally discovered some time since. He has a queer history behind him, and is, in my opinion, quite the worse villain of the two."

"I wonder whether the Spaniards hanged Molyneux? If they did not do it quickly, he would stand a good chance of saving his neck. The rogue can talk the thatch off a hay-stack, and is quite capable of representing himself as a lord or a British general, so that Don Pablo, believing he has caught a big fish, may think it more to his advantage to keep him than string him up. It will be queer if he turns up again. If he does, I know somebody who will have a little account to settle with him."

"So do I; but we shall never have the chance. Even if the Spaniards do not hang him, they will take good care not to let him go."

We were now in the Caribbean Archipelago, enjoying perfect weather and feasting our eyes on the finest scenery I had ever beheld or imagined could exist. It was like an enchanted sea. We were seldom out of sight of land, isle succeeded isle, each more picturesque than the other, some mere rocks rising sheer from the waves, yet richly coloured and garlanded with flowers, palms, and foliage of every hue. Many were much larger, but all equally beautiful. I shall never forget my first sight of St. Kitts. The morning had been misty, but presently the sun, growing more powerful, dispersed the haze which had hidden the island, and revealed a mountain with a broad base and a tapering peak, sparkling with verdure, a glorious emerald set in an amethystine sea.

And Martinique, and Dominica, and Guadeloupe, and many more. To attempt to describe them were almost a desecration, even though I possessed a poet's pen, for no subtleties of language or combination of words could give an adequate idea of their splendour and their beauty.

Our misgivings and forebodings were for a while forgotten, we dwelt only in the present, and Mrs. Barnish, leaving the seclusion of her cabin, spent the greater part of her time on deck, under an awning, which Cautley had put up for her special benefit.

Though the reverse of sentimental, and in manner reserved, the skipper showed the poor lady much sympathy, and treated her with almost courtly deference, and we both, as well as the other officers, did our best to make the remainder of the voyage as pleasant for her as might be.

The skipper, however, surpassed us all, and before long

I began to suspect that his intentions had a deeper source than loyalty to his owner and pity for beauty in distress. But Cautley was too manly and energetic, too conscientious as a man and too thorough as a seaman to let duty wait on dalliance. He displayed even greater activity and vigilance than before, and rightly so, for as we neared the Main his responsibilities increased, and only by good luck and incessant watchfulness could he hope to win through the dangers that still confronted us. One of these was falling in with another Spanish cruiser, possibly a second time with the Dulcinea, since, as Molyneux had almost certainly told the captain whither we were bound, he would probably try to intercept us, in which event, his ship being the better sailer, he might succeed, luck favouring him.

It was to avoid this peril that Cautley, instead of taking the more direct course by the Monas passage, between Costa Rica and St. Domingo, went by way of the Windward Islands, none of which belong to Spain. But in avoiding Scylla we were like to fall into Charybdis. By prolonging our voyage we gave the Dulcinea a chance of reaching the neighbourhood of Margarita in advance of the Campanella, and there lying in wait for us, perhaps with a consort.

Nor was this all. At the time we left England the latest news from Venezuela was two months old, and was now nearly four months old, an interval during which many things might have happened. We had no assurance that Margarita was still held by the patriots. Being only some twenty miles from the continent, and having a good harbour it was a highly valuable possession, much coveted by the Spaniards by whom, for aught we could tell, it had been recovered. In any event it were suicidal to go to Pampatar without making sure that it was occupied by friends—or anywhere else, for the same doubts applied to every port on the Venezuelan coast. One or two of them were in the hands of the enemy when we last heard, and the remainder, one or all, might be in a like predicament.

The alternative was to call at a neutral port, St. Thomas, Curacoa, or one of the Windward Islands, where the latest intelligence touching the fortunes of the war would be obtainable. But to this there was the serious objection that the Campanella might be attacked at the instance of some Spanish consul or fussy local official, and proceeded against in the courts on a charge of violating the neutrality laws, which, whatever were the result, would ruin Mrs. Barnish in costs and prevent her from fulfilling her husband's contract with the Venezuelan government.

"There is only one thing for it, we must act the man-of-war and stop any merchant ship or hooker hailing from the Main that we meet, and demand information," said Cautley, in the course of a conversation on the subject. "Then make for whatever port is in Venezuelan hands, or if Pampatar is blockaded without being occupied, get in either by stealth or force."

"And if we were attacked meanwhile?"

"Hoist the Venezuelan flag and fight. I won't court an encounter, but if I am fired on I shall fire back, strictly in self defence. It won't be quite regular, perhaps, yet no less so than our capture of the Dulcinea. In for a penny in for a pound, you know, and poor Mrs. Barnish and her interests must be our first consideration."

They were undoubtedly Cautley's first consideration, but as I rather liked the idea of a brush with a Spanish cruiser, I offered no objection, and preparations for the eventuality in question were straightway made.

By the removal of her poop the Campanella was reconverted into a flush-decked ship, the carronades were got up and mounted on their carriages, and the crew not being strong enough both to work the ship and fight her, a hundred picked men from among the troops were exercised every day on the quarter-deck.

Mrs. Barnish observed these proceedings with concern, yet without apprehension, warmly applauding the skipper's resolve to fight rather than fail.

"I am vastly beholden to you, Captain Cautley, I thank Heaven for providing me with so brave a protector, and as long as I live I shall be grateful for your kindness and devotion," she said, in her most winning manner.

"Don't mention it, madam, pray don't mention it," returned the skipper, hurriedly. "It is all in the way of duty, and I don't think there is a man on board, except perhaps those rascally mutineers, who would not lay down his life for you with the greatest pleasure."

Which made me smile. A man who can contemplate the possibility of being riddled with bullets or having his head knocked off by a cannon ball with pleasure, must be far gone indeed. But I was not the least jealous, since, though I admired Mrs. Barnish as much as I pitied her, it was in no sense the pity which is akin to love. A little flirtation I did not mind, but to the tender passion au serieux I was absolutely impervious.

Owing to light winds and occasional calms we were making rather a long voyage of it, but we kept moving more or less slowly, and the time arrived when it became necessary for the skipper to make up his mind as to our destination, to which end he one day bore up to a felucca which was sailing nor'-east by east, hoisted the Union Jack, and fired a shot across her bows as a hint to her to pass within hail, which she did, and hove-to; whereupon Cautley took up his speaking trumpet and put the usual questions, but, being answered in Spanish, he gave me the trumpet and told me what to say.

"Whence are you and whither bound?"

"From Carupano to St. Thomas."

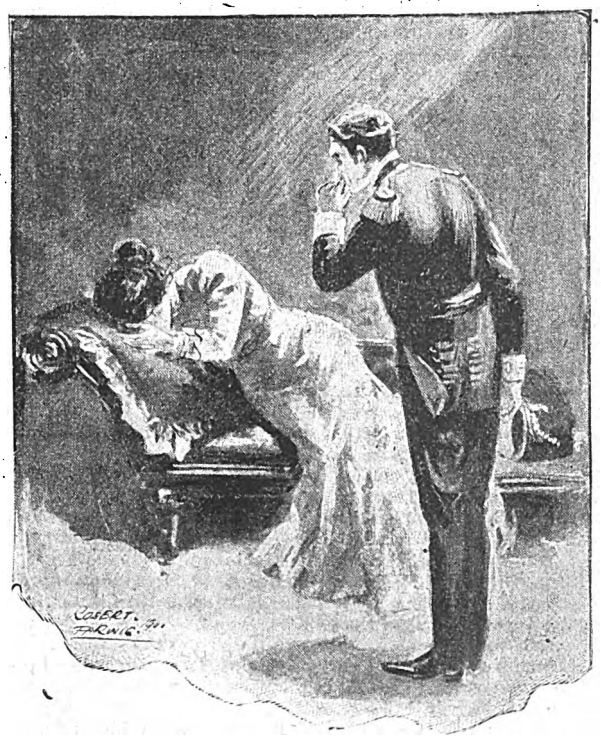
"Who are in possession of Carupano—patriots or royalists?"

"Patriots; but, being a small unfortified place with no harbour, it is not of much account."

"And Cumana?"

"Cumana is held in force by the Spaniards, also Barcelona."

"And Margarita?"



"Don't mention it, madam; pray, don't mention it."

"Cannot say for certain, the last news was that General Arismendez was still at Pampatar, but it was rumoured that General Morillo was preparing another expedition."

"To attack Pampatar?"

"Yes, and two Spanish sloops of war are continually cruising along the coast between Cumana and Pampatar."

"You are on the patriot side yourselves?"

"Si, Señor, very much so."

"So are we. Proof of which is that we are taking British troops to Margarita to serve against the Spaniards, and if you can give us any information likely to be useful we shall be greatly obliged."

"Well, look out for the sloops, they are large, as large as your ship, and heavily armed, carrying twenty-four guns apiece. You can tell them by their rig, they have jib-shaped foresails, short, standing bowsprits, and no topsails. If you see either of them at anchor off Pampatar, you will know that the Spaniards are back again, though, as the harbour is defended by a strong fort, and General Arismendez is in command, I do not think that is likely."

"Thank you. Have you anybody on board who could pilot us into Pampatar? He would be well paid."

"Only myself, señor, and being the master with a crew of but two men and a boy, who know nothing of navigation, I cannot be spared, otherwise, I should put myself at your worship's disposal."

Whereupon, after an exchange of compliments, the felucca went her way and we went ours.

"I beg pardon, Captain Cautley, for intruding on you at such a moment, but with your kind permission I should like to ask a question and make a suggestion," put in Father Bartrum, who had lately come on deck. He had suffered much from sea sickness and looked like the ghost of his former self. His high colour was gone, his cheeks had fallen in, his paunch collapsed, but he had abated little or nothing of his old pomposity of language and manner.

"By all means, father," answered the skipper pleasantly.

"By all means, father," answered the skipper pleasantly. "What is the question?"

"Well, sir, unless I have misunderstood the conversation which has just taken place between yourself and the captain of the small sailing boat which has just left us, as interpreted by Major Wyvenhoe, you have some apprehension of coming in hostile contact with one or other of these heavily-armed sloops?"

"Or both?"

"Or both. I stand corrected, sir. In which event there may be fighting, slaughter, and—danger?"

"Well, when ships of war come into hostile contact, as you call it, there generally is something of the sort, I think," quoth Cautley, with an amused smile.

"Not that I am afraid—not in the least, and if a hostile contact occurs, I shall do my duty. I shall descend into the cockpit, and offer the consolations of religion to such of the wounded as are willing to receive my ministrations."

"And quite right, too; the cockpit is the place for you. And now about the suggestion?"

"Well, sir, it struck me while listening to the conversation to which I have just alluded, that a mariner or navigator, conversant with the coast we are approaching and the islands thereto adjacent would be very useful at this juncture."

"Rather. I only wish we had one here."

"So you have, my dear sir, so you have."

"The dickens we have. Who is he?"

"His name is Daniel Conroy, and he is now below in irons."

"Ah! I guessed he was an old salt, but it did not occur to me that he might know these seas."

"He does indeed, sir. It was for that, and for his knowledge of Spanish, that the scoundrel who so grossly deceived me engaged Conroy, nominally as his secretary, really to navigate the Campanella after we others had been relegated to another sphere."

"We others! Surely Molyneux would not have hurt you?"

"I fear he would. He owes me money, and was aware that I had provided myself with a few British sovereigns, for use in the event of my appointment as chaplain to the Irish brigade being accidentally delayed. Unless I am very much mistaken, it was in order to get rid of me that I was invited to accompany him."

"He is bad enough for anything, there is no doubt of that. So think you Conroy could pilot us to Pampatar?"

"Yes, sir, or any other port in these seas."

"Have you any idea how he acquired his knowledge; in what capacity I mean?"

"As to that my lips are sealed."

"I understand, a secret of the confessional. Well, his past is no affair of mine. On what terms do you suppose I can secure his services?"

"You had better ask him. But I think he will want to be relieved of his fetters, and a promise that you will set him free, and make no charge against him on the termination of the voyage."

"There is nothing like time present. I will go and see the rascal now. Greatly obliged for your suggestion, father; it may prove very useful."

An hour later Cautley came into my cabin. "It is all settled," he said, "conditions as suggested by the pater, with the addition of a sum of money."

"A sum of money?"

"Yes, he would not treat on any other terms. Only a hundred dollars, though. And he may be of immense use to us, knows every nook and rock and islet in the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico. I have not the least doubt he has been in the black trade, and I told him plainly that if he played any tricks I would run him up to the yard-arm, and he saw that I meant it. But, as he said, it would not be worth his while, and it is as much in his interest as ours to get the ship safely to Pampatar."

"How are you going to do it? Have you a plan?"

"Yes, and a very promising one. Conroy thinks, and I am disposed to agree with him, that these sloops are looking out for us. The Dulcinea may easily have called at Cumana and given notice of our coming."

"In that case why does she not try to intercept us herself?"

"She may be on special service, or bound for some port further west, and two sloops are more likely to stop and capture us than one frigate. We shall, of course, try to obtain more precise information; but in the meantime I assume two things—that Margarita is still in Venezuelan hands, and that the sloops are on the watch for us."

And then Cautley described his plan, which, divested of technicalities and omitting minor details, was as follows:

Pampatar is at the south-east corner of Margarita, and the skipper had intended, after running past the island, to approach it from the south-west. But, as Conroy pointed out, this would bring him dangerously near Cumana, and was exactly the course which the sloops would expect him to take, and suggested that a better way would be to 'bout ship and make a long fetch, then turn again, steer for the north-east corner of the island, and let go in a cove, doubtless an old pirate haunt, known to Conroy, where the brig could not be seen, even from a ship passing close by. Here we should be able to ascertain the state of things at Pampatar, and unless we heard that the patriots had been ousted might slip out by night and gain our point unperceived by the sloops.

"Anyhow, as only one is likely to be in shore we shall not have to deal with both at once," observed the skipper. "That is all I care about, and being in Venezuelan waters I shall not wait to be attacked; if I get a chance I shall strike first and hard."

"Very well, only I don't like having to put so much trust in Conroy."

"Neither do I, but needs must when the devil drives. I shall change our course at once."

SHORT STORIES ABOUT NEGROES.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Master Key," by Florence Warden, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. Alfred Hindley, 60 Everton Road, Liverpool. Attempts for this week's prize must deal with FUNNY STORIES ABOUT VENTRILOQUISM, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, July 30th. Post-cards only, please.

Not Quite the Style.

AN Englishman visited an American friend who had an estate in the South and employed a large number of negroes, who were treated with great kindness, but could not keep their hands from picking and stealing.

The visitor attended their Sunday service, after which the negro preacher asked him how he liked the sermon.

The reply was complimentary, and Sambo grinned. Then came the remark:

"I should think you should preach to your people on the sinfulness of theft—stealing fowls and eggs."

Sambo's face became gloomy, and he rejoined:

"Well, sah, I hab tried dat style, but somehow or oder, it allus seemed to trow a kind ob coolness ober de meeting." A. H.

Negro Logic.

A GENTLEMAN riding through Virginia was overtaken by a violent thunderstorm.

He took shelter in a negro's cabin, and found the water streaming through many crevices in the roof.

"Why don't you mend your roof, Cuff?" he asked.

"Oh, um rain so, massa, can't," said the negro.

"But why don't you mend it when it doesn't rain?" asked the gentleman.

"Yah, massa," said the negro with a grin, "den um dohn want mendin'." F. J.

In Court.

"WHAT!" exclaimed the justice to a coloured culprit, "have you the audacity to say you do not recognise this pocket-book?"

"Yes, sah."

"But it was found in your possession."

"In my what did yer say, jedge?"

"In your possession. This pocket-book was found in your pocket, sir."

"Jedge, you has tole two stories about dat 'ar. Fust you said hit was foun' in my persession, and den yer 'lowed hit was foun' in my pocket. Bofe dem yarns can't be true. Ef de jedges can't tell the troof, hits no wonder dat a poor niggah like me got led astray."

The justice drew a long breath, and once more producing the pocket-book said:

"You denied just now that you had ever seen this book. I now ask you again, did you ever see this pocket-book before?"

"Why, of course. Hit am de same one yer showed me a minit ago. Yer must be losing yer mind, jedge."

Only a Dream.

THE squire, hearing a noise in the night, came downstairs and found Black Pete in his fowl-house.

"Pete, you rascal, what are you doing here?" he exclaimed.

"It's all right, sah," replied Pete; "it's owing to a dream that I'm here, sah."

"A dream, you black thief! What do you mean?"

"Well, sah, I dreamt I was goin' to have chicken tomorrow; but I'm 'fraid 'taint true, sah!" E. C.

Would it Stand the Strain?

OUT in the West a dusky negro knight of the lather and brush was performing the operation of shaving a customer with a very dull razor.

"Stop!" said the customer; "that won't do."

"What's de matter, boss?"

"The razor pulls."

"Well, no matter for dat, sah. If de handle ob de razor don't break, the beard's bound to come off."

Where He Was.

"IF you are innocent," said the lawyer to his client, an old negro, who was charged with stealing a ham, "we ought to be able to prove an alibi."

"I don't 'specs we kin," the darkie replied doubtfully.

"At what time was the ham stolen?"

"'Bout lebben o'clock, dey say."

"Well, where were you between that and midnight. In bed?"

"No, sah, I wah hidin' de ham."

"Sufficient!"

A SCOTSMAN and a negro had a dispute, and to find out which was the best man they agreed to fight it out with their fists, and the one who had enough first was to shout out the word "sufficient."

Both men went at each other as hard as they could. The negro got one eye shut up, his lip swollen, and his nose twisted, but still, would not give in. Finally, when nearly exhausted, he managed to land his opponent between the eyes which fairly floored him.

"Sufficient!" shouted the Scot.

"Is that so?" said the negro gasping for breath. "Sho—I've bin tryin' to tink ob dat word fer dis twenty minutes!" T. P. O.

Beyond a Doubt.

"Once upon a time," said the storyteller to a group of interested listeners, "a little nigger sat at a table pounding his thumbnail with a hammer," and the story-teller screwed his face into grimaces expressive of recurring pain, while his hands went through the motions suggested by the story.

"Presently a man asked the darkie what he was doing that for.

"'Cause,' he whined, 'it feel so good when I stop.'"

Where the Tablecloth was Kept.

When travelling in America, an Englishman was compelled by necessity to put up at a very inferior hotel, if it might be dignified with the name.

One night he went to bed rather early, but, to his surprise, long before daylight he heard a loud knocking at his door.

"You must get up, massa," said the darkey. "You must get up, Massa Russell."

"I don't want to get up," was the reply.

"But you must," continued the nigger; "some gentlemen are going away."

"Let them go away."

"But they want their breakfast."

"Let them have it."

"But they can't till you get up."

"Why?"

"Because you are sleeping on the tablecloth, and we want it," was the final and unanswerable reply.

Mr. Russell rose and gave the sheet he had been sleeping on to spread over the breakfast table.

A Rolling Stone.

A negro working upon a plantation in Southern Virginia gave his master notice to leave. As he had been in his master's employ many years the master reasoned with him as to the advisability of making a change, winding up by saying:

"You know, Sambo, a rolling stone gathers no moss."

The negro replied:

"No, massa, that's quite true; he gathers no moss, but 'im gathers a heap of polish."

Too Light-Toed.

The Kaffirs of South Africa have a bad reputation for being light-fingered, and a careful watch must be kept on them when they are near a camp, for they are very adroit in their thefts. While sitting down, apparently intent on idleness, they will purloin even the smallest article. In the following anecdote the Kaffir was not light-fingered, but light-toed—to his sorrow.

A gentleman travelling near the Modder River once stopped to have something repaired in his cart, and during the work the blacksmith threw a red-hot bolt on the ground to cool.

A Kaffir dexterously seized it between his toes in passing, intending to make off with it.

It may be imagined how he screamed with pain when he discovered his mistake. The iron had become wedged so tightly between his toes that he could not release it with the aid of his fingers, and awful was the plight in which the thief rushed bellowing into a neighbouring pool of water.

How Sam Was Caught.

A Chicago lady was called away by a neighbour whilst making jam.

As she left the room she said to her negro servant:

"Sam, you old rascal, don't you eat my jam when I'm away."

Sam protested he would die first, but the whites of his eyes rolled hungrily towards the bubbling crimson.

"See here, Sam," the lady said, "I'll chalk your lips, and on my return I'll know if you have eaten any."

So saying she passed her forefinger over the darkey's thick lips, holding the chalk in the palm of her hand at the time, and not letting it touch him

When she came back she did not need to ask any questions, for Sam's lips were chalked a quarter of an inch thick.

Doubling the Dose.

One day, in the streets of Port-au-Prince, an old negro who was vainly endeavouring to drag a lazy mule by his halter, suddenly stepped up to a doctor who stood outside his surgery, and offered him a silver piastre if he could put a little life into his contrary beast.

The doctor went into his office, and returned with his medicine case. He selected a small syringe, filled it with morphia, and inserted the needle into the animal's side.

The astonished creature reared upon his hind-legs, and then, with a tremendous bray, started down the road at a breakneck speed.

The old darkey looked first at the doctor, and then at the disappearing mule.

"Say, sah," he suddenly exclaimed, "how much was dat stuff wuf you jist put in dat mule?"

"Oh, about ten cents," laughingly answered the doctor.

"Well, sah, yo' jist fire twenty cents' wuf right into me. Heah am de cash. I'se got to ketch dat ar mule."

He Kissed the Judge.

In one of the New Orleans courts a negro was called as a witness. The judge, noted for austerity, held out the book and the witness was sworn, and, of course, expected to kiss the book. But the witness was unused to criminal proceedings.

"Why don't you kiss?" demanded the magistrate.

"Sar!"

"Ain't you going to kiss?" was the question again put.

"Sar!" repeated the astonished darkey.

"Kiss. I tell you!" thundered the judge.

"Yes, sir! yes, sar!" exclaimed the frightened and trembling darkey.

The long arms of the son of Ham were thrown round the judicial neck, and before he could be prevented a stentorian smack resounded through the court-room.

"Take him off—take him off!" cried the court, while the loud shouts of the spectators testified their appreciation of the fun. At last the half-strangled judge was rescued from the clasp of the very literal witness.

HOW HE KNEW THE TRUTH.

"I SHALL clear out of this."

"You won't."

"I will."

"Then I think you will do a very foolish thing. You haven't even put your chances to the test."

"Chances," he repeated with a bitter laugh. "Look here, old fellow, I've led a forlorn hope before to-day, and I've had enough of that sort of thing."

It was high noon in Thirlsby.

The summer lay like a mantle above the face of the cliffs and the meadows. The sea in the distance seemed asleep; nearer, its waters moved lazily in towards the shore, and sparkled as they broke on the land.

Gerald Graham and I sat on the edge of the bluff, and kicked down pebbles and tussocks of grass on to the beach below.

Despite the beauty of the day and the scene, my companion's brows were like midnight.

"No," he went on, "the sooner I accept the inevitable and make myself scarce the better."

"How is she to know your feelings if you don't tell her?" I remonstrated.

Again he gave the same exasperated laugh.

"Do you suppose you must spell out everything to a woman, or set it down in black and white before she understands? Why, man, every look of mine is a proposal, and she knows it."

He unbuttoned his Norfolk jacket, and took out a worn and frayed little Prayer Book from his inner pocket.

"Isabel Alston, Xmas, 1895," was written on the title page.

"She gave me this when I went away five years ago, and I've carried it about with me ever since. She was only a child," he said with a sigh, "not fifteen, and she clung round my neck—then—as if she would never let me go."

"Wonder you haven't lost it," I suggested, "seeing the odd corners you've managed to get into since you left England."

"Well, you see," he said simply, "first I prized the book for her sake, then I prized it for its own.

"When I was exploring in Africa it was the best friend I had. It's one thing to hear the words of it mumbled out by a curate in a hurry to get home to his dinner, and another to read them by yourself in the loneliness of an African forest, with no one but natives about you."

He paused for a minute, looking thoughtfully out to sea.

"You will hardly believe it," he resumed, "but when I was hit in the chest at Nicholson's Nek my first concern was not for myself, but for Isabel's Prayer Book.

"However, it's no use talking. She has no real regard for me, or else she is a heartless coquette. In either case I'm in a bad way."

He sat and mused a little longer, then suddenly leapt to his feet, his dark handsome face glowing with resolution.

"I'll go back if they will have me. My shoulder will be all right by the time we get to the Cape. Come on, Harry."

Reluctantly I rose to accompany him, and we made our way past the villas with lordly names, which garnished the edge of the cliff, to the quaint old post-office which stood in the centre of the village.

The postmistress took the telegram conveying the offer of Graham's services to his old chief, and read it.

"You're never thinking of going out again, Master Gerald," she cried, with the familiarity of an old friend, "and you so badly hurt and all."

"They want all the men they can get just now," he replied, as he opened his purse and counted out £2 15s., the cost of the cable. 'England expects that every man —' you know the rest, Mrs. Yallop."

"Where shall we go now, Harry?"

I suggested a favourite haunt of our boyhood, so we sculled across the river to a ruined abbey, which was huddled on the heights of a neighbouring hill. Here as lads we had often mused upon the dead and gone monks, and had peopled the ruins with lean ascetics, starving themselves into spiritual ecstacies, or with jovial personages like Friar Tuck of the Robin Hood romances.

A jackdaw flying overhead reminded me of a ledge of earth and masonry, twenty feet from the ground, to which we had been accustomed to climb in pursuit of the callow birds.

I looked up and shook my head.

"Rather too steep for a man with a game arm."

For answer, Gerald began to climb with his old agility, and soon we two were lying stretched at full length on the small plateau at the top.

As neither of us seemed disposed to carry on a conversation, I surrendered myself to the drowsy influences of the afternoon, and fell asleep, like another Eutyches, to the preaching of the daws.

Suddenly I was aroused by a fierce grip on my arm.

"Listen," whispered Graham.

A sound of voices rose from beneath us, and I became very wide awake indeed when I recognised the tones of Isabel Alston and her friend, Miss Lacon.

"Here, let's get out of this," he went on, still in a whisper.

"Certainly not," was my reply. "You lie low like Brer Rabbit."

Just then a gust of merriment came to our ears, followed by a laughing protestation from Isabel Alston.

"I couldn't, really. I am not in the right frame of mind for it."

Miss Lacon's voice replied:

"But I insist. This is just the place for it. Many a heart has unburdened itself here in days gone by. Come now, make a clean breast of it. I know you have something on your mind."

"I don't know where to begin."

"Then I must put some leading questions to you. You have been behaving very badly to the young men of this neighbourhood, and I must ask if your intentions towards any of them are strictly honourable. Now, first of all, what about Major Weatherby?"

"Much too fat. I must have a lover who can play Romeo, not Falstaff."

"Percival Graves?"

"Too good. I couldn't live up to him. He thinks dancing wicked, and can only talk about what he calls the 'present distress in the Church.'"

Graham chuckled so loudly that he nearly disclosed our presence. Graves was his pet abhorrence.

"Then what about the hero of Nicholson's Nek? What about Gerald? Now, be very careful in your reply."

"Too colonial. Besides he is eight years older than I am, and has large feet."

"Isabel," said her friend, seriously, "he loves you very dearly—everybody knows that. Do you think you are treating him well?"

There was a long pause, then Miss Alston said tearfully, "I suppose I am very wicked. I know he cares for me, and yet I feel as if I can do nothing but play with him. It is very horrid of me."

"Would you mind if he went away?" continued her gentle inquisitor. "I heard this morning that he is likely to go to the front again."

"Go to the front," repeated Isabel in a tone of surprise and indignation. "Oh, he mustn't do that. I never thought of that."

I glanced at Graham. His face was white with suppressed excitement. His whole body trembled.

"Steady, old chap," I urged.

"I believe you really care for him after all," were the next words to come to our ears.

"Do you see this little silver ring?" Isabel answered. "I have worn it ever since he made it and gave it to me when I was a girl at school. I used to wear it on my finger, but when he went away I hung it round my neck."

"Why," she added, "I have always looked upon Gerald as mine. Dear, stupid fellow, I love him with all my heart."

"Now's your time," I ejaculated, "go in and win."

And Graham went in, with such impetuosity that through haste or excitement he missed his footing when half way down and literally fell at Isabel's feet.

"You mean creature to listen—oh, have you hurt yourself, Gerald?"

"Twisted my shoulder a little—that's all."

After a judicious interval, I ventured to peep over the edge.

Maud Lacon had withdrawn to a discreet distance, whilst Isabel's waist seemed to be supporting my old schoolfellow's disabled arm.

The sound of a kiss rose on the quiet air, and I became aware that Gerald Graham had distinctly wasted the cost of a cablegram.

EUGENE ST. MEDARD.

MANY years ago, I arrived in Paris a perfect stranger, and took my lodgings at Meurice's famous English hotel. Having been shown to my apartments and made some change in my toilet, I went out for a short stroll in that great and magnificent city—the heart, as it were, of the world.

I had some letters of introduction, but, as I had not yet presented them, I believed myself wholly unknown to a living soul in that metropolis, except to the clerks of the hotel, who had seen me register my name, and that either should have fixed that name in their recollection was something that my modesty had not yet permitted me to take into consideration.

Judge of my surprise therefore, when I had gone but a few steps from Meurice's, 42 Rue de Rivoli, towards the beautiful palace gardens nearly opposite, to hear myself addressed as follows:

"Will Monsieur Henry Neville have the kindness to answer me a few important questions?"

I turned to the speaker, and saw at a glance he was a total stranger to me—that I had never, to my knowledge, looked upon his face before.

He was a middle-aged man, of rather prepossessing appearance, with grey hair, eyebrows and moustache, and was dressed as a plain, substantial citizen.

"I will do myself the pleasure to oblige you," I replied, in a polite and courteous tone. "Permit me first to remark, however, that you have a little the advantage of me, in that you already know my name."

"Monsieur will please know me as Eugene St. Medard."

"Did we ever meet before?"

"It is Monsieur that has now become the questioner," rejoined the Frenchman, with a peculiar smile and a kind of formal bow, half dignified, half polite, as if he would have said the questions were only to come from his side.

Somehow I felt a trifle vexed and nettled at the look and tone, and remarked a little coldly:

"I take it for granted one has the same right to interrogate as the other."

The features of the stranger grew grave, as one who feels a little annoyed, and his reply was impressive, without being exactly stern.

"If Monsieur will be kind enough to waive his right in this instance," he said, "it may save us both some time and trouble."

I scarcely knew why—perhaps something in the look, tone and manner—but the idea now suddenly occurred to me that I was speaking to a man in authority; and I said, respectfully:

"Proceed, Monsieur St. Medard."

"Thank you, Monsieur. You are an Englishman?"

"I am."

"You are distantly related to the Earl of Malvern?"

"So distantly that his lordship could never get near enough to know our family," I replied pleasantly, not a little surprised that a French stranger should know so much about me, and wondering all the while to what result his questions might be tending.

"You were an only child?"

"Yes."

"Your parents are dead?"

"Yes."

"You were left a small inheritance, which you have lately converted into money and brought with you, thinking it not unlikely you might take a fancy to settle on the Continent?"

"All true, Monsieur; but your knowledge of me and my private affairs astonishes me."

"Let that pass. The family of his lordship, the Earl of Malvern, has been unfortunate; no near of kin remain to him."

"Two profligate sons of a deceased sister are the nearest, I believe."

"They are both dead, Monsieur."

"Dead!" exclaimed I, with a start, for this was news to me.

"One died of heart-disease in Germany, the other was stabbed to death in Rome."

"Are you sure?"

"Certainly, Monsieur."

"Both of them! This astonishes me still more! I had not heard of this!"

"I know it."

"It seems to me you know everything!" said I, with a stare of wonder.

Monsieur St. Medard smiled, and continued:

"You are now the heir presumptive, Monsieur?"

"If what you tell me is true, I am," exclaimed I, almost startled at the thought of being so near to an earldom—for the then lord was old and feeble, and might drop off at any minute.

"Do you know who is next of kin after yourself, Monsieur?" inquired my strange interrogator.

"I think I have read it is one William Byerly."

"Right. Do you know him?"

"Only by report."

"Personally?"

"No."

"Did report speak favourably of him?"

"I am sorry to say it did not."

"From what you heard, do you consider him an honest man?"

"I do not."

"As you alone now stand between him and an earldom after the death of the present lord, would you consider your life safe in his hands?"

"Before I answer this question, will you permit me to ask some two or three?" said I.

"Proceed, Monsieur."

"Are you William Byerly?"

"No."

"Are you related to him?"

"No."

"Are you a friend of his?"

"No."

"Do you intend to use my reply in a legal way?"

"No."

"Is your object in these questions friendly to me?"

"Yes."

"Then I will venture to say that I should not like under present circumstances, to trust my life in the hands of William Byerly, provided there were a single chance of his escaping detection in case of wilful murder."

"Very well. May I now proceed?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

"You will please answer each statement of mine as if a question were directly put. On your way to Dover a fellow-traveller made your acquaintance?"

"Yes."

"You first saw him at Tunbridge?"

"Yes."

"You first noticed him while you were taking some refreshments at a restaurant?"

"Yes."

"He came up alongside of you, having a carpet-bag in his hand, and made some commonplace remark about the weather?"

"Yes," I continued to answer, getting more and more astonished every minute.

What could it all mean? Had every action of my life been noted, and for what purpose? My strange interrogator proceeded:

"This stranger was dressed in a black coat, with black cloth buttons, striped trousers, a parti-coloured tie, a white hat and patent-leather boots?"

"Yes."

"He had reddish hair, reddish whiskers, a florid complexion, and wore a green patch over his left eye?"

"Yes."

"After some commonplace remarks, he ventured to ask you which way you were travelling?"

"Yes."

"You replied you were going to Paris?"

"Yes."

"He was delighted to hear it, because he was going there also, and it was very pleasant, in a foreign country, to have a travelling companion from one's native land?"

"Yes."

"On the whole, he made so favourable an impression upon your unsuspicious mind, that you were quite pleased to have his company?"

"Yes."

"On your way to Dover he gave you some account of his past life—of his trials, struggles, disappointments and successes?"

"Yes."

"He was an inventor—a man of genius, who had lived to benefit mankind and himself? England owed much to him, and so did France, and so, in fact, did the whole world?"

"His statements were to that effect."

"Very well, Monsieur, as I have shown you that I know the nature of your conversation, it is not necessary that I weary you with detail. This man, this inventor, was going to Paris to take out a patent for a new motive power—one that was destined to revolutionize the world. He was very sorry he could not show it to you then; but until his papers should be filed in the proper department, he would not trust his own father with the secret?"

"All correct, Monsieur."

"Now, most unfortunately, as it appeared, on reaching Dover, where you were to take the regular steamer for Calais, your new acquaintance, in some way unknown to you, received the startling intelligence that his father was lying at the point of death, which would require him to post to London immediately; and would you, in whom he had every confidence, do him the favour to take charge of a small box, containing some important papers, and, on your arrival in Paris, open it, and deliver them to their proper addresses?"

"Yes, Monsieur," said I, becoming most intensely interested.

"Curiosity, Monsieur," continued the Frenchman, "is not one of your failings, I am happy to say, or you might not now be living to hear what I have to reveal."

"Good Heavens!" ejaculated I, "what is coming now?"

"That same box, Monsieur, is an infernal machine, intended to destroy your life the moment you open it!"

"Can it be?" I exclaimed, with a thrill of horror—"can this be possible?"

"I will prove it. Get it, and come with me before a commissary of police!"

"Pray, Monsieur, who are you?"

"A secret agent of police."

I hastened to get the box, handling it with great care' and together we proceeded to the nearest commissary' when, with my permission, it was split open, and lo! to my astonished and horrified gaze was revealed a row of small, loaded pistols, so arranged that, had I unlocked and opened the box in the ordinary way, they would have been discharged into my body.

On my subsequently asking for an explanation concerning this mysterious affair—how so much connected with myself and others had become known to the police of a foreign city—I was gravely but politely answered:

"It is not allowed us, Monsieur, to reveal our sources of information. We are happy to have thwarted the plans of a villain and saved your life."

I never knew who that villain was, though I always suspected Byerly of having a hand in it. I do not know that my life was ever again attempted, but certain it is I never again permitted intimacy from an unknown stranger.

On my accession to the title and estates, which occurred the following year, I did not forget to reward Eugene St. Medard, alias Henri Pouget, secret agent of police, as I thought he deserved to be rewarded for the preservation of my life; and to this day I have not ceased to wonder over the perfection of the French system of police.

Cute Constable Cobbles.

In the Commercial Room of the Black Magpie Hotel, near the Central Station, there entered, one evening, a faultlessly dressed and singularly frank and agreeable looking man of thirty.

He was followed very respectfully by Boots with some sample boxes bearing, in gold letters, the announcement:

"Trimmer and Jackson, Button Factory, Leeds."

"My name is Jones," said this imposing guest. "I shall stay some days. If anyone calls for me shortly, please tell them I am here, in the Commercial Room."

"I will, sir," said Boots.

A few minutes afterwards, he re-appeared bringing two such persons with him.

These also had fashionable clothes and pleasant, honest-looking countenances.

On Boots retiring, the visitors carefully looked round to see that no other people were in the apartment.

Then one of them exclaimed to Jones:

"Hallo, Bob! what on earth is this new game you are at? Wiring us from London to come to this town of all others? It's no use playing anything here. There's only one big jeweller in the place and the police here are as smart as smart can be. There's no chance!"

"I know that," replied Bob, "and that's why I've chosen it. There is no genius, no charm, in going to anywhere where you can make your living too easy."

"That's all very well for geniuses like you," put in the first speaker, "but it don't suit men of mere honest talent like us two. We daren't risk it."

"I quite admit that it's not safe for a pair of dunderheads like you to live anywhere out of a workhouse," answered Bob, "but I, who am, as you quite truthfully remark, a man of very superlative genius, take advantage of all difficulties to work mine ease the better thereby. Listen to me. A fine jewellers' shop—Messrs. Glitrums and Goldie of the High Street here—have £20,000 of splosh locked up in their safe every night. This safe is in the centre of a town supervised by a police so efficient that no professional communistic expert has ever attempted to get at it. Why? Because they never could do it and neither could I. The only man who could do that stroke here is a policeman himself."

"You've gone stark dotty," exclaimed both hearers.

"Nothing of the kind," retorted Bob. "All that is wanted is a constable who is known to be specially cute. That constable I have found. He is a beauty of the name of Cobbles and he is going to be on the High Street beat to-night. The rest is too easy."

"And do you mean to say you are about to be such a gull as to go pards with a policeman?" asked the audience in dumfounderment.

"Not so silly," replied Bob, "The policeman is going to let me rob the safe and skedddadle away comfortably with the whole of it, not to oblige me in any way and not for any share of the swag, but in the strict execution of his duty."

"Incredible!" cried both.

"Nothing of the kind. As easy as anything I've ever done. Listen to me."

And they listened.

* * * * *

It was a black, cold night. Constable Cobbles was on duty in the High Street, carefully wearing out the pavement with his fine flat soles.

"Constable Cobbles, I presume," said a well dressed gentlemanly man.

"The same, sir," said Cobbles.

"Don't you know me?"

"I can't say that I do, sir."

"Well that is strange, I would not have thought that of you who I've heard of as one of the smartest officers in this town."

Cobbles stood dumb with a mixture of shame and pride.

"I'm detective Ketchem of Scotland Yard," continued the gentleman.

"What him all the force is talking of? He as ran the great Brixton burglars to earth last week?"

"The same. I have just come from London close on the heels of two of the most desperate and clever men in the burglary business. From information received, I have sure grounds for believing they have planned for to-night a most daring robbery in this town."

"Good lor!" exclaimed Cobbles.

"Yes and it's near here and very near this hour that it's to come off. It's to be on the premises of Messrs. Glitrums and Goldie."

"You don't say so;"

"Yes. They got their particulars from a man lately discharged from that firm. He is keeping snug away in London. They have, from wax moulds, had keys made of the doors. In fact every preparation is perfect and the whole scheme most ingenious."

Digitized by Google

"Ha! ha! this is grand," said Cobbles, "how they will grin on the wrong side of their noddles when they find we've nicely copped them in the very act."

"Just so. And now Cobbles, to business. I usually work these little jobs single handed and, when I come into a town on a trail, I lay low till I've got my prisoners before I report myself to the local station. For I don't believe in doing that beforehand and letting the local chiefs get any of the glory or very likely bungle the thing by their meddling with it."

"There's something in that," said Cobbles.

"But this is a case where two are wanted. I must have an assistant, and he must be a man of superior intelligence and one with the true qualification of a detective—a man who can keep his mouth shut till exactly the right time for letting out."

"That's just it. You've hit off the definition of a smart officer to a tee, sir," said Cobbles.

"Quite so," replied Ketchem. "Furthermore, my long experience enables me to tell a man's brains by a first glance at his face, and I can see that you have 'em. They are—I admit—rare in the force—but you have 'em."

"It's very good of you to say that, sir; and I'm pleased to have it from a man of your 'igh standing," said Cobbles, bursting with satisfaction.

"Quite so. Now I wonder whether you know for what particular function I want an assistant in this case."

"It's because there are two doors to Messrs Glitrums and Goldie's premises. One in front and one in the alley in the rear. You want me to keep watch at the rear one whilst you have hold of the front one," promptly replied Cobbles, proud of his clear brains.

"Precisely. Then is that agreed?"

"I am your man," exclaimed Cobbles, exultant.

"Right! But first let me give you a professional wrinkle for your benefit. You have taken it for granted I am what I represented myself to be—Detective Ketchem of Scotland Yard. Now, for all you know, I might have been a burglar myself."

"I 'umbly apologise, Sir, for not having gone through that formality; but I could tell in a minute that you were a detective," answered Cobbles confidently.

"Another item which proves to me, Cobbles, that you are a man of clear perception. But still, the right thing is never to overlook official formalities," and the great man took out of his breast pocket some papers which he was just about to unfold when another idea seemed to occur to Cobbles. He stayed the gentleman's hand and said:

"No, don't trouble, sir. Allow me in my turn to make a cute remark. If you were a rogue you would never be such a jay as not to come properly prepared for such a game as this, and have ready faked, all papers required."

Mr. Ketchem took a keen side squint at Cobbles, with an uncomfortable feeling as to whether this innocent looking clodhopper was or was not talking irony.

Suddenly, Mr. Ketchem exclaimed:

"Hark! I hear wheels in the distance! The plan is for them to come in a light dog cart, similar to the one owned by Mr. Goldie. Quick! Come into the shadow."

Cobbles obeyed with alacrity.

They were not a moment too soon. For they barely had time to conceal themselves, before a natty dog cart turned into the top of the High Street. It rattled past, followed swiftly by the men in the shadow.

Two gentlemen were on the dog cart. They pulled

TO METAMORPHOSE FAT PERSONS.

CORPULENCY AND THE CURE. By F. CECIL RUSSELL. London: (Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square.)

"O that this too, too solid flesh would melt! has been the cry of countless mortals who have tipped the beam at several stones over their ordinary weight. They have sought relief of their burden of doctors, only in too many cases to find their advisers hopelessly at variance as to the methods to be employed for reducing them to the normal proportions. They have also had to combat the general but mistaken notion that excessive corpulence cannot be banished without danger to the general health of the body. Excessive fatness can never be considered a natural or healthy state of the body, and should be subjected to some sort of remedial treatment by everyone attacked by it. There has been no lack of attempts made in this direction by both medical men and scientists, but either the prescribed remedies have failed in affording permanent relief, or the system of cure recommended has been unfeasible for general adoption. Neither the one result nor the other, however, has attended the system of combating this malady prescribed by Mr. F. Cecil Russell; rather, from the fact that his work on the subject has just entered upon its eighteenth edition, must it be concluded that the system bearing his name has passed a very fair trial stage. In this little work the origin of fat, its dangers, symptoms, and so-called remedies are treated in detail, the workings of the latter explained, and the fallacy of trying superficial remedies clearly demonstrated. The system appears to be perfectly simple. It consists in taking three doses daily of a decoction made from common plants that (with one exotic exception) can be seen in our British meadows. If one reduces weight in a harmless way at the rate of 3lb. to 4lb. per week, and enjoys the moderate use of alcohol, it is very evident that this method is far away in front of the foreign treatment, which only makes the same reduction, and upon stringent regulations that are absolutely hostile to whisky drinking and almost impossible to maintain. One of the peculiarities of his system is that many patients upon reduction of superfluous fatty tissue become so healthy, and with an increased appetite, that they actually eat more food than before, and yet careful weighing testifies a daily decrease of flesh. The book is well worth reading."—The Birmingham Daily Gazette, July 3rd, 1900.

"DELIGHTFUL" TREATMENT FOR CURING CORPULENCE.

"CORPULENCY AND THE CURE.—People with a tendency to stoutness, and those who must be frankly classed as fat, will welcome any cure or alleviation of their condition, more especially this sultry weather. The process of clearing any physical disorder is so generally the converse of 'delightful' that the use of this and similar terms in reference to Mr. F. C. Russell's now popular treatment for corpulency naturally attracts special attention. These terms are to be found in a large number of the letters included in the just issued eighteenth edition of Mr. Russell's little volume of 256 pages, 'Corpulency and the Cure' (Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.). These communications are from persons of both sexes, and it is apparent that their number is represented by thousands annually, who have found in this system of treatment a safe, rapid, and permanent cure for excessive fatness. This testimony forms in the aggregate, indeed, a remarkable record of the rapid reduction of excessive adipose tissue, and those who have personal reasons for being interested in the subject should send to the above address four penny stamps for a copy (post free) of Mr. Russell's notably suggestive little book. 'I think the treatment most delightful,' writes one out of large numbers of equally enthusiastic correspondents. And the expressions 'Admirable tonic,' 'Splendid stuff,' 'A delicious beverage, mixed with mineral waters' are of constant recurrence in this singularly interesting correspondence. The details given by many of the writers of these letters as to the result of the treatment fully justify the use of such eulogistic phrases. The experience, too, must be rendered still more delightful by the knowledge which may be gained from a perusal of Mr. Russell's book, that his preparation is a pure vegetable product, without any admixture of mineral poisons which are too frequently administered. Mr. Russell also prints in his book the recipe for the preparation."—Nottingham Daily Express, June 30th, 1900.

up in front of Messrs Glitrums and Goldie's imposing establishment with its steel revolving shutters down and its black upper windows staring blindly into the night.

One gentleman alighted, opened the side door with a latch key, and went in.

"Now is the moment, Cobbles! Up you go the side alley to the back door! Sharp is the word!" whispered Mr. Ketchem.

But Cobbles now seemed much less alert in his movements than at first.

"Sir," whispered he, "had not you better go to the back and leave me to the front? You'll excuse me, sir, but your muscles are nothing like mine—and——"

"Don't be an idiot, Cobbles!" whispered Ketchem. "Do as I tell you! Don't you see the men will be off with the swag before we nab them if you dawdle like this?"

But the idiot had grown aggravatingly cogitative.

"It'll take 'em over ten minutes," whispered he, "before they can get off in that cart with anything worth taking. And I notice that one of the gents is remaining in the cart."

"Woodenhead," whispered Mr. Ketchem, whose face was blue with rage, "I warn you! Go at once to the back or I will give of you such a report to the Chief Constable as will get you kicked out of the force to-morrow morning, for the greatest dunderhead that ever wore blue trousers."

"You'll excuse me, sir," whispered the dunderhead, humbly, "but I remember that the back door is a narrow one and consequently you there alone can easily bar the passage of any number through it. Whereas, in front here, there is a wide door and two men and a horse to tackle and I am a young man of large and superior build. Every girl in the town will tell you that," continued the man in blue mildly.

"You'll drive me mad if you stop here a single second longer!" came from the parched throat of Mr. Ketchem, in gasping gurgles.

But Cobbles became more and more prosy in his conversation.

"Have you noticed, sir," he whispered, "how an idea grows in the mind by time and conversation, sir? An idea which, when first told, sometimes looks sometimes like something quite another after I've done a bit of a cackle all round it. For instance, there's another aspect of this fine notion of yours, sir, which has only just struck my thick head. It is this—but I'll tell it you later on. Meanwhile my place is at the back door, as you say, sir. Yes, sir, I'm off. See you again shortly."

Mr. Ketchem looked at the blank face of the ass as he disappeared into the side alley.

"Yes," reflected Ketchem, "I'm quite sure he is an ass. So that's all right."

The ass, as soon as he had turned off into the alley out of sight, made, with a swift rush, to a heap of stones in a corner, and filled his pockets with them. Remarking to himself complacently while he did so:

"Every ornamental accomplishment becomes useful some day if you only wait long enough—as the learned lady said when she found her manner of speaking Latin could scare the tramps away. I'm the champion fielder at cricket for twenty miles round. It's a-going to get me a fine rise in the police force to-night, unless I'm very much mistaken."

He then took a stone, and with a beautiful artistic aim, sent it clean into the centre of the middle back window of Messrs. Glitrum's and Goldie's establishment.

The crash of the glass resounded through the house like a shock of thunder.

Hardly had the concussion stopped than Cobbles was down at the end of the alley peeping round the front corner.

In half a second more he saw Mr. Ketchem and the gentleman, each with a packet in hand, rush out of the front door and scramble into the cart like grim death.

But before the last gentleman had got clear up the wheel to reach the seat, another artistically directed stone had landed on the first gentleman's skull and sent him, in a dream of stars, to the bottom of the vehicle.

And although not one quarter of a minute had elapsed between this occurrence and the starting of the horse at a wild rush up the High Street, yet the animal had not got his first pair of legs lifted ere a second masterpiece of projectile manipulation arrived just between the shoulder blades of the second gentleman in a way which made him suddenly howl for his mother and fall over the third gentleman, who was driving in front; and Cobbles had reached the cart and was hanging on to the back thereof.

The driver, and only remaining person in the citadel capable of combat, was now in an interesting position. He had to keep the horse from rushing them all into a lamp-post, or get over to the back of the cart and defend himself from Cobbles climbing into it.

In desperation he essayed the latter course; but the end of it came in a way which neither of them anticipated. The horse did not run into a lamp-post, nor did Cobbles get kicked off the cart.

The third man's entire weight being added to the weight of Cobbles dragging on to the back of the cart—which was a two wheeled one, so overbalanced the front that the horse, lifted off the ground by the strap running round him, and he, feeling so uncanny thereby, hanged his mind and stopped.

And the recoil, acting on the body of the third man, sent his chest over the back board in a way so handy for Cobbles to land his fist into, that he did so. And so effectively was this done that the third man went likewise, for the time, into the land of stars.

After this, Cobbles rammed the three down into the cart, one over the other, and, sitting on the top of them with a whip ready over their heads to keep matters peaceful on the way, drove them triumphantly to the police station, humming, as he went, those touching lines of a well-known music-hall poet:

"Do you take me for a silly, do you take me for a jay?
P'raps you think that I'm as simple as can be,
But you make a great mistake
For you'll find I'm wide awake,
It's no use of you to play your tricks on me."

IN these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver plated pencil-cases or ten popular six shilling novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, SHORT STORIES, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by first post on Monday, August 6th, 1900.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. SHORT STORIES

No. 605. Price One Penny.
Week ending August 4th, 1900.

THE ADVENTURE OF ELIZABETH MOREY OF NEW YORK.

In the sea story of Australia, from the days of Captain Phillip in 1788, to the end of the "fifties," in the present century, American ships and seamen have no little part.

First they came into the harbour of Sydney Cove as traders carrying provisions for sale to the half-starved settlers, then as whalers, and before another thirty years had passed, the starry banner might be met with anywhere in the Pacific from the sterile shores of the Aleutian Islands to the coasts of New Zealand and Tasmania.

Early one morning in October, 1804, the American ship Union sailed in through Sydney Heads, and dropped anchor in the Cove. She was last from Tongatabu, the principal island of the Friendly Group.

So soon as she had been boarded by the naval officer in charge of the port, and her papers examined, the master stated that he had had a very exciting adventure with the Tongatabu natives, who had attempted to cut off the ship, and that there was then on board a young woman named Elizabeth Morey, whom he had rescued from captivity among the savages.

In a few minutes the young woman made her appearance in the main cabin, and was introduced to the officer.

Her age was about six-and-twenty, and her manners engaging; yet whilst she expressed her willingness to tell the story of her adventures among the islanders, she declined to say anything of her birth or parentage beyond the fact that she was a native of New York, and some years previously had made her way to the Cape of Good Hope.

Her extraordinary narrative was borne out in all details as far as her rescue was concerned by the master of the Union, who she said had treated her with undeviating kindness and respect.

This is her story:—

"In February of the year 1802, when she was living at the Cape of Good Hope, she made the acquaintance of a Captain Melton, the master of the American ship Portland. His dashing appearance, his command of apparently unlimited money, and his protestations of affection for the unfortunate girl soon led her to respond to his advances, and ultimately to consent to accompany him on a voyage to the islands of the South Pacific.

"After a prosperous voyage the Portland arrived at what is now known as Nukualofa Harbour, on the Island of Tongatabu. Within a few hours after anchoring, Captain Melton received a note from a white man named Doyle, who was the only European living on the island, asking him to come on shore and visit the chief, who particularly wished to see him and secure his aid in repelling an invasion from the neighbouring group of islands known as Haabai.

"Had Melton known that this man Doyle was an escaped convict from Van Diemen's Land, he would at least have been careful; had he known that the man was in addition a treacherous and bloodthirsty villain, he would have hove-up anchor, and, sailing away, escaped his fate.

"But Doyle, in his note, enumerated the advantages that would accrue to him (Melton) by assisting the chief, and the seaman fell into the trap. 'You must try,' said the writer of the letter, 'to send at least one boat's crew well armed.'

"Melton was a man with an elastic conscience. Without troubling his head as to the right or wrong side of this quarrel among savages, he promptly complied with the request of the beachcomber, and called for volunteers; the whole of the ship's company responded.

"The chief mate, Gibson, picked four men; Anderson, the second officer, eight men, and these were at once dispatched on shore by the captain.

"The engagement came off on the following day, and the American allies of the chief (whom Miss Morey calls Ducara) inflicted fearful slaughter upon the enemy, and returned to the ship highly satisfied with themselves, and their native friends, who promised them every indulgence likely to gratify their tastes.

"In the evening Ducara himself came on board, and politely thanked the captain for his assistance.

"He slept all night in the cuddy, attended by Doyle, his minister of destruction, and took his leave early in the morning, promising to send ample refreshments on board in part return for favours received, and requesting that boats should be sent that evening to convey his gifts off to the ship.

"Within a few hours after he had returned to the shore, many hundreds of stalwart natives were seen carrying baskets of provisions down to the beach, and piling them in heaps in readiness for the boats.

"Melton, at this stage, seemed to have some sort of suspicion in his mind about sending the boats ashore after dark, for he gave the mate instructions not to dispatch them until he gave orders.

"The mate, however, who had been smitten by the beauty of a Tongan girl who had expressed her unqualified approval of his fighting capabilities in a very unconventional manner, had the utmost confidence in the good-will of the natives, and took it upon himself to disobey his captain's commands; consequently two boats were sent off just as daylight was breaking, and whilst the skipper lay asleep in his cabin.

"Within a couple of hours the smaller of the two boats returned, loaded with yams, 'gnatu' (tappa cloth), baked pigs, and fish.

"She was steered by the beachcomber, Doyle, and was rowed by two of the ship's boys, instead of the four men who had taken her ashore; these boys, it must be mentioned, had formed part of the crew of the larger boat, and had remained on the beach whilst the men had gone into the village at the invitation of Doyle and his fellow-conspirators.

"They, therefore, knew nothing of what had kept their shipmates from returning to the boats, when Doyle appeared, and said he wished to go off to the ship, and that the others would follow later on.

"Accompanying the boat was a flotilla of canoes, filled with hundreds of savages, who were allowed to come alongside, though the girl Morey was so terrified by their savage aspect that she begged her lover to instantly recall the rest of his men and heave up anchor.

"Melton, however, although he was now in a state of suspense owing to the non-appearance of his boat's crews, answered her calmly enough.

"'The two boys and Doyle say that the hands went up to the chief's house to see a native dance,' he said. 'I'll punish them for it when they return.'"

"Meanwhile the boat was unloaded, and again sent on shore with the two boys, and Doyle's native friends clambered up on board from any accessible part of the ship.

The beachcomber thrust a dagger into the throat of the unfortunate man.

"The beachcomber himself, a wild-looking, dark-skinned ruffian, who had clothed himself in a shirt and trousers, now came aft and again assured the captain that he need feel no alarm at the great number of naked savages who now thronged the deck, from the windlass right aft to the wheel. Perhaps, however, the villain had some feeling of humanity in his vile heart, for seeing the terrified face of the girl Morey, he suggested that she should go below until the natives had returned to the shore.

"But so impressed was she with a sense of imminent peril that she refused to leave the poop, and begged Melton earnestly, 'for goodness sake to take heed, and not thrust himself among the savages on the main deck.'

"The beachcomber gave her a glance—half rage, half pity—then with his left hand he suddenly dashed her aside, and with a ferocious yell sprang at Melton and thrust a dagger into the throat of the unfortunate man.

"In an instant his savage followers began their work of slaughter, and Mr. Gibson, the chief mate, the boatswain, and four seamen were soon lying dead upon the bloodstained decks, their heads battered out of all human semblance by the clubs of the islanders.

"Two lads, Miss Morey, and her negro servant-woman, were spared, but hurried down below.

"The bodies of the murdered men were at once thrown overboard to the sharks by Doyle's orders, and then he directed the natives to clear the decks.

"Elizabeth Morey, terrified out of her senses at the dreadful scenes she had witnessed, attempted to spring overboard, but Doyle caught her as she came on deck, urged her not to be frightened, and promised her in the name of the Virgin that no harm should come to her.

"So soon as the decks had been ridden of all traces of the ghastly work just completed, the half-unconscious girl was lifted over the side, placed in a canoe, taken on shore, and handed over to the care of a chief's wife.

"When she came to her senses she learnt from Doyle that all who were left alive of the ship's company were herself and servant, a Malay seaman, five boys, and an old sailor, who was a dwarf; the latter had evidently been spared, either on account of the natives ranking him as a boy, or from their aversion to inflict injuries upon anyone physically or mentally afflicted.

"The following three days were spent by the natives in unloading the ship, the work being carried on in the most systematic manner under the command of Doyle, the survivors of the crew being compelled to assist in the task.

"The cargo, which consisted mainly of bales of cotton, was got on shore in something less than a week; then the islanders began to dismantle the ill-fated ship.

"By the eighth day all the sails except the fore and main topsails were unbent and taken ashore.

"On the afternoon of this day but half-a-dozen natives were on board; they, with the five 'boys' (probably lads under eighteen years of age), and the dwarf sailor before mentioned, were 'spelling' for an hour or so before beginning to unbend the topsails, when, noticing that their captors were off their guard, the brave little man determined to retake the ship. In a few minutes he gained over his youthful shipmates to the attempt; they promised to stand by him to the last.

He picked up the axe and ran towards Doyle.

"Quietly arming themselves with axes, with iron belaying pins, with handspikes, with anything heavy and deadly they could lay their hands upon, they waited for the signal to begin the attack.

"Doyle, the blood-stained murderer, lay upon the skylight under the awning, half asleep and unsuspecting of danger; his native associates either slept or lounged about the main deck.

"A few hurried whispered words passed between the six whites; then the dwarf, carrying an axe negligently in his hand, ascended to the poop and laid it down on the deck. Then he turned, and his quick seaman's eye took in the surroundings.

"The trade wind was blowing freshly, the ship (she was a full-rigged ship, though under five hundred tons), was straining at her hempen cable, and the low, palm-clad shore was nearly two miles away.

"He picked up the axe and ran towards Doyle, who tried to spring to his feet as the weapon buried itself to the head in his bosom! In less than five minutes the dreadful work was done, and Doyle and the six Tongans were weltering in their gore upon the very deck which was still stained by the traces of their own crimes. Before the natives on shore could realise what had happened the cable was cut, the topsails loosened and sheeted home, and the Portland standing out to sea through the dangerous network of reefs which surrounded the harbour. Her recapture was a ghastly work, but the law of self-preservation is inexorable under such circumstances.

"Elizabeth Morey, aroused from a troubled slumber by the cries of her captors, came to the doorway of the chief's house, and stood watching the ship, which, though only under her fore and main topsails, was fast slipping through the water.

Digitized by Google

"In two hours the Portland was safe, and the broken-hearted girl sank upon her knees and wept. She was now utterly alone, for her negro servant-woman had gone on board the ship with Doyle to get some of her clothing, and had been carried off.

"The only remaining member of the Portland's crew was a Malay—a man of whom she had an instinctive dread, for since the massacre of the ship's company he had one day asked her with a mocking grin if she could not 'clean his coat.' It was Melton's white duck jacket, and the ensanguined garment brought all the horror of his death before her again.

"Then followed fifteen long, long months of horror, misery, and agony. She was a woman, and her terrible fate evokes the warmest pity. Whatever may have been her past before she met Melton and accompanied him on his fateful voyage, her sufferings during those fifteen dreadful months may be imagined, but not written of or suggested, except by the neurotic new-woman writer, who loves to dwell upon things degrading, terrifying, and abhorrent to the healthy mind."

In August, 1804, the American whaler Union, of Nantucket, after having refreshed at Sydney Cove, as Port Jackson was then called, sailed on a sperm-whaling cruise among the South Sea Islands. She arrived at Tongatabu on the last day of September.

So soon as the anchor was let go a fleet of canoes appeared, and the occupants made the most friendly demonstrations towards Captain Pendleton and his officers. In the leading canoe was a man whom the captain took to be a Malay, and upon being questioned this surmise proved to be correct. In broken English he imformed Pendleton that the ship would be provided with plenty of fresh food, water and wood, if the ship's boats were sent ashore.

He called the hands aft and explained the situation.

The captain's boat was thereupon swung out and lowered, and manned by six men, the captain and Mr. John Boston, the supercargo, going with them. These people were armed with six muskets and two cutlasses.

So soon as the boat was well clear of the ship the natives became very troublesome, clambering up the chain plates, and forcing themselves on board in great numbers.

The chief mate, Daniel Wright, seems to have shown more sense than most of the poor fools who, by their own negligence, brought about—and still bring about—these tragedies.

He got his men together and tried to drive off the intruders, but despite his endeavours thirty or forty of them kept to the deck, and their countrymen in the canoes alongside rapidly passed them up a number of war-clubs.

Wright, with the greatest tact, and with apparently good-humoured force, at last succeeded in clearing the decks and bustling all the natives except the chief, over the side into their canoes.

He was a big, brawny, New Englander, had served in the American Navy before he had taken to whaling, and knew the value of coolness and discipline in an emergency though he felt much inclined to pistol the chief, who all this time had been pretending to support his authority, though actually telling his people to be "more patient, as the time had not yet come."

This chief, whose name is not given in the Sydney Gazette of 1804, but who may have been the same "Ducara" of the Portland massacre, or one of Ducara's matabulis, at last took his leave with the usual protestations of regard so natural to even the present Christianised Tongan native of this year of grace, when he means mischief.

Descending into his canoe, he led the whole flotilla to the beach. Then the mate hoisted the ensign, and fired a gun as a warning to those of the ship's company on shore to return.

No notice was taken of the signal, and presently through his glass Mr. Wright saw that the captain's boat was lying broadside on to the beach, surrounded by a crowd of islanders, and without a boat-keeper. This was sufficiently alarming.

It was now late in the afternoon, and Captain Pendleton had been absent five hours. He at once came to the conclusion that the people who had gone ashore in the boat were either prisoners or had been murdered.

To send another boat after them, he felt sure, would only lead to the destruction of the whole ship's company in detail, and the ultimate loss of the ship without there being the least chance of effecting any good.

So he called the hands aft, explained the situation, and began to prepare to resist capture.

All the available firearms were loaded, heavy stones which formed the ship's ballast were placed along the waterways fore and aft in readiness to smash the canoes which he anticipated would come alongside, the drying-out works fires were lighted, and the huge dry-pots filled with water, which when boiling would add to their means of defence, by pouring it down in bucketsful upon the savages; the cable was prepared for slipping, sails loosened, and every other precaution which suggested itself to him made.

The sun dropped into the western sea-rim, and there was still no sign of the captain's boat.

On the shore an ominous silence prevailed, though now and then it would be broken by the weird, resonant boom of a conch-shell.

The night was passed in the greatest anxiety by all on board, every man, musket in hand, keeping a keen look-out.

Almost as the dawn broke, two canoes were seen to put off from Nukualofa beach, and come towards the ship.

They were manned by young Tongan "bucks" who, in reply to the mate's questions as to the whereabouts of the captain and his crew, answered him with gestures which the ship's company rightly enough construed as meaning that their comrades had all been killed, and that their turn would come shortly.

This so enraged the seamen that they tried to induce Mr. Wright to open fire on the canoes, destroy them, and get the ship away before worse happened.

But the mate, still hoping that his people on shore were still alive, and that he could yet rescue them, refused to comply, and the whole of that day and night passed without anything further happening.

On the following morning several canoes came within hail and then lay-to.

In one of them was the Malay, who asked the mate to come ashore as his captain and the supercargo wished to see him.

The mate temporised and requested the Malay to come on board and explain matters, but he refused and returned to the shore.

In a few hours he reappeared at the head of a fleet of canoes, and then, to Mr. Wright's intense astonishment, he saw that the Malay was accompanied by a young white woman, who was sitting on the for'ard outrigger of the canoe, in which the Malay was steersman.

The flotilla brought to within pistol-shot of the ship, and the woman stood up and called to him in English.

"Come on shore and see the captain. He wants to speak to you."

The mate made no answer, but beckoned to the fleet of canoes to come nearer. And then, mercifully, as he took another look at the white woman, he saw her, when the surrounding savages were not watching her, shake her head vehemently to him not to comply.

The flotilla came still nearer, and again Elizabeth Morey was made to repeat the mechanical request for him to come on shore and see the captain.

Wright, surmising that she was acting under coercion, appeared to give little heed to her request, but told the Malay, who seemed to direct the natives, that he would wait for the captain.

Then the fleet of canoes turned, and headed for the shore, and the captive woman gave the mate a despairing, agonised look that not only filled him with the deepest commiseration for her, but almost convinced him that poor Pendleton and the others were dead.

Another night of weary anxiety passed, and again with the dawn a single canoe came off, manned by half a dozen armed natives steered by the Malay and carrying Miss Morey. This canoe was followed by many others, but the leading one alone came close enough to the whale-ship to communicate.

Little by little her savage crew drew nearer, watching every movement of those on board with the utmost suspicion; the mate, who was standing at the break of the poop on the starboard side, desired them to come closer, holding in his hand a loaf of bread, which he said he wanted to give to the white woman. The loaf was inclosed in a piece of white paper, on which he had written these words.

Wright, jumping overboard, helped the poor creature up over the side.

"I fear that all on shore are murdered. I will wait here a few days in the hope that you may be able to escape to us."

For some minutes the savages watched the white man, who, apparently disgusted with his attempts to induce them to come closer and take the loaf of bread, placed it on the rail and lit his pipe.

The Malay again urged him to come ashore and "see the captain," but Wright made an impatient gesture and told him he must come closer if he wanted to talk.

The scoundrel did bring the canoe a few fathoms nearer, and then stopped her way.

Then the girl, unable to restrain herself any longer, stood up and cried out:

"All your friends on shore have been killed," then she leapt into the water and swam towards the ship.

A yell of rage burst from the natives in the canoes, but it was answered by the fire of musketry from the ship and the thunder of two carronades, which, loaded with iron nuts and bolts, had been in readiness, one on the poop, the other on the topgallant forecastle—and the girl succeeded in reaching the ship's side in time to take hold of a life-buoy secured to a line which was thrown to her, and Wright, jumping overboard, helped the poor creature up over the side into safety.

Then began a desperate and furious assault to capture the ship. The savages, led by the renegade Malay, made three successive attempts to board, but were each time beaten back by Wright and his gallant seamen, and the crystal water around the Union was soon reddoned to a deep hue. Meanwhile the cable had been slipped, and, like the Portland, the Union's company were saved from death by the freshness of the trade-wind alone.

In half an hour after the last attack had been repelled, the ship was out of danger from pursuit.

So soon as the vessel had cleared the passage Wright hove her to, and went down below to Miss Morey, who, exhausted and almost hysterical as she was, yet answered his questions readily.

"You must forgive me, madam, but it is my duty to at once ask you an important question. Are you sure that Captain Pendleton and the supercargo are dead? I cannot take the ship away if there is any uncertainty about their fate."

"I beseech you, sir, to have no doubts. I saw the two gentleman beaten to death by clubs before my eyes. They were sitting down to eat when they were murdered. One was killed by the Malay man, the other by an old matabuli. Oh, for Heaven's sake, sir, do not delay! The natives have been planning to capture the ship and murder her people for the past three days."

Then, as she became more collected, she satisfied him that all of Captain's Pendleton's party had been cruelly and treacherously murdered, and also told him her own terrible story previous to the arrival of the Union.

The destruction of poor Pendleton and Mr. Boston had been planned, she said, by the Malay; and when he and his native friends found that they could not induce Mr. Wright to further weaken his ship's company by sending another boat's crew on shore, so that the Union might the more easily be captured, she was ordered under the most awful threats to act as decoy.

Resolved to upset their diabolical plan, or die in the attempt, she gave an apparently cheerful assent to the meditated scheme of murder, and hence her appearance in the canoe with the treacherous Malay.

Under the kindly care of Mr. (now Captain) Wright, the young woman soon regained her health and strength in a great measure, and her delight knew no bounds when he announced to her his intention of returning to Sydney Cove to refit before proceeding home to America.

The Union, as we have before stated, entered Sydney harbour in October, 1804, and before that time the simple gratitude of the rescued girl to her rescuer had changed into a deeper and tenderer feeling. But we must not anticipate.

Soon as Captain Wright had made his report to the New South Wales authorities, Miss Morey went on shore, where she was treated most hospitably by the wives of some of the military officers, whilst Wright was refitting his ship.

A few days afterwards there arrived in Sydney Harbour an East India ship, the captain of which gave Wright some interesting particulars concerning the Portland and Captain Melton.

The latter had a peculiar history. At the end of the year 1800 he appeared in Manila, where he was intrusted with the command of a brig belonging to Mr. John Stewart Kerr, the American Consul of that city. His orders were to proceed to Batavia, and there dispose of his cargo, bringing in return saleable goods for the Manila market. He was given also a letter of credit for 20,000 dollars, the better to load the vessel.

On arrival at Batavia he sold the cargo and the brig into the bargain, and purchased in her place the Portland, a ship of about 400 tons.

From Batavia he wrote to Kerr—he seemed to have been the Captain "Bully" Hayes of his time—informed him of what he had done and mentioned that as he intended to make a long pleasure cruise among the islands of the South Pacific, he did not expect to return to Manila for some considerable time!

He also, it is needless to say, duly cashed his letter of credit for 20,000 dollars, which six months afterwards was duly presented and taken up by Mr. Kerr.

The Portland was then chartered by a firm of Dutch merchants at Batavia to proceed to Serra Bay to load rice and return to Batavia. Melton sailed to Serra Bay, loaded his cargo of rice, and instead of returning to Batavia, went to the Isle of France and there cheerfully sold it.

The next account of him received at Manila was that he was having a "real good time," at the Cape of Good Hope, where his fascinating manners and command of money (Kerr's money) made him many friends.

Suddenly, however, he and the Portland disappeared, and Elizabeth Morey, as we have mentioned, accompanied him.

He had given out that he was bound for the North-west coast of America, to enter into the fur trade, but, beyond that rumour, nothing more was heard of him until the Union arrived at Port Jackson, and Elizabeth Morey told the tale of his dreadful end.

* * * * *

No further mention of the names of Captain Wright, Elizabeth Morey, or the good ship Union appear in the early colonial records after 1804; but that the girl's rescue by the gallant mate of the whaleship led to her ultimate happiness we can safely assume, for in the year 1836 they were married in Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, one "Marie Kaulani Shepherd, daughter of John Shepherd, to Daniel Morey Wright, master of the ship Patience and son of Daniel and Elizabeth Wright, of Sa'em, U.S.A."

My Last Rehearsal.

PROBABLY the theory of Evolution never received a more practical illustration, physically and mentally, than in my case. For whereas I am now a portly, sedate, well-to-do father of a family, churchwarden, overseer and guardian of my parish, some thirty years ago I was a slender, harum-scarum bachelor, impecunious, and ready at a moment's notice for any folly which might present itself to my excitable and mercurial temperament. Vicious I certainly was not, but merely thoughtless and inconsiderate.

My name is Mathews, and I was christened Charles, after my uncle, from whom my father had pecuniary expectations.

The late Charles Reade was undeniably right when he said that versatility never pays. I was a fair baritone singer, a clever caricaturist, and admirable mimic, and enjoyed great renown as an amateur actor. Yet at the age of twenty-five I was entirely dependent on my father for the necessaries of life and pocket money.

My largest creditor at this time was my tailor, to whom I was indebted for the sum of ninety-five pounds, four shillings and sixpence.

Unless my father "stumped up," I had as much chance of being able to pay the National Debt as defraying this amount.

For some reason or other my father proved unusually obstinate at this juncture, and declined to do anything in the matter; I remember he described his conduct as firmness.

I have omitted to mention that I was in love with a very pretty but portionless young lady of the name of Walker. My father characterised this circumstance as another sample of my thoughtlessness and perversity, as among my acquaintance were several young ladies with very tolerable fortunes.

I had a quasi-rival for Miss Walker's good graces of the name of Nobbs. He was so very plain and unpleasant in his manners that I entertained no fear of being ousted by him, and accordingly we were very good friends.

He employed the same tailor (Binks) as myself, and one memorable morning Mr. Nobbs came to me and told me that Binks had issued a writ against me for the amount of my debt.

The law against debtors at that date was much more stringent than it is at present, and I determined to leave London and go into hiding for a time, until I could prevail on my wealthy uncle to relieve me of Binks' claim.

I had a few pounds in my pocket, and informed Nobbs that I would start at once for a small watering-place which I will here call Seamouth. I had never been there, but had heard a good account of it from a friend who had found it cheap, quiet, and salubrious. In an hour I had my modest portmanteau packed (which had my name duly inscribed on a brass plate thereon), and was steaming at the rate of thirty miles an hour for the nearest town to Seamouth.

When I left the train, I found there was a coach about to start for Seamouth, a distance of eight miles. After an hour's drive I was deposited at the door of the "Red Lion." I was not much puzzled as to the choice of my hotel, for the "Red Lion" was the only inn in the place.

Seamouth consisted apparently of one long straggling street, with a few detached houses on the outskirts. At a distance of a hundred yards the open sea tumbled and tossed on a shingly beach.

In ten minutes I felt I had "done" Seamouth, and contemplated with some feelings of dismay a lengthened residence in this secluded spot. I had already secured a bedroom, left my portmanteau, and ordered a steak and accessories prior to my stroll round the place.

As I crossed the entrance hall to the coffee-room, I found myself the object of special observation by the staff of the hotel. The rubicund Boniface saluted me with a broad grin, the antiquated waiter smirked in a peculiar fashion as he hastened to open the door of the coffee-room, while a house-maid on the stairs was evidently much more occupied in studying my personal appearance than sweeping the carpeted stairs. A half-length of what was evidently the cook peered from the regions below.

I was about to seat myself at one of the tables when the host advanced, and with a very deferential bow, begged that I would accept the offer of a private room. Anticipating my objection, he went on to say that no extra expense would be incurred in consequence.

So a few minutes saw me engaged in discussing a juicy tender steak, some mealy potatoes, flanked by a tankard of nut-brown ale, with an obsequious waiter as my sole attendant. I determined to write to my uncle immediately after dinner, as my slender purse would soon be exhausted in defraying the cost of my present luxury.

As the waiter placed an apple-tart on the table, he remarked:

"I think this is your first visit to Seamouth, sir?"

Digitized by Google

I replied in the affirmative, muttering sotto voce, "and also my last; Seamouth appears to be a very sleepy kind of place."

The old waiter drew himself up, apparently resenting this stigma on the little watering-place:

"Very quiet, sir, but very select. But we shall be very lively now you have honoured us with a visit, sir."

I failed to perceive how the presence of a fugitive debtor could add to the cheerfulness of any place, but I made no reply, considering the compliment would be charged for in the bill.

"It's hastonishing, sir, what a difference the theatre makes when it is hopen."

"But Seamouth cannot support a theatre," I replied.

"No, sir, honly when a star comes; I remember, when I was a boy, seeing Mr. Macready hact here; and people came from far and near to see 'im. Our yard was full of traps of hevery description; and so it will be hon Thursday next, when Mr. Charles Mathews makes his appearance."

As he said these words the old waiter made a profound genuflection, and left the room. A light dawned upon me; my name was identical with that of the great comedian. The waiter had read the name on the brass plate on my trunk, and I had been mistaken for the coming man.

I was chuckling over the singular error, and had resolved to disabuse the staff of the "Red Lion" accordingly, whose curious reception of me was now explained, when a circumstance occurred which caused me to change my resolution. The window of the room which I occupied commanded a view of the coach road leading to the nearest town.

As I reflected over the curious blunder, I found myself mechanically watching a dog-cart which was rapidly approaching the inn. It drew up at the door, and from the vehicle descended a stout, coarse-looking man, wearing a very bad hat, and very seedy in his habiliments in general.

I was reading the advertisement in the Seamouth Express which announced the appearance of the London actor, in his celebrated character of Sir Charles Coldstream in Used Up on Thursday next.

This was one of my best impersonations as an amateur, and I had made such close study of the original representative that I could reproduce every tone, and glance, and gesture. My personal appearance was also very similar.

At this moment the waiter entered the room, holding his hand before his face, and apparently convulsed with laughter.

"I beg pardon, sir, but you will laugh as much as me when I tell you, sir. There is a sheriff's officer in the coffee-room, who wants to serve a writ on a Mr. Charles Mathews; he inquired if a gent of that name was here. I told him, yes—the noted hactor. He guv a sigh, and said that was not the gent he wanted. He is going to stop here, as he knows for certain that his man is coming to Seamouth directly, and he will watch the arrivals by coach."

As the waiter delivered this exordium my mind was at work endeavouring to solve the mystery of my hiding-place being discovered. Nobbs—that was the solution. On second thoughts he had disclosed the place of my retreat to Binks.

As the waiter concluded, my determination was taken. My natural love of fun and adventure, combined with the instinct of self-preservation, decided me to accept the honours thus suddenly thrust upon me. I made no reference to the waiter's story, treating it as too absurd for discussion.

"I want to send a note round to the lessee of the Theatre Royal."

"Certainly, sir. The boots can take it."

In a few seconds I had scribbled the following:

"Dear Simpson—to quote the Duke's Motto—I am here. Will you call a rehearsal of Used Up for to-morrow at eleven? Yours faithfully, C. J. Mathews."

This characteristic note was promptly dispatched, and I waited the result in serenity and with a keen sense of approaching enjoyment.

In half-an-hour the answer came.

"Dear Mr. Mathews, I am agreeably surprised by your early arrival, as I did not expect you till the morning of Thursday (the day of the performance). I suppose the papers are in error in advertising you as playing at Plymouth to-day, Tuesday? I shall be very pleased to make your acquaintance. Yours sincerely, T. Simpson."

Nothing could be more fortunate. Mr. Simpson had never seen the great comedian; and I was safe till Thursday. The reader may inquire, Why did I not make my escape from Seamouth while I had the opportunity? I can only reply, that my love of adventure was responsible for my conduct. I should inflict no harm on any one; indeed, I was conferring an actual benefit on the company of the Theatre Royal by affording them the great advantage of an extra rehearsal. And the actor himself would find his task on Thursday considerably smoother, as all my "business" was precisely the same as he would adopt.

Punctual to the hour appointed, I made my appearance at the stage-door on the following morning.

"Good-morning, Mr. Mathews," exclaimed a little, shabbily-dressed man, who was standing with his back to the fire-place, in conversation with the Cerberus who guarded the sacred portal of the drama.

"Good-morning, Mr. Simpson. Where is the company?"

"They are all on the stage, Mr. Matthews. I have got a pretty Mary for you, and a capital blacksmith."

I followed Mr. Simpson along a dimly-lighted passage to the stage. As we threaded the gloomy labyrinth, my conductor whispered to me:

"You were satisfied with the terms I offered?"

"Perfectly," I answered. "Nothing could have been more liberal." (How I wondered what they were!)

"Yes, I think that arrangement is the fairest for both parties," continued the worthy manager.

I found a group of seedy-looking individuals on the stage, who were severally introduced to me. The personator of Mary Wurzel was a pretty looking girl, but very pale and emaciated, while the representative of the blacksmith was a diminutive but sturdy little man.

"Hallo! this won't do; Ironbrace should be a big man or where is the alarming contrast between Sir Charles in the deadly affray which takes place."

The manager shrugged his shoulders.

"We can't get another now."

While they arranged the first scene I glanced round the theatre. It was a band-box of a house, and I should not have hesitated to play the piece in my own proper person had necessity compelled it. But when Thursday came I must be miles away.

Here I suddenly remembered that the individual I was personating was renowned for his vivacity and stores of anecdote. So I drew on my memory, an uncommonly retentive one, and poured forth a stream of witticisms, which seemed to meet the circumstances of the case, for the company laughed immoderately, until at last the manager suggested a commencement of the rehearsal.

"We have all heard of your wonderful conversational powers, Mr. Mathews, and report has not exaggerated them, but suppose we——"

"Exactly, Mr. Simpson; business first and pleasure afterwards."

I at once addressed myself to the business of the scenes, and really worked very hard in putting the company through their facings.

It would not interest the general reader to mention in detail the very natural shortcomings of a scratch country company of strolling players. But I found them very docile and extremely anxious to follow my directions implicitly. Small as were my available resources, I expended half-a-sovereign in refreshment, and their countenances expressed their gratitude even more than their words.

There was another piece down for rehearsal, Married for Money, but I was totally unacquainted with the piece so I suggested it should be postponed till the morrow.

Towards the conclusion of the rehearsal I observed Mr. Simpson examining my features with great earnestness.

"You wear uncommonly well, Mr. Mathews; I was told you were about forty, but you don't look more than five-and-twenty."

"All habit, my dear sir, I never encourage the idea of age. I follow the advice of Bulwer Lytton. Decide upon the age at which you choose to remain, and refuse to become any older—I have selected five-and-twenty. Perennial Jove, you know, and all that sort of thing."

My auditor was convinced; I continued:

"Besides youth is my stock in trade. How could I play the youthful Jemmy Jessamys if I looked my real age?"

My logic was unanswerable.

Ere we parted Mr. Simpson shook my hand heartily.

"A cheque on Friday morning, as soon as we have verified the receipts; I suppose that will do, Mr. Mathews?"

"Perfectly," I replied, cordially returning the pressure.

I was walking leisurely towards my hotel, when I beheld a sight which almost turned my blood to water.

Striding along in his usual brisk and jaunty fashion was the great comedian himself. He was evidently going to the theatre. Fortunately the building was closed, as I had seen Mr. Simpson lock the door and walk away with the key in his pocket. But Seamouth was a small place, and the manager could soon be found. My course was plain. I must fly, and at once.

I met the waiter in the doorway. He grinned and pointed to a couple of trunks in the hall, on which was inscribed, "Mr. Charles Mathews."

"He's come, sir."

"Where is the sheriff's officer?" I inquired in as calm a tone as I could assume.

"He's gone for a walk on the beach. I have sent boots after him. The gent has not come by the coach. He came in a fly. Pretty extravagance in a man as can't pay his owings. But it's just like that class."

"Please make out my bill, waiter," said I, calmly, though I felt my heart thumping against my chest, as vulgar people say, nineteen to the dozen.

The waiter's countenance fell.

"Ain't you comfortable, sir?"

"Quite; your hotel is a perfect Elysium; but Mr. Simpson wishes me to stay with him till I leave Seamouth."

In five minutes I had paid my bill, and given the waiter a handsome douceur, and shouldering my portmanteau, was on my way to the theatre. The waiter expressed his regret that the boots was on the beach looking for the sheriff's officer, and so unable to carry my portmanteau, and he himself was unable to leave the hotel, "all the spoons being about, you see, sir."

Nothing could well be more fortunate for my purpose. As I strode away the horses were being harnessed to the departing coach, and as soon as possible I made my way to the road along which the coach must pass on its way to the town.

I did not feel safe till I had mounted the box-seat and had left Seamouth some miles behind. The coach was timed to meet the London train, and ere night fell I was once more under the parental roof.

Here I found a letter from my uncle, inclosing a cheque for a hundred pounds, and a nomination to a valuable Government appointment.

From that moment I turned over a new leaf, married Miss Walker, and forgave Nobbs (who protested his innocence as to my address). But as I considered conquerors can afford to be generous, I wrote a letter to the great comedian, explaining my conduct under very trying circumstances, and received a cordial letter of thanks in response for the very efficient rehearsal I had given the company of the Theatre Royal. The inconvenience to him from the sheriff's officer was but of brief duration, my flight having sufficiently shown which was the real Simon Pure.

I have never paid a visit to Seamouth again.

Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XVII.—HE BELIEVES IN TRANSMIGRATION AND SETS OUT TO PROVE IT.

THE Bowsers had enjoyed a quiet hour after dinner the other evening, when a dog was heard howling in front of the house, and Mrs. Bowser suggested that the animal be driven away.

"By George, but that's a curious coincidence!" exclaimed Mr. Bowser, as he got up. "It was only this afternoon that I was reading a long article on transmigration, and here a dog comes howling in front of my door."

"I don't see any curious coincidence about it," replied Mrs. Bowser. "If you had been reading a long article about Noah and his ark the dog would have come just the same. Please go out and drive him away."

"I'll do nothing of the sort. How can we tell that the soul of one of our dead friends has not passed into that dog and returned to earth again?"

"Nonsense."

"You may sneer and sneer, but there are thousands who believe in transmigration. I'm almost a believer myself. Hear that howl? There is something about it that reminds me of the voice of someone I have known. I won't do any driving away until I've had a look at the animal."

Mr. Bowser put on his hat and went out. The dog sat at the gate and was getting ready for another howl, but choked it off into a whine as the door opened. As no sticks were thrown or hard words used, he made bold to jump the fence and enter the yard. He was a long, lank, ill-used, bob-tailed dog, who had evidently broken loose from home and was prospecting round the country.

Mr. Bowser was about to utter a yell and scare the canine out of a year's growth when Mrs. Bowser spoilt it all by opening the door and demanding:

"Well, why don't you drive him away, or has he turned out to be an old friend of yours?"

Mr. Bowser snapped his fingers, and as the dog came trotting up the steps he was ushered into the hall and through to the sitting-room. The family cat was lying under a chair and seemed asleep, but it didn't take her over the thousandth part of a second to wake up and light on that intruder.

There was a mix up for a few seconds, during which Mrs. Bowser ran upstairs. Mr. Bowser got on a chair, and cat and dog rolled over each other on the floor. Then the cat flew upstairs after Mrs. Bowser, and the dog sat down and looked at Mr. Bowser and waited for further instructions.

"What on earth did you do that for!" called Mrs. Bowser from the head of the stairs.

"Because I want to make use of this dog," answered Mr. Bowser. "I'm going to give him something to eat and then study him."

It happened to be the cook's night out or there would have been a riot in the kitchen. As it was, Mr. Bowser cleared the pantry for the dog, and when there was nothing more to eat he returned to the sitting-room. Mrs. Bowser came down just then to say:

"I never heard of such a silly thing in all my life. Why don't you turn him out?"

"Let me tell you something," replied Mr. Bowser. "There's a familiar look about that dog's face. There's an expression about the mouth which awakens a memory."

Mr. Bowser got up on a chair, and the cat and dog rolled over each other on the floor.

I say, now, but just as true as you live one of the best friends I ever knew had just such an expression. Upon my word, I believe the soul of Will Baker, who died two years ago, has passed into this dog!"

"Then it had better pass out again. I'll open the door and you can drive him off."

"I'll do nothing of the kind. That expression almost clinches my belief in transmigration. Suppose it should be the soul of my dear friend come back to earth again? See him look at me. Why, woman, that dog seems to understand every word I say!"

"Well, you can talk over old times with him and I'll go up-stairs," replied Mrs. Bowser. "If he suddenly goes mad and bites you don't blame anyone but yourself."

"It's queer—mighty queer," mused Mr. Bowser after a long study of the dog's face. "That is Will Baker's mouth exactly. If he has come back to earth in the form of a dog I'll not cast him adrift. A dog can't talk, but if this is poor Will there ought to be some way of making sure of it. Doggie——"

The dog didn't wait for him to finish. He lifted his head and indulged in a long drawn howl which made things rattle.

"For heaven's sake, but what is going on down there?" shouted Mrs. Bowser.

"The dog howled. I was going to ask him if the soul of Will Baker had returned to earth in this form, when he—"

There was another howl. It was louder and longer than the other, and there was something so uncanny about it that Mr. Bowser found chills racing up and down his back.

He determined to turn the soul of Will Baker into the street forthwith, but he instantly discovered an obstruction in his path. The soul objected. That is, the dog stood firmly planted on his feet before him and not only howled again, but finished up with a menacing growl and a vigorous scratching of the carpet with all four feet.

"What is it now?" shouted Mrs. Bowser.

"The beastly cur won't let me move him. I believe he's going mad! You'd better open the front window and yell for the police."

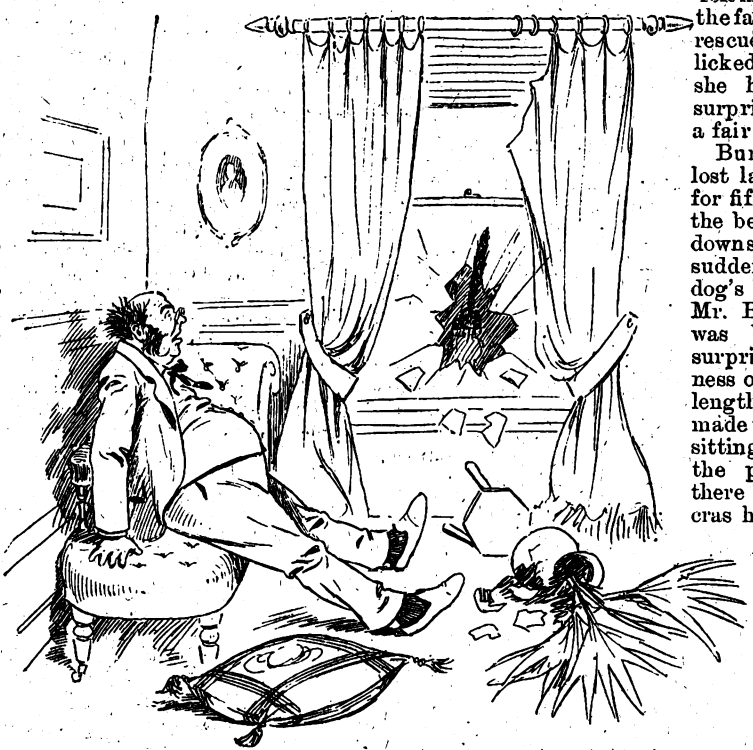
"We don't want to rouse the whole neighbourhood and have them laughing at you. If that's the soul of your dearest friend he'll go out if you ask him to. Is the expression of the mouth the same as it was?"

"It's a heap worse. Can't you slip down and open the front door?"

Mrs. Bowser said she'd try it, but she didn't. The dog decided to take a view of the second storey and made a start.

She heard him coming and had just time to reach her bedroom and shut the door when he banged against it. He tore round for a minute or two and then got down-stairs and drove Mr. Bowser on to the sofa, and stood in front of him and growled and chuckled and gurgled in a way to freeze the blood.

It was evident that the soul of Will Baker wasn't a gentle, peaceful soul. Mr. Bowser had shut his eyes and felt his helplessness when the family cat came to the rescue. She had been licked in the fight, but she had been taken by surprise and hadn't had a fair chance.



With the cat clinging to his back the dog had taken a header through the window.

Burning to recover her lost laurels, after hiding for fifteen minutes under the bed she had sneaked downstairs, and all of a sudden she landed on the dog's back. The soul of Mr. Bowser's old chum was both pained and surprised at the sharpness of her teeth and the length of her claws. He made two turns round the sitting-room, three round the parlour, and then there was a smash, a cras hand a howl.

With the cat clinging to his back and putting in forty-eight hours a day, the dog had taken a header through the parlour window and the Bowsers were saved.

"And this," said Mrs. Bowser, as she got downstairs and found Mr. Bowser pale faced and trembling and his knees bending under him—"this is transmigration, is it?"

"I thought—I thought——" he stammered, but she pointed to the broken window and interrupted:

"Yes, I know, and that's the result of it! You'd better let souls and dogs and transmigration alone and find some boards to nail over that till morning."

Mr. Bowser tried to work up a bluff and save his dignity, but it was a vain effort. There was a feeling as if a cold iron were being moved up and down his spine, and the wobble of his knees took his breath away.

The Three Receipts.

THERE were only two persons who could have stolen the Andelstone diamonds; John Record, solicitor, deceased, and Patrick Desmond, his confidential clerk, who had fled to South Africa. So common report shared the guilt between the two.

John Record's wife and children knew well enough that he, who had never done an unkind or unjust act all his life, was innocent. So they decided that I, his eldest son, should go to South Africa in pursuit of the absconding clerk.

Desmond was not a man whom we should have suspected of theft had there been any alternative. A hare-brained, hot-tempered, "home rule" Irishman, his hatred of the tyrannical Saxons in general seemed tempered by impulsive affection for many in particular.

He had appeared devoted to my father, who trusted him implicitly. When he was dying and Lady Andelstone sent for her jewels, he just whispered, "Desmond."

When the messenger came back to say that Desmond was nowhere to be found he was past speech. He died that evening; and next morning we opened the bank-safe with his key; but the diamonds were not there and Desmond never re-appeared.

A report reached us later that he was in the Transvaal, among the Boers whom everyone but our government knew to be preparing for war. My own theory was that he had sold the diamonds to assist in these preparations, rather than for his personal gain.

We scraped together some £4,000—about a fifth of the value of the jewels—and offered the amount to Lady Andelstone, but she refused to touch a penny of it. She was certain, she said, that our father was not to blame, and equally certain that Desmond, whom she disliked, was.

She was a wealthy woman, in her own right, and the value of the jewels mattered very little to her. She was willing, if need be, to pay to recover them, as they had long been treasured in her family.

"I trust you implicitly in the matter, Mr. Record, as I trusted your father," she assured me.

Her kindness made me doubly anxious to recover them and I set off without delay.

I arrived at the Cape in July, and found everyone full of the impending war. I was warned that my search in the Transvaal for Desmond would be as full of danger as difficulty. So I bought a rifle and a revolver—I could shoot a little already—and practised diligently for a week.

At the end of this time I had become a marksman, which afterwards stood me in good stead. Then I went to Pretoria, and for the next two months travelled from place to place in the Transvaal, and learnt to hate the Boers as heartily as they hated me and all my race. Possibly future historians may decide that there were faults upon both sides. I do not pretend to be an impartial judge.

It was, however, soon plain to me that the two races would never live peaceably together till the supremacy of one or the other was assured. I had not suffered the Boer arrogance for a week before I was ready to bear my part in the struggle.

Just before matters reached the crisis, a villainous half-Boer, half-Portuguese, Van Duplny by name, came to me in Johannesburg.

"You seek for news of the man Desmond," he said. "Is it so?"

"Yes," I replied.

"You will a price pay?" he asked with a leer.

"A small price," I answered cautiously, knowing the man by disrepute.

"Fifty pound, eh?"

I laughed.

"Fifty shillings! And dear at the price. Besides, how do I know that you will tell me the truth?"

He scowled.

"See!" he snarled between his teeth.

He pulled the shirt away from the back of his neck and displayed signs that the sjambok had given him his deserts at some time not far distant.

"The mark of him! You are his enemy. Would I not that you should him find!"

The fury in his bloodshot eyes was unmistakably genuine.

"I will give you ten pounds," I offered.

"I will take forty," said he.

Ultimately I gave him fifteen for somewhat indefinite information.

"When war is, that shall be," he told me, "him seek, if it fears you not, in our army by Kimberley. Shoot him like a dog!"

He would tell me nothing more.

The next day I heard of Kruger's ultimatum, and escaped, none too soon, into Natal.

Abler pens than mine have recorded the horrors of that journey. I will merely mention that we were huddled together so closely that we could scarcely breathe, and that a child, who was ailing, died during the journey.

The Boers at the halting places struck at us with whips, or fired revolvers just over our heads, when we asked for water for her. I was so exhausted myself that I had to lay up for a week at Ladysmith.

Then I got to Durban and took a steamer round to Cape Town, where I found that passenger traffic to Kimberley had stopped. So I joined the Mounted Rifles and went up with Lord Methuen's army till we were checked at Magersfontein.

During our long stay in the neighbourhood I set a Kaffir spy to work, and ascertained the whereabouts of Desmond. Incidentally I obtained information which led to fifty irregulars, including myself, being sent off on a sudden expedition one dark night.

A detachment of Boers and their mercenaries were mounting a gun upon Val Ran Kop, to strengthen their extreme left flank against attack in certain contingencies.

Our main object was to blow up the gun. My object was to capture Desmond, who, according to my informant, was among the party.

"Enemy to the North, sir."

The captain shrugged his shoulders.

"Hurry up, men."

Two artificers were working furiously at the breach of the gun in case the explosion should not damage it sufficiently. I was examining a dozen dead Boers to see if Desmond were among them.

"Enemy to the East, sir."

"Hang the enemy! Bring up the dynamite."

The men carried up the small cases and put them under the gun.

"Now lay the train," said the captain.

"Enemy to the West, sir!"

"Get to your horses, men. I'll fire it."

We ran down the slope and mounted. Our commander struck a match which went out; then another sheltered in his hands. Then he lowered it and a soft fizzing began.

"Enemy in front!" called the lieutenant.

The captain ran down the kopje with a laugh.

"Anyhow we've spoilt the gun," he said cheerily; but when he saw the force between us and our camp he looked grave. They numbered some 200. We could see them distinctly upon the moonlight plain. We ourselves were in a shadow for the moment.

"Shall we try to edge round them?" some one asked.

"No use. We should be caught between two fires. Go forward gently till the explosion. Then rush straight on. Everyone for himself. It's the only chance."

We cantered gently forward. We could not tell if we were seen, but the party came rapidly towards us. We could hear the thud, thud, thud of their galloping horses through the still night. I fidgetted with my rifle, and thought mechanically of irrelevant things, as one does at such times.

Crash!

There was an upheaval of smoke and flame in our rear. The horses broke into a gallop of their own accord except mine which reared and refused to proceed till my comrades were a couple of hundred yards ahead, fighting hand to hand with the foe. Most of them broke through with three or four Boers in pursuit of each. The rest were cut down, so I turned off to the right with three men close behind me.

Crack, crack, crack!

Three bullets whizzed by my head.

Crack, crack, crack!

Digitized by Google

Two more flew by, and a third grazed my sleeve.

I turned in my saddle and fired at the nearest horse. He fell heavily, throwing his rider over his head.

Crack, crack!

My horse had a flesh wound which merely spurred him on.

I fired again and missed. Then we came to some long grass and shrubs. My horse stumbled twice and nearly fell. I patted and coaxed him, and he gained twenty yards by a grand spurt across a small field. Then we came to rough ground.

He stumbled again and the two Boers closed upon me from either side. We leapt a hedge blazing away with our revolvers. There was a crushing pain in my left leg; an empty saddle on my right.

I fired at my remaining foeman and saw him totter in his saddle. Then our horses collided and fell; and we were hurled into the darkness side by side.

When I recovered from the shock and became used to the dim light I saw my enemy's hands groping feebly about the ground—doubtless for his revolver. Mine was still in my hand.

As I could not rise, I turned on my side and aimed at him.

"You—needn't—fire," he gasped. "I'm done for."

I hesitated.

"If I don't shoot you, you'll shoot me," I growled.

"No—I give you my word of honour."

The moon suddenly lit up his white face.

"Desmond!" I ejaculated.

He started.

"Who are you?" he asked faintly.

"The last man to whom you should talk of your honour. The son of John Record,"

"I never wronged him in my life," he said with sudden energy.

"Do you mean to say that you did not take Lady Andelstone's diamonds?" I demanded.

"Lady Andelstones diamonds! I!"

He tried to raise himself but fell back with a groan.

"Water!"

I dragged myself near enough to give him a drink from my bottle.

"Tell me what has happened."

I told him, somewhat incoherently.

The wound in my leg was paining horribly, and there was an ugly gash in my head, where I had struck the ground. I found it difficult to collect my thoughts.

When I had finished he laughed a faint laugh that was half a moan.

"So you think I took them! I! Look——"

The rest of his words were lost in a dizzy mist.

I was fainting.

When I came to, my head was on a stranger's knee, and my arms had been taken away. I was in the hands of the Boers.

They lifted me upon a stretcher, and I saw that Desmond was on another close by.

"You spared me," he said. "So they are going to take you to the English camp. Good luck!"

"The diamonds?" I cried.

"Look in your father's office desk; secret drawer; back of second from top; right hand side."

Then they carried me away.

When I reached home—I was invalided—I found that the desk had been sold; but fortunately the auctioneer was able to repurchase it, at a slight advance upon the sale price.

When it arrived we had it set down in the middle of the drawing-room and proceeded to search for the secret drawer.

After a quarter of an hour my sister Flo, who is quick-witted discovered it. The secret, like all secrets when you know them, was very simple after all.

But when the drawer came out we gave a united cry of dismay. There were no diamonds or valuables of any sort, only a heap of old papers connected with various secrets entrusted to my father.

"So the scoundrel deceived me after all," I said bitterly. "I might have known it."

"I suppose we had better destroy the papers," suggested my mother with a sigh. "We have no right, really, to read them."

I growled assent, and the rest nodded, except Flo.

"No," she exclaimed. "Not till we have seen if they say anything about the diamonds."

I took the bundle again and glanced through it. Towards the middle I spied Lady Andelstone's signature, and pulled out this receipt:

"Received, April 18th, '99, my jewels from Mr. John Record.—MARY ANDELSTONE."

We stared at one another in speechless astonishment.

"Do not judge her till you have heard her story," said my mother at last. "We have misjudged poor Desmond already."

"Unfortunately," I said, "there is no room for doubt in the present instance. She has evidently had the jewels disposed of them for some purpose of her own; and thrown the blame upon my dead father."

I sent the servant to fetch a cab, and put on my overcoat. Flo begged to be allowed to accompany me, and I reluctantly consented.

"I have an idea, Fred," she said. "No, I can't tell you; but I must come."

So I took her.

If I had not done so we should probably never have discovered the rights of the matter. For, when I showed the receipt to Lady Andelstone, she went first red, then white, and finally refused to discuss the matter.

"I acknowledge the receipt," she said; and that was all that she would tell me.

Then my sister spoke.

"Will you swear that it is your writing, Lady Andelstone?"

Her ladyship started violently.

"Have I repudiated it?"

"Here is a former receipt of yours." Flo held them side by side. "Suppose an expert compared them."

Lady Andelstone went whiter than ever.

"It is mine," she said. "or—or—written by my authority."

"By whom? Do you wish to answer in court?"

"I will not say another word," she declared in a trembling voice, "there or here."

"But suppose I could show you a way to clear our father's memory, and at the same time avert disgrace from anyone dear to you? This must have been presented by some one near to you, or the writing would have been scrutinised and the forgery detected."

Her ladyship wiped her parched lips with a dainty handkerchief.

"What do you want?" she asked hoarsely.

"A receipt for your jewels—which we have found, let us suppose in the secret drawer."

Lady Andelstone dragged herself slowly from her chair, staggered across the room, sat down at a dainty desk and wrote the receipt. She handed it to me without a word, and we rose to depart; but my sister lingered.

"I am so sorry," she said gently. "So very sorry."

Lady Andelstone threw her arms round her.

"My husband!" she sobbed. "Heaven forgive him! My husband!"

OWEN OLIVER.

"TOMMY," said a fond father to his little boy, who had received a linen-mounted book of pictures as a present, "What are you crying for?"

"Because I can't tear my picture book, papa," was the ingenuous reply.

LITTLE ETHEL: "Mamma, I wish you'd wash Willie Prettie's face."

Mamma: "The idea! He's not my little boy. I have nothing to do with him."

Little Ethel: "But I have. We's become engaged, an' I want to kiss him."

"WHAT's wrong with our new midget? He doesn't seem to draw."

Manager: "Of course not. See what a mess you've made of the advertisements. You've put his height at three feet. Make it thirty-six inches, and the people wil lcome with a rush."

"GREAT SCOTT, man! what are you doing with four alarm clocks in your room?"

"I want to try and get a little sleep."

"How can that help you?"

"My wife and baby have gone for a visit, and everything is so quiet. I can't close my eyes."

SHE: "You won't object to have my dear mamma live with us after we are married, will you?"

He (a young physician): "Not at all. In fact she'll be most welcome."

"I'm so glad you feel that way."

"Yes; you see she is always ailing, and I really need somebody to experiment on."

A YOUNG minister, unexpectedly called upon to address a Sunday-school, asked, to gain time:

"Children, what shall I speak about?"

A little girl on the front seat, who had herself committed to memory several declamations, held up her hand, and in a shrill voice inquired:

"What do you know?"

AT a bazaar superintended by some professional beauties of London a sailor lad stood in front of one of the stalls in breathless admiration. Then, taking a sixpence from his pocket, he laid it shyly upon the table and passed on.

"Won't you have something for your money?" asked the fairest of the attendants.

"I've had more than my money's worth already," answered Jack gallantly, and walked on quite satisfied.

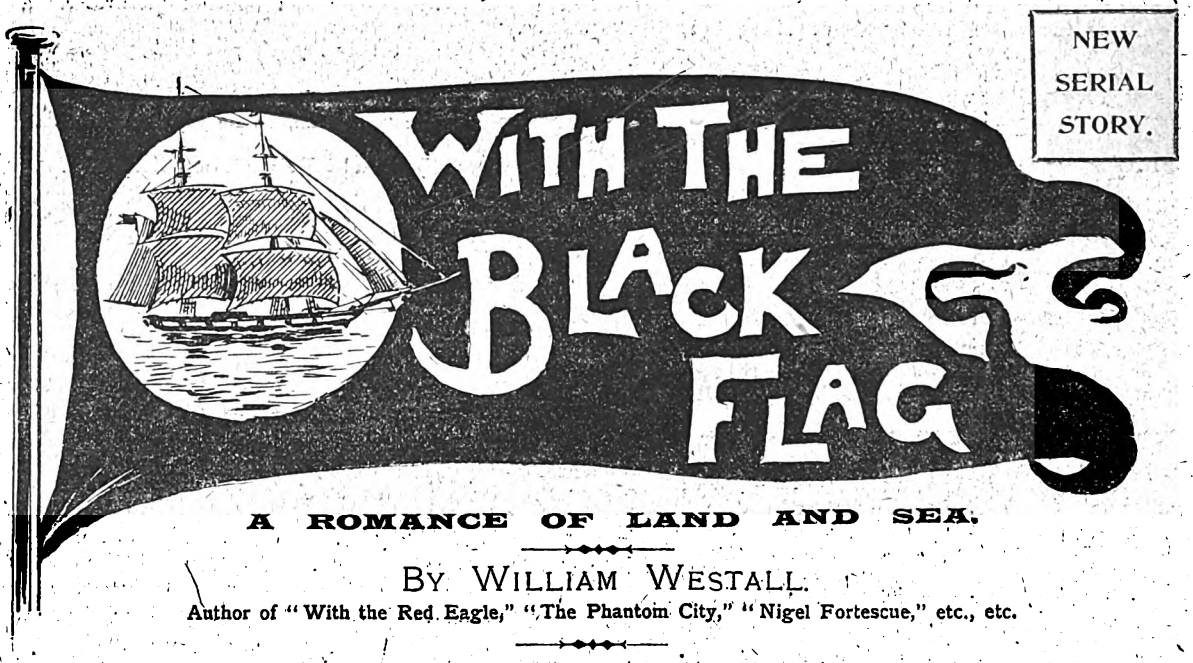
NEW SERIAL STORY.



A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

BY WILLIAM WESTALL.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

Major Wyvenhoe leaves England on the Campanella with a detachment of troops, raised by Major Barnish, to help the Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty. Major Barnish is accompanied on the vessel by his wife. At Cork a detachment of Irishmen is taken on board together with General Molyneux, who is connected with the Venezuelan Army, his secretary and chaplain. When the vessel has been out a few days Major Barnish meets with a fatal accident, and on that same day a mutiny breaks out among the troops, but it is speedily quelled. On the day of Barnish's death a sail is sighted, and the vessel proves to be the Dulcinea, a Spanish warship. The Campanella is ordered to stop so that her cargo may be examined. The captain (Cautley) objects, and while negotiations are going on, the Dulcinea is boarded by a party from the Campanella, when the guns are spiked and the vessel put out of working order. General Molyneux, who had come with the party unasked, kills a Spanish sailor, and is left with the Spaniards as a prisoner.

Shortly after this a small sailing boat is seen and stopped by the Campanella, and it is ascertained that the chief towns on the coast are still occupied by the patriots. As Captain Cautley does not know the Venezuelan coast well a pilot has to be obtained, and it is found that Conroy, one of the chief mutineers, is able to act as such, and the course of the ship is intrusted to him.

CHAPTER VI.

THE CAPTURE OF THE Santa Marta.

THE cove or lagoon, whither Conroy piloted us, fully justified his description, being so secluded and begirt with great trees that there was no sea view even from the mast-head, and, to our misery, no sea breeze, the want of which made it like a furnace by day and an oven by night. Moreover, to the discomforts of intense heat were added the onslaughts of myriads of mosquitoes and sandflies, which drove us nearly frantic. But as the brig was so moored as to command the narrow entrance to the cove (into which she had been warped), and the country covered with an impenetrable growth of underwood and prickly-pear trees, we were well protected both on the land side and the sea side, though it was not pleasant to think of what our fate might be if we were blockaded.

These prickly-pear trees are the most formidable defensive works I ever encountered. They tear the clothes off your back and bury their arrow-like points in your skin, poisoning the blood and inflicting painful wounds which heal with difficulty and sometimes mortify. Forcing a way through them is out of the question, and the few paths made by the natives are so narrow that contact with these cannibal-like thorns, which dart on their victim like birds of prey, cannot be avoided.

For the rest, Margarita is a hot and thirsty land, and for the most part, a barren land, and so dry withal, that except in and shortly after the rainy season water has to be imported, and the inhabitants live principally on fish and by fishing.

Not long before there had been a prosperous pearl fishery leased to Messrs. Rundle and Bridge, of London, but when General Morillo occupied the island, he had all the divers (who were suspected of "patriotism"), together with their wives and families, knocked on the head; so the industry perished, no others caring to run the double risk of being eaten by sharks and slaughtered by Spaniards.

Altogether, Margarita could not be described as a desirable dwelling place, the cove being perhaps the least desirable part of it, and we were all pleased when on the day after our arrival Cautley said with great emphasis, "We will clear out of this hole before this time to-morrow."

But we had first to gather more precise information as to the position of our friends and the movements of our enemies than had yet been forthcoming, for which purpose one of the ship's boats was sent out to make inquiries, in charge of Hankin, the second officer, with whom went Conroy as pilot and myself as interpreter, each wearing the national costume of Venezuela, a shirt and a pair of trousers, the former garment outside the latter, and a straw hat.

I had also to keep an eye on Conroy.

"I don't think he means either to desert or betray us," the captain had said; "but if he offers to do either, shoot him."

Conroy did not offer to do either, probably because he had nothing to gain thereby, so I was not called upon to act as executioner, greatly to my satisfaction, killing men in cold blood, even though they are miscreants, not being my métier.

It was the hottest day I had ever known; the heat of the sun, together with the heat reverberated by the rocks, made us perspire so profusely that we could only see by continually wiping our eyes, and our clothes became as wet as if they had been dipped in water.

Out at sea it was probably cooler, but as there was a possibility of falling in with a Spanish cruiser, we did not think it prudent to venture far from the coast, with which Conroy seemed quite familiar.

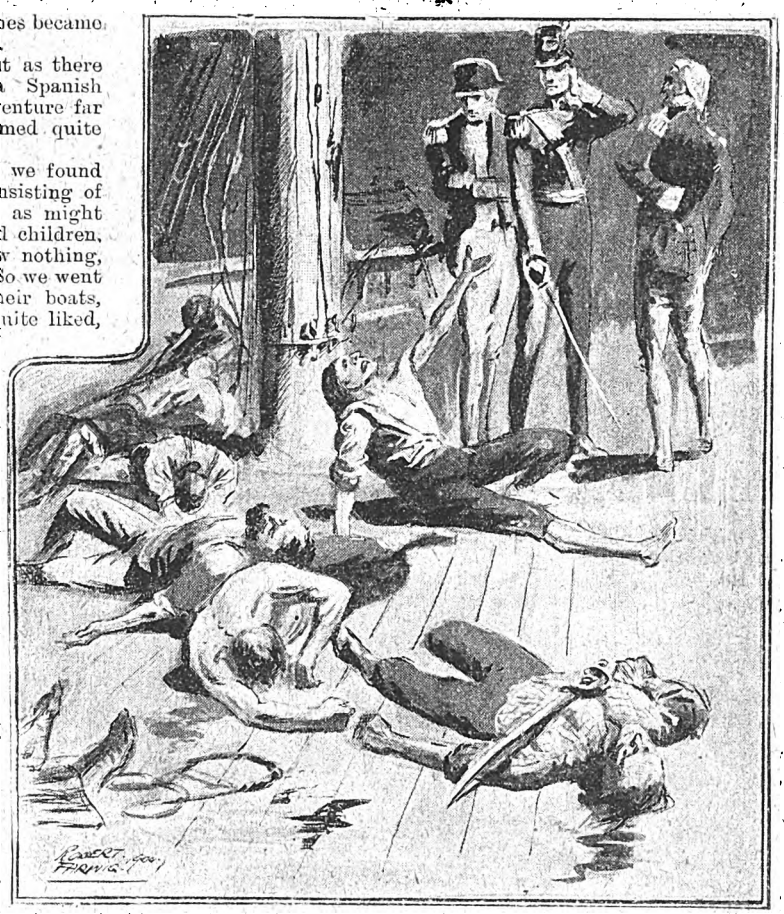
He piloted us into a small inlet where we found swarms of mosquitoes, and a hamlet, consisting of half-a-dozen roofs on stilts, inhabited, as might appear, by lanky, long-nosed pigs, naked children, and dirty, scantily-clad women, who knew nothing, and the men folk were all away fishing. So we went on, and, after awhile, found one of their boats, albeit rather further out at sea than we quite liked, though, as we presently ascertained, there was little or nothing to fear, the cruisers seldom coming so far north, and owing to the shallowness of the water thereabouts, always giving the land a wide berth.

At first the fishermen regarded us with suspicion, but on learning that we were against the Spaniards they became quite communicative and told us all they knew, which turned out to be all we wanted to know.

Pampatar had not been attacked, nor was there any sign of an impending attack.

Two Spanish sloops of war were cruising between Margarita and the Main, though now and then they would weather the north point and come round the other way. But for the most part one was so close in shore and the other in the offing, on the look-out for transports which, as was said, were bringing troops from England for service in Venezuela.

My retort confirmed Cautley in his decision to leave the cove that night or early next morning, so timing his departure as to be off Pampatar shortly before dawn.



Many of the Spaniards were killed and wounded.

"It is then we are most likely to catch the inshore sloop unprepared; and if I can get the weather gage, I shall give her a broadside, and carry her by boarding before the other can come to her help. It will be a fine chance for your fellows to show their mettle."

The remainder of the day was taken up in making ready for battle. The magazine was opened, boxes of round shot, grape, and canister were brought on deck, rammers, sponges, and canisters placed near the guns, cartridges served out, muskets cleaned, flints examined, cutlasses sharpened, and to the strain of suspense succeeded the bustle of preparation, greatly to the delight both of soldiers and sailors, who were weary of the long voyage and spoiling for a fight.

Cautley studied his charts and had several consultations with Conroy touching tides, currents, shoals, and soundings.

About midnight the Campanella was warped out of the cove and stood out to sea, edging away from Margarita northward on the starboard tack, the object being to gain a wide offing, and then "bearing up round," run to Pampatar before the wind, which in that part of the Caribbean sea generally blows from east to west. The operation was rather tedious, and as it involved frequent tacking, our progress at the beginning was rather slow. But the weather and the night favoured our design. Though there was no moon, the stars shone so brilliantly that Cautley had quite as much light as he wanted, and we were little more than an hour's sail from Pampatar when they began to pale.

Everybody was on the alert, look-out men were stationed at the masthead, in the bows, and aft, and the skipper and his mates continually swept the horizon with their night glasses.

But for a time all to no purpose, and some of us were beginning to fear there would be no fighting, which after so much preparation and high strung expectation would have been a great disappointment, when the man at the masthead sang out: "Sail ho!"

"Where away?" asked the captain.

"On the port bow."

"Can you make her out?"

"Not quite."

Then a moment afterwards:

"A single-masted ship on the starboard tack."

The stranger could presently be discerned from the quarter-deck, and, after a long look through his glass, Cautley pronounced her to be one of the Spanish sloops. Whether she had sighted us was as yet uncertain, but there could be nothing so sure as that she would do so, and our captain took measures to deceive her as to our character and intentions, for if the Spanish captain suspected we were armed and meant fighting he might wait for his consort, and we were not strong enough to tackle them both. True, we should probably be able in any event either to beat them or give them the slip, but that was not enough, Cautley had made up his mind to sail into port with a prize.

Digitized by Google

So instead of bearing boldly up to the sloop, as though he meant mischief, the skipper ordered every stitch of canvas to be spread, as though he wanted to avoid her. But as it would have defeated his object to go too fast, a heavy boom was drooped astern which checked the ship's way.

The trick succeeded. The Spaniard shook out his huge mainsail, hoisted his foresail, and altered his course so as to get between us and Pampatar, which was the very thing we wanted.

The deck had already been cleared for action, every man was at his station, and two hundred soldiers with loaded muskets were lying behind the quarters, but we were not to show our teeth until the last moment.

Meanwhile the sloop came on as if her commander either expected no resistance or counted on an easy victory. Cautley, on the other hand, contrived to keep the weather gage, and a collision being now inevitable, the boom was hauled on board, and the Campanella went ahead at a pace that evidently surprised the Spaniard, who straightway sent a shot across our bows as a gentle hint to heave to. No notice being taken, he fired another, which grazed the foremast and nearly knocked a seaman's head off.

"That is from his bow chaser, he has got a 'Long Tom,'" quoth Cautley coolly.

"He seems to be ready; anyhow, he is more prepared than you expected. All his men are at quarters," I said.

Arismendez was broad-shouldered, deep-chested, and built like an athlete.

"He is not prepared for the reception I am going to give him. Run out the guns; up with the flag!"

The Spaniards now began to fire in earnest, but owing to the relative position of the ships most of their shots went wide, though we were several times hulled, and the "Long Tom" hit us repeatedly, sending two poor fellows to their account.

Not until the Campanella had gained the position for which Cautley had been manœuvring did he give the order to fire.

Great was the havoc wrought by that one discharge. The sloop was raked fore and aft; many of the Spaniards were killed and wounded, among them the man at the wheel, and there being no one ready to take his place, she flew up into the wind, on which our captain ranged alongside and grappled, after giving them a volley of musketry at point-blank range. Then he gave the order to board, on which my men leapt on the sloop's deck, wildly cheering, and there followed the fiercest hand-to-hand fight I had ever seen. The Spaniards, driven to bay, fought a hopeless battle with the ferocity of despair, for they were outnumbered by two to one, and seeing that unless they yielded all must perish, I called to them in their own language to surrender.

"Will you spare our lives, then?" demanded an officer whose face was black with powder and streaked with blood.

"Certainly," I answered.

"On your honour?"

"On the honour of an Englishman."

He ordered his men to lay down their arms, I bade my bugler sound the recall, and the combat, which had been going on all over the deck, ceased.

The officer, who turned out to be the captain, tendered me his sword, which I refused to accept, and, after complimenting him on his courage, inquired why, when resistance had become altogether hopeless and there was no chance of saving his ship, he had not hauled down his flag.

"Because we thought that, as you were fighting under the Venezuelan ensign, you gave no quarter."

"And do the Venezuelans never give quarter?"

"Never. If you were Venezuelans—patriots they call themselves—our wounded would be thrown to the sharks, and the rest of us either hacked to pieces or hanged."

I was too polite to believe the gentleman, who, however, evidently believed what he said. But I could not. It was too horrible. His name, as he told me, was Moro—Don Tadeo Moro—that of the sloop, Santa Marta. She was in a dreadful condition. Our broadside had destroyed a great part of the bulwarks, damaged the rigging and ploughed up the deck, which was slippery with blood and strewn with mangled bodies and wounded men. The former were disposed of in the only way possible; for the latter, all was done that could be done. As the sloop's cockpit was already crowded and her surgeon overwhelmed with work, many of them were removed to the Campanella and placed under the care of our own surgeons.

We, too, had suffered, though not nearly so much as the Spaniard, and it took some time to repair our damages, and put the Santa Marta in a condition to be taken back to Pampatar.

Meanwhile the other sloop had been sighted to the sou'-west, between us and the Main.

"We were not much too soon," said Cautley as he pointed her out to me. "An hour later and we should have had to fight them both or run for it. I am not going to run now, and if she comes much nearer I'll try conclusions with her."

The second sloop did come nearer, but getting no answer to her signals, moved off and headed towards the coast.

"Do you think we can overhaul her before she gets too close to Cumana, Conroy?" asked the skipper of the pilot, who was close behind us.

"I would not advise you to try, sir. She sails fast. Cumana is not far off, and if the wind were to fall off after you had weathered Point Escarpca, you might find yourself in a fix, especially if there are gunboats in the bay, as is very likely."

Digitized by Google

The advice seemed sound. I seconded it, Cautley acted on it, and the brig and the sloop, the latter with a prize crew on board, were presently bearing up for Pampatar.

As we neared the port, three guns were fired, and Cautley, taking this for a salute (though it turned out to be an alarm signal), answered with three guns from each vessel. Then, in order to reassure the garrison and the inhabitants, who might think we were Spaniards, he ordered the Union Jack to be displayed over the stern of each vessel, and the Venezuelan flag at the head of our fore-top-gallant mast.

We had no sooner anchored than several boats came out, one of which contained two men in uniform, whom we took for officers of the port. On learning whom we were they seemed greatly pleased, and said that General Arismendez, the Governor, and General Urdenetta, his second in command, were at the Government House, and invited the captain of the Campanella and the commander of the troops to honour them with a visit, on which Cautley ordered his gig to be lowered, and we went on shore.

The two generals received us with great cordiality, and when I told them of the capture of the Santa Marta, overwhelmed us with thanks, compliments, and embraces. Arismendez put his arms round me, patted me on the back with both hands, and kissed me on both cheeks, while Urdenetta treated my companion in like fashion. Cautley made a wry face, fortunately unobserved by our hosts, whose effusive greetings would have been more agreeable if they had not smelt so excessively of garlic.

Notwithstanding the warmth of our welcome, Arismendez did not at first impress me favourably. He was about fifty years old, but looked older — broad-shouldered, deep-chested, and built like an athlete. His features were Spanish, his complexion and hair Indian, his furrowed, weather-beaten face was scarred with wounds. The general was much given to smiling, but his smiles were not pleasant; and his laugh, owing to the distortion produced by his scars, made him look absolutely appalling. Yet, as I afterwards discovered, he was one of the ablest of his country's leaders, and though, perhaps, as cruel as a man of his blood can be, honest, honourable, and straightforward, qualities very rare at that time, and even yet, in Venezuela.

Either by accident or neglect he had received no advice of our coming, and on hearing that Major Barnish had defrayed the entire cost of the expedition, of raising the troops and of the munitions of war we had brought with us, he appeared deeply touched, protesting that so much devotion to the cause of Venezuelan freedom deserved to be handsomely recompensed, that the matter should be brought before Congress, who would no doubt pass an order for the immediate payment to Mrs. Barnish of all that her husband had laid out, so soon as the finances of the Republic were in a little better condition.

Then, with one of his queer smiles, he added: "If we had any money I would take the responsibility of making Mrs. Barnish a payment on account. But we are unfortunately very poor."

As for the Campanella, she would make a valuable addition to the national navy, he should recommend her acquisition, and Mrs. Barnish might name her own price. The troops and the Campanella's ship's company were also to be handsomely rewarded for the capture of the Santa Marta, and Captain Cautley might regard his appointment to a command in the Venezuelan navy as assured.

Nothing could have been more satisfactory, though I did not quite like the general's qualifications about the finances of the Republic. On the other hand, I harboured no doubt as to his sincerity, and felt sure that he meant all that he had said. But the Castilian tongue lends itself to exaggeration, and I had not yet learnt that Spanish Creoles are given to promising, in perfect good faith, more than they are able to perform, and that almost any other Venezuelan in the general's position would have promised payment in a month or a week without any qualification whatever.

Cautley was highly elated at the turn things were taking.

"What a relief it will be for poor Mrs. Barnish," he exclaimed, and I had to be the interpreter of his warmest thanks to General Arismendez, as also General Urdenetta, whom he invited to pay a visit to the Campanella. The compliment pleased them, and the invitation was graciously accepted.

As we were about to take our leave I bethought me of the prisoners, and asked the chief how we should dispose of them.

"What prisoners?"

"The survivors of the Santa Marta's crew."

"You have not killed them all, then?"

"No. Only those of them who fell in action."

"Ah! I understand. You English don't kill your prisoners of war. Well, send them ashore and I will save you the trouble," answered Arismendez, with a laugh that made him look like an hyena.

"Pardon me, general, but that must not be," I said respectfully, but firmly. "I induced these men to surrender by promising them, on my honour, that their lives should be spared."

The general laughed again, his face worked convulsively, and I thought there was going to be an explosion, perhaps a quarrel, for I would have perished rather than permit the Spaniards to be put to death. But by a strong effort he suppressed his anger.

"Very well, they are your prisoners, not mine. Do with them what you will," he said, "only they must not land.

Towards the end of the banquet several orators were often on their legs at the same time.

So long as I am in command here I will not suffer a Spaniard to live in Margarita, and even though I were disposed to do so, I would not answer for my men."

I thanked Arismendez for conceding so much, little as it was—and, considering what manner of man he was, he deserved my thanks—though Cautley and I went away feeling a good deal less elated than we had done a few minutes previously.

"What shall we do with these wretched Spaniards? They are not safe here," I said.

"They must be off to-night in the sloop's boats; and if they won't hold them all, I will give them one of mine."

I was very glad I had not reported the mutiny to General Arismendez, and so told the skipper.

"Why?" he asked.

"He would have had all the mutineers shot, and though several of them richly deserve it, the execution of so many, besides being unjust, would have a bad effect on the other men and be a very bad beginning."

"Very. But what will you do? Mutiny is not an offence to be lightly passed over."

"The best I can in the circumstances. Dismiss Price and Bryan and about twenty more from the force and leave them to get home as best they can, merely telling Arismendez that they misbehaved so badly during the voyage, that I have lost all confidence in them, and after the lesson the others have already received, I think they will prove amenable to discipline, especially as I shall let them know what the consequences will be if they play any tricks."

"Death?"

"Yes. Unless I am greatly mistaken the general would deal as ruthlessly with mutineers as he deals with Spaniards."

On our return to the Campanella I paid the men who had returned to their duty the balance of their bounties, and informed the rank and file of the mutineers that I had decided to give them another chance, and what would happen if they misused it. The ringleaders, however, I kept under arrest, and in ignorance of the fate in store for them. This done we settled with Conroy, but gave him no thanks, for he was the worst offender of the lot, and should have been the most severely punished, yet we were letting him off scot free, and putting money in his purse.

"Cannot you keep me as pilot, Captain Cautley?" he said. "You won't find anybody who knows these seas and coasts as well as I do. I know the Orinoco, too, and could take your ship up to Angostura if you are ordered there."

"I daresay you could, but I don't want to have anything more to do with you, Conroy. You may stay on board another night, but to-morrow the troops disembark, and you must go ashore and find quarters for yourself; and mind what you are about! If I hear of your playing any hanky-panky tricks, I shall report you to the Governor. You know what that means."

"I guess I do. All the same, Captain Cautley, it would have been worth your while to give me a 'berth,'" answered Conroy with an evil smile, and then turned sullenly away.

"You have made an enemy of a revengeful man," quoth I.

"Well, you surely would not have me make a friend of the rascal, would you?"

"Not at all. Only it might have been better policy to refuse his request less curtly, and say nothing about the governor. He has been very useful and gave us good advice about chasing the other sloop."

"That is true, but the real grievance is my refusing his request for a berth; which was quite out of the question. Besides, how can he hurt us? Not by stirring up another mutiny on board for he won't be on board, and he is not such a fool as to attempt aught of the sort with your men ashore. He knows what the consequences would be. I have sent the gig for Don Tadeo; we must arrange about his departure. He is coming now," pointing to the Santa Marta.

The gig was about a hundred yards from the sloop, and following her were several boats thronged with townspeople, who had come off to see the Campanella and her prize.

"What are the beggars shouting?"

"Ahorcadle! Degalladle!" I answered, after listening a minute or two, the cries being so confused and discordant that their purport was hard to catch.

"And that means?"

"Hang him! Cut his throat!"

Digitized by Google

"By Jove! What a bloodthirsty lot they must be! Women, too!"

"Yes, their shouts are the loudest; at any rate, the shrillest."

"The Spaniards must be sent off at once, anyhow, as soon as possible, or we shall have further trouble. In the night would be best, don't you think, when these furies are abed?"

"In the night, by all means. Were they to start by day, they would stand a good chance of being pursued and massacred."

The gig presently drew under our lee quarter, followed by the Margaritanos, who were still clamouring, though a little less vociferously, for Don Tadeo's blood, who sat in the stern sheets as impassive as a bronze statue, which he rather resembled, his features being massive and clearly cut, and his naturally dark skin tanned to the colour of mahogany.

Without casting a glance behind him, he mounted the ship's side, and on reaching the deck greeted us with the high-bred courtesy of a Spanish hidalgo.

I told him briefly—for we knew not how soon the governor might come on board—that as General Arismendez would neither let them and his people disembark nor protect them, we had decided to let them go away in their own boats, and having regard to the temper of the townspeople, we thought they had better leave after nightfall, and recommended Don Tadeo to take measures accordingly.

"You are very kind, señores, and I am very grateful," he said in his stately way. "I knew that the promise you made would be faithfully kept. But in releasing us you are doing more than you promised, and if it should ever be in my power I shall do as much, or more, for you. You see, señor, I was quite right in saying that the Venezuelans kill their prisoners."

"It seems so, but pray tell me whether, when they fall into your hands, you treat them any better?"

A look of lofty disdain and intense scorn swept over Don Tadeo's face.

"I am sure, señor," he said, "you do not mean to suggest that there can be any comparison between pestilent low-bred rebels and loyal subjects of his majesty the King. If you did, and I were not a prisoner——"

"But you are a prisoner, and we have no time for argument or differences," I interrupted, "we are expecting the governor, and it might be unpleasant for us all if he were to find you here. Is there room in your boats for all your people, including the wounded?"

"I think so, we are fewer than we were yesterday, and if we leave at midnight we ought to reach Fort Arraya soon after sunrise."

"As to that you will have to use your own discretion. The officer in command of the prize will be told to place the boats at your disposal, and that you are free to go whenever you think fit."

"It is all I could expect and more than I dared to hope, and now, señores, I will wish you farewell and return to my ship—I beg your pardon—the ship that was mine."

Then we all saluted, and Don Tadeo went over the side and was rowed back to the Sante Marta.

"My ship! Rather good that, wasn't it?" said Cautley, laughing; "he got out of it very well, though. Why did not you put in 'and never will be again.' If I knew Spanish well enough I would have done."

"For three reasons. I did not think of it, it would not have been polite, and he is very touchy."

"I should think he is touchy. How he flew up when you asked whether the Spaniards don't measure out to the Venezuelans the same measure as the Venezuelans mete out to them? I begin to see how the land lies, the Venezuelans having been treated like dogs, are retaliating like fiends."

Soon afterwards came the generals with their respective staffs, all in gala uniform, and very grand. I rather feared that my refusal to let General Arismendez massacre the Spanish prisoners might have set him against me, but so far from showing coldness or displeasure, he was, if possible, more affable than before. I introduced him to Mrs. Barnish, to whom he said many handsome things about her late husband, laid himself (metaphorically) at her feet, and assured her that all he possessed was at her disposal.

The poor woman, as I could see, was rather frightened, especially when the governor smiled, which was often, but she bore up very well and made a touching little speech in reply, which I had the honour of interpreting, and when he asked her to make his house her home, and mentioned that Senora Arismendez would pay her a visit later in the day, she brightened up wonderfully, and the skipper whispered to me that he had never seen Mrs. Barnish look so handsome.

The governor next invited us—Cautley, myself, and all our officers, to a banquet which he proposed to give in our honour in the evening. I said something, as also did the skipper, about not liking to leave the ships and troops to the under officers, but Arismendez brushed this objection aside and we were fain to accept the invitation as it was given.

Father Bartrum was also introduced at his own request, and the General was agreeably surprised to find that we had a Catholic chaplain.

"Caramba! Some of you are Christians, then! I thought you were all ereticos," he exclaimed pleasantly.

His reverence accompanied us to the banquet, and, I am sorry to say, got very tipsy, like a good many others, for there was no stint either of food or drink, and the vin du pays, especially some fine old white Carupano rum, was very potent. The guests were numerous, and many toasts were drunk and many speeches made. Indeed, towards the end of the banquet several orators were often on their legs at the same time. It lasted till past midnight, and had a dramatic and picturesque termination. Two gentlemen mounted the table, and after a few wildly incoherent observations, tried to rush into each other's arms, but missing their aim, fell on the floor with a mighty crash.

On this Cautley and I thought we had better be going, and took our leave of General Arismendez, who, though he had drunk deep, had not lost his senses.

When we had got all our men together, a matter of some difficulty, we went down to the jetty where our boat was waiting.

"Go first to the sloop to put Mr. Benn aboard (the third officer in charge of the prize), then to the Campanella," said the skipper to the coxswain, to which the coxswain answered, "Ay, ay, sir."

"I see no lights on the sloop, Mr. Benn. How is that?" he demanded, sharply, when we had been a few minutes under way.

"I am sure I don't know, sir. I saw the lanterns lighted before I left her," replied Benn.

"They must have gone out, then. Very queer, though, the wind has not been high, and even if it had—Make way, men!"

The Santa Marta was anchored a cable's length north of the Campanella, whose lights were quite visible, and in a line with her. Thither the boat was steered, and speedily arrived; but, barring a few small hookeys, nothing could be seen nor, though we rowed round and round, to and fro, halloing till we were hoarse, did there come any answering hail.

The sloop was gone.

The War Responsible.

PILEITON, the plumber, had executed some repairs for Mrs. Softcash, and presented his bill for same. Recollections of previous bills promptly paid by Mrs. Softcash without dispute had encouraged Pileiton to exert his great talents in this branch of the profession to the utmost, and the bill in question was a masterpiece. He surpassed himself, and Mrs. Softcash awoke at last to a faint suspicion that she was being overcharged.

"But, Pileiton," she remarked, "this seems a heavy charge for such small repairs."

Pileiton, prevaricating plumber, was prepared.

"All on 'count o' the war, mum," he replied.

"The war? How does it affect plumbing?"

"Lead orful scarce, mum. War Orfice buys it orl up for bullets, mum, so its riz appallin', mum!"

Bowser Again.

BOWSER, on returning home the other afternoon, found a strange man in the kitchen smoking his pipe and chatting to the cook.

"Who is this gent'eman?" inquired Bowser suspiciously.

"I'm the plumber, sir," replied the workman; "got a little job with the pump, sir."

Bowser turned pale. "Oh, dear!" he groaned, "is it so bad as that? I was hoping you were merely the broker's man." And he staggered gloomily away.

Served Her Right.

AN amusing story is told of a plumber and a widow. The latter had suddenly lost her husband, who had died intestate, and the widow, being desirous of securing the whole of his estate, persuaded a plumber—a neighbour—to take the place of her sick husband in bed while a lawyer attended to take down his will.

The plumber was quite willing, and, when the lawyer arrived, in a feeble voice bequeathed half the estate to the widow.

"What shall be done with the remainder?" asked the lawyer.

"The remainder," said he, "I give to the poor old plumber across the street, who has always been a good neighbour and a deserving man," thus securing a rich bequest to himself.

The widow was thunderstruck with the man's cunning, but did not care to expose the fraud.

Turning the Tables.

A CERTAIN gentleman was very fond of laying traps for workmen who might happen to be working in or about his house by leaving money or some valuable article about.

A plumber, well aware of this fact, found a half-crown lying on the floor of one of the rooms.

He smiled as he said to himself:

"I know what that's for," and, taking a brace and a bit from his bag, he drilled a hole in the coin, and, putting a large screw-nail through it, he fastened it securely to the floor.

The gentleman has not set any traps since. L. H.

A Smart Retort.

A BOY was holding a lighted candle for his master, a plumber, who was engaged upon some repairs on a water-pipe in a dwelling-house the other day.

The boy, being rather careless, put the candle too near his master's head, and up went the latter's hair in a blaze.

The master turned round in a rage, and after inflicting punishment upon his apprentice, said:

"You stupid idiot, can ye no watch whit ye're daein', the fowk o' the house'll think we have been singeing a sheep's heid by the smell we're setting up."

"Aweel," replied the boy, sulkily, "they'll mebbe no be far wrang." L. S. B.

The Reason He Was Quiet.

A LOCAL plumber was called to execute some repairs in the kitchen of a large deaf and dumb institution recently, and after instructing the man as to the nature of the repairs, the superintendent left him to do the job.

Without a moment's loss of time, the craftsman set to work with a will, much regretting, of course, that the attractive feminine staff and everybody around him could not be talked to.

As evening and the knocking-off hour came on, the repairs having been made, the workman, shouldering his bag of tools, was turning to leave, when a bonnie, bright-eyed domestic laughingly remarked:

"Well, you're the quietest plumber we've ever had here!"

"Good heavens!" gasped he, almost dropping his tools, "why, I thought you were all deaf and dumb."

And as the poor fellow dejectedly departed, he was overheard to mournfully murmur: "Oh! it is too cruel—a whole day wasted!" W. J. B.

A Plumber Who Hurried Himself.

MARK TWAIN gave recently a lecture to young people on "Economy of Time," and in the lecture gave the following sad incident about an "industrious" plumber:

"I once knew a plumber," said the American celebrity, "who, incredible as it may appear, finished some work he had to do for me in a great hurry. This plumber was mending a tap which protruded from the roof of my five-storeyed house, and, to speak perfectly candidly, I never knew a man finish his work so speedily. Yes, my young friends, he finished his work speedily, if not hurriedly.

"He fell off the roof."

A True Tale About "W. G."

Two plumbers were working outside the Pavilion, in the Aigburth Cricket Ground, Liverpool, during a match between Gloucestershire and Lancashire.

W. G. Grace came in to bat and hit his first three balls to the boundary.

One of the plumbers was surprised at his not running, and after the third stroke, exclaimed:

"I say, Jimmy, how many trials is that big bloke going to have?"

Honest Plumbers.

THE day was young. Two men, each carrying a bag of tools, came slowly up to the corner of a street and there paused. A tram had just passed the corner, and was about twenty feet away.

"There's our tram," remarked one calmly.

"No matter," replied his companion; "we'd have to hurry to catch it. There'll be another in an hour."

And they seated themselves in a doorway and lit their pipes. They were plumbers!

The Plumber in Danger.

A PLUMBER and his assistant went one day to repair a lead cistern at a large house in Bedford Place.

After letting all the water out of the cistern the plumber got into it to mend it. As the cistern was about six feet deep, and with only a small door at the top, he had rather a difficult task to get down to the bottom, and was compelled to use a pair of steps for the purpose.

When the plumber had found the leakage and mended it he told his ass stant to go and turn the water on, while he got himself and the tools out.

The assistant, forgetting that his master would require the steps for the purpose of getting out, took them down to the cellar so as to be able to reach the stop-cock. After doing this the cook asked him to have some lunch, which he did and then went upstairs expecting to find his master ready to go home.

Instead of this, the assistant found the plumber calling out for all he was worth from the cistern, and then he suddenly remembered that it was quite impossible to get out of the cistern without the steps, and his master would no doubt have been in danger of drowning had he arrived much later. As it was the water was well up to his waist.

R. C. P.

If!

HE was anxious to get into his new house at once, and he said to the foreman plumber:

"When will you be finished with your work?"

The canny foreman truthfully replied:

"Weel, ye see it a' depends. The maister's awa' lookin' aifter anither job. If he gets it we'll be finished the nicht, but if he disna we'll no' be finished till the end o' next week."

J. S. A.

Tit for Tat.

A PLUMBER was once sent to a gentleman's house to make some repairs.

Whilst at work, the lady of the house, a sour and elderly person, entered, and noticing some of her silver plate lying about, sent for the butler, bade him lock it up, as, she said, "she did not know who was who."

The plumber heard the remark, and, calling to his apprentice, he said loudly:

"Take home my watch and chain, Jimmy, there seems to be shady people about this house."

A Soft Fall.

A PLUMBER, repairing the roof of a grocer's establishment in Glasgow, fell through the skylight and alighted in a large tub of butter, in which he was thoroughly immersed.

The fall being thus broken, he scrambled out of his soft bed safe and sound.

The grocer's wife, who had fainted with fright, on coming to, exclaimed:

"Come here, ma man, dinna run off till I scrape ye. There a pun or twa o' ma best butter sticking on to yer boots."

Paid by Time.

LAST winter the roof of a gentleman's house was so damaged by the snow and frost that he was obliged to send for the plumbers to repair it.

Two men and a boy came and set to work.

With such a force employed it was expected that the job would be completed in a day.

But three days passed, and still the two men and the boy kept making their appearance every morning. And yet they seemed to work hard, too; for the noise of hammering on the roof resounded through the house from morn till night.

At last the owner of the house determined to see for himself how things were proceeding. Accordingly he crept up through the skylight.

A strange sight met his eyes. The two men were comfortably settled behind the chimney stack smoking and playing cards, while one of them called out to the boy, who had a hammer in each hand:

"If you don't make more row than that, you young beggar, they'll think we're doing no work."

Mascheretti's Menagerie.

CLAUDE RAYNOR was the son of a rich Baronet in Yorkshire. He was not a man of great ability, but he was remarkable for his extreme tenacity of purpose. He called it his indomitable perseverance. His friends and family called it wilful obstinacy. He had set his heart on taking high honours at Oxford; but when he had secured his "Double First," his health gave way.

When he recovered from a serious illness, his family could not be persuaded that he needed rest and quiet; they said that what he wanted was change. So they sent him, with plenty of money in his pocket, to amuse himself in Continental capitals. But the mental evil was far greater than they suspected. Overwork had made him a monomaniac, and the form his monomania took was a passion for natural history.

One night, in Paris, when he had been strolling alone under the flaunting gaslight along the Boulevards, watching the men and women who crowded the broad pavement, sat on chairs before the cafés, or poured out of the theatres, his eye was attracted by a placard, which announced to the public, in large letters, that within might be seen the Javanese Menagerie, among whose wonders were six noble lions.

The largest lion, it said, would play at blind-man's-buff with Signor Mascheretti, "the same," added the advertisement, "who had had the honour to be severely wounded by a Royal Bengal tiger in the presence of Her Britannic Majesty."

"Poor animals! Poor imprisoned beasts!" exclaimed Raynor, talking to himself, for he had no one else to talk to. "Poor unhappy animals!—dragging out existence behind iron bars. What would I not give to restore you to freedom! You are victims of the race of man—a race to which happily I feel myself to belong no longer. I am conscious of a process of evolution into a higher state. How can any creature who partakes of the divine intelligence imagine that the flaunting, pleasure-seeking, vicious, loitering crowd of human beings that I see upon the boulevards are your superiors? I am sick of the pretentions of mankind!"

The next morning he drove to the Menagerie Mascheretti, on the Boulevard Saint Martin.

The Menagerie occupied a former carriage factory. The public entrance was from the Boulevard, but a private entrance through a long, dark passage led also to the interior. This passage had an iron door at each end; the kind the French call grilles.

One of these opened on a tiny courtyard, leading to a back street; the other opened into the great hall, where were the cages of the wild beasts, and also a little chamber, occupied by Signor Mascheretti, who, being exceedingly attached to his animals, was unwilling to trust them by night to the care, or carelessness, of his subordinates.

By day he was usually to be found at a café on the Boulevard, opposite to the Menagerie, and there Raynor was directed to seek him.

After introducing himself briefly to the "artist," he said, abruptly:

"I want to buy your Menagerie."

"My Menagerie is not for sale," was the answer.

"Oh! but," replied Raynor, "money can buy anything. I have come here to purchase your Menagerie."

And, in the end, though Mascheretti was most unwilling to part with his animals, Raynor became the purchaser.

It was stipulated that Mascheretti was to give one more performance, during which he would take leave of the public.

On the day after that he was to pay off all his helpers and performers, and take a tender farewell of his animals.

"I will leave you my second in command," he said. "He understands all about the beasts as well as I do."

"I don't want him," replied Raynor. "Pack him off with the rest. I have people enough to do all I shall require."

Then Mascheretti took the new purchaser to see his beasts.

When they reached the iron gate of the private passage, he took several keys from his pocket.

"To-morrow I will give you these keys," he said. "Now let me show you my animals—yours, I mean," and he gave a deep sigh.

As they entered the passage, Raynor perceived an immense dog-kennel just inside the iron gate that opened into the Menagerie. It contained an enormous mastiff, who, though fastened by a chain, sprang furiously forward with bristling back and flashing eyes.

His master quieted him by a glance, but not before he had excited the admiration of Raynor, who instantly asked if he had purchased him, too.

"Yes," answered the Signor, "but on condition that you will pay five hundred francs to my employees, to make up to them for losing their places without warning."

"All right," said the Englishman. "Good dog!" he added, addressing the mastiff. "What a noble animal!"

They entered the hall, at one end of which were the cages of the wild beasts. At Mascheretti's appearance there arose a chorus of roars, howls, jabberings, and other noises.

"Here is my famous Bengal tiger," said the showman. "He came near ruining my shoulder for life, but he made my fortune. We were performing to miserably small audiences in London, but the day after the accident our Menagerie became the rage. Here is Queen Mab, my pet panther. I would not like to let everyone know it, but she has eaten her man. The jaguars have done worse. They attacked and seriously injured one of my elephants. Toby, there, is a splendid lion. He tore three Arabs in pieces when he was very young. That white bear, Nimrod, is a splendid fellow. He was captured with great difficulty in the Polar Seas after he had disposed of a canoe and some Esquimaux. His mate is less distinguished. She eats only her cubs. And there, too, you see all the rest, hyenas, tiger-cats, birds, leopards, monkeys.

"It makes me sad to think that I have sold them. Yes! my poor fellows!" he went on, with a Southern effusion that rather astonished Raynor, "your master has sold you! He has exchanged you for a handful of English gold! But one thing I promise you. I will never fill your places. I will own no other wild beasts. I will set up no other Menagerie. My career as an artist is ended. To-night will be my last performance.

"After that we will share no more triumphs; never again shall we enjoy the pleasure of terrifying an audience. To-morrow you will be nothing but caged beasts and I shall be a man out of employment, like any ordinary mortal."

"Yes! To-morrow," thought Raynor, "about midnight, I will have you snorting in some restaurant or café, with liquor in your head, and bank notes in your pocket, while I creep softly into this great hall and let out all your former pets upon the crowded Boulevard."

As he spoke, there passed through his disordered brain a vision of what would happen when he did so. He saw the first uncertain steps of the freed animals; then their wild bounds, their rising fury, their excitement, their ferocity. He saw the terror of the crowd upon the Boulevard; their panic; their fright; the selfish, sauve qui peut of the many, the heroic self-sacrifice of the few.

He saw Paris become suddenly a wild beasts' hunting-ground. He heard shrieks, volleys of musketry, the ringing of alarm bells, the roar of the infuriated beasts, the general consternation. He thrilled with pleasure at the thought that all this would be his doing.

The next morning he paid Mascheretti, who was half tipsy by mid-day. Two hours later he was more tipsy, though he did not seem so. He was accustomed to command himself. His business required self-possession But the liquor he had imbibed made him break forth in a maudlin lament for his lost Menagerie.

"How sad it will be," he said, "to have nothing to do but to amuse myself!"

And he walked down at four o'clock to the quarters of Javanese Menagerie to see if the Englishman was having his pets properly fed.

He found that every animal had had as much as it could eat; all were stuffed to repletion, all had a bewildered, sleepy look, except the mastiff. He had declined to eat what had been set before him. He was grieving for his master.

"They will sleep soundly till midnight," thought Raynor. "They will not wake until I shall have warily and noiselessly opened their cage-doors, and shall have taken my place on a balcony I have hired in a house opposite. I shall see them when they wake and walk forth at liberty. Oh, what fun!"

He had mixed a strong anodyne in the food that he had given them, and felt sure that they would sleep for several hours.

"And now," he thought, "I must make sure of the Signor."

He therefore invited him to dine with him, meaning to leave him dead drunk under the table.

Sure enough, late in the evening, after a luxurious dinner at a fashionable restaurant, where claret and champagne had flowed freely, Signor Mascheretti sat in his chair fast asleep. The Englishman called a waiter, and, giving him a handsome fee, desired him not on any account to wake the gentleman. After that he went away. The moment for his enterprise had come. His heart beat with impatience and satisfaction.

It was eleven o'clock. The Boulevards were brilliant with gaslight. From the Madeleine to the Porte Saint Martin all was splendour and gaiety. Horses champed at the bits and shook their harness. Carriages rolled over the stones. People came pouring out of the theatres and dancing-halls. It was a lovely night. All Paris was abroad, and what part of it was so brilliant and so crowded as the Boulevards?

The Englishman crept furtively through the crowds. No one noticed him. At last he reached the back entrance to the Menagerie, where only one gaslight shone in the darkness. The back entrance opened on a little courtyard.

He went on into this place and stood before the iron grille. He put the key in the lock. He turned it carefully. The door opened. He passed through, and closed it after him, putting the key in his pocket. This was a precaution lest he should be surprised by Mascheretti.

He went on towards the inner door. He saw the fierce eyes of the mastiff gleaming at him through the bars, and heard the rattle of his chain.

He unlocked the second door, and entered the Menagerie. The animals seemed to be waking up.

When they heard him approach, they began to make various noises. He had a candle in his pocket. He lighted it and looked into their cages.

None of them were fully roused, but all seemed to be on the point of waking. There was no time to be lost.

Very softly he opened the door of the tiger's cage, then that of the lions, one after the other, until at last all were emancipated.

"All right, so far. Now in half-an-hour I shall see all Paris in an uproar. What fun! What fun!"

Having opened all the cages, he left the iron door open that led from the Menagerie to the long passage, and proceeded down that passage to the outside entrance, the door which he had locked so carefully.

"The jaguars will come out first," he thought. "They seem more fully awake than the others; then the two white bears; then the lions; all will be ready for a midnight banquet. By that time the alarm will have been given. There will be racing and chasing in all directions. Men will shout and women will scream. I defy any man on earth to go in that hall and shut the cages after the beasts begin to swarm down this passage."

And he kept on saying at intervals to himself:

"Oh, what fun!"

"When I set the outer gate open," he reflected, "I will fasten it back so that there will be no chance of its shutting to. There is too much gaslight," he added.

"It may dazzle their eyes as they come out, and it may drive them back again."

So saying, he tried to turn off the gas with his cane; but the cane was too slender. He remembered to have seen an iron rod standing behind the door. With this he put out the gas.

"And now," said he, "for the outside door. When that is open, my part will be played, and then will begin the fun!"

At that moment he was nearly knocked down by a swift blow upon his back. The mastiff was upon him. He had broken his chain! The Englishman had only time to spring aside, and to strike frantically about him with his bar of iron. He darted forward to open the iron gate, now within three feet of him. The jaws of the mastiff had not wounded him. In the darkness, the dog had only secured a mouthful of his clothing.

But, horror! Part of that mouthful was his pocket. In that pocket was the key of the outside gate and his pocket-pistol!

With the rapidity of lightning he saw the hopelessness of his situation. On one side was the gate, which he could not open; on the other, was the mastiff, a wild beast in himself, and his only weapon in the dark was his bar of iron! It seemed to keep the dog in check, but what would it do against all the wild beasts in the Menagerie?

Raynor was strong and active; but do what he would, he could not burst the bars of the iron door, nor break the lock. He dared not try to climb over the high gate. Such an attempt would force him to lay down his iron bar, and to expose himself in the rear to the attack of his enemy. He dared not cry aloud for help. A cry might bring upon him all the wild animals.

A cold sweat broke out all over him.

"And this dreadful dog is mine," he thought. "I paid five hundred francs for him. I am his master. I don't even know his name. Hi! Hector, Lion, Cæsar, Bull, Fox, Sport, Tray, Dash!—what is the use? He has some French or some Italian name that, of course, I never heard of. To think of his having broken his chain. So much for French hardware. And there's the Signor asleep with his head on the table in the restaurant, while I——"

Here he was interrupted by low growls from the Menagerie. Momentarily they increased in violence. The dog seemed to turn his attention that way.

The Englishman profited by this to make a last supreme effort. He flung himself against the iron door with all his might, he tried to force the lock with his iron bar—when suddenly the door was thrown wide open. He fell through it on his face, and fainted away.

It was Signor Mascheretti who opened the door.

He had retained a pass-key, and had come down to the Menagerie at midnight to look upon his beloved animals once more.

"I should like to know," said he to Raynor, when he stood by him in the little courtyard, as he came to his senses, "what all this is about? I find my dog with a broken chain and all the cages open. While you came to yourself I have been in and fastened them. My good sir, the police will be apt to look into this matter. You little understand how to care for your Menagerie."

"Mine?" cried the Englishman. "It is yours. I give it all back to you. Keep it—the dog and all! But never say a word of this, for your life!—never a word!"

Signor Mascheretti kept the secret; and how I came to hear about it you will never know E. W. L.

NIPPED IN THE BUD.

A RAILWAY ROMANCE.

I WONDER how it happens that I was always so ready to fall in love? For one thing my parents made a runaway match of it, after only once meeting, and that at a ball. Then again my father died soon after my appearance, and my mother consoled herself with the circulating library.

My earlier efforts at falling in love hardly met with the success I had been led to expect from the story-books; in fact I was hardly ever able to speak to the charmer. None of those happy occasions for rescuing her from unforeseen peril, or even for picking up her handkerchief happened, leading me to doubt that special Providence, so largely drawn on by my chosen romancers. But I hoped against hope.

My twenty-first birthday put me in possession of a comfortable independence, of which I took advantage, by leaving home and living in lodgings.

One fine Saturday morning I was strolling up and down Paddington Station having resolved to spend the week-end snaring the wily roach from a punt, on which boat, in my opinion, builders have never improved. In what other craft, I ask, can you have a comfortable chair?

I had a few minutes to wait, and was wandering aimlessly about, when I turned and came face to face with the most beautiful creature I ever saw, that is, till I met the present Mrs. Smith. She was tall and fair, quite divinely so, as some one remarks.

With her was an old gentleman, her father obviously. One quiet glance of her eyes finished me completely; if grovelling on the ground could have won her, I would have grovelled; perhaps I could display my valour and knock somebody down—a porter, say, or the old gentleman. On second thoughts, it seemed injudicious to do either. The old gentleman was her father, and the porter—well, he was as big as I was.

Something, however, must be done. At last they took their seats in the train I was going by. Happy thought, I would see where they got out, and track them home.

"John," I said to myself, "you are a man of sound common sense, the idea is worthy of you."

As I was mentally congratulating myself, their compartment filled up, and I had to content myself with the next. However, I secured a corner on the up-side, and so insured my seeing them as they left the train.

As we steamed out of the station I leant back and gave myself up to meditation. The first-class carriages on the G.W.R. are very comfortable, the sunshine was delightful, and my cigar was super-excellent.

Brighter and brighter grew the castles in the air, the wedding-day was fast approaching, when I was rudely awakened. "Tickets please." There was a porter standing over me, and fumbling hastily for my ticket, I asked him where we had got to.

"Reading," was the answer, so I paid the excess on my ticket and dashed out of the carriage.

My worst fears were realised; they had left the train, but where? The guard could give me no information. There was nothing for it but to curse my stars and get back as fast as I could.

This, I found, could not be for an hour, so I wandered into Reading, fuming. The place had no attractions for me, even the thought of biscuits was without charm. On my way back to the station I was startled by a huge slap on the back. It was the last straw, my temper could hold out no longer. I turned round, prepared to curse bitterly, and found my assailant to be none other than my dear old friend Brown.

Brown and I, while at school, had been the closest of chums, and when he went on to Oxford, we had always continued our friendship by meeting in the vacs.

Latterly, our correspondence had flagged; excepting his ordination, I knew nothing of him since he left Oxford, now four years ago. It turned out he was going by the same train as myself.

So as soon as we were off, we at once entered into details of what had happened since our last meeting. He, it appeared, was just married, and had a good living near Slough, which had come to him through the influence of his father-in-law.

"You used to beat me hollow," he said, "at falling in love, hence I am much surprised that I am the first to turn married man. What is your latest adventure in the falling-in-love line?"

In the fulness of my heart I there and then told him all that weary afternoon's exploits, with many raptures about her divine beauty.

He laughed consumedly, far more I thought than the humour of the story merited. Finally he apologised, and, still gasping, explained that he knew the young lady perfectly well from my description—in fact, would be glad to introduce me any time.

The train then stopped at Slough, where Brown was to get out, but before he did so, I had overwhelmed him with thanks, and accepted an invitation to come and dine on Tuesday, there to meet my charmer.

I fear I did some mad things in that empty compartment, and what old Joe, my fisherman, thought of me the next day, I can only dimly conjecture. Coming down from one of my loftiest air castles, I happened to remark that I didn't seem to be catching much.

"No," he replied, "we arn't a-catching much. You sez you's a-fishing for roach, but if any gentleman was to arsk me, why, I should say as how you was fishing for perch. Lor bless me, there he goes again."

Though aware of this (from Joe) withering sarcasm, I am afraid I did not improve much, my day-dreams were far too sweet.

Fishing is the best method of doing nothing, and enjoying it, I am acquainted with; that is, real fishing, from a punt or from the bank in a quiet place; none of your break-neck scrambling after salmon or trout. But let me hasten to the end.

In this way I managed to pass the Sunday and Monday. On Tuesday I hastened to town, selected my most approved suit, and made a most careful toilet. At six that evening I was ringing the bell of the parsonage near Slough.

I was shown into a room, the servant telling me that Mr. Brown would be down in a moment. As I entered, she muttered something, lost to me, for there was the beauty standing by the fire. As I advanced, I heard Brown's step behind me.

"Here you are, old man," he exclaimed; "let me introduce you—Mr. Smith—my wife."

THE LEGEND OF THE FORGET-ME-NOT.

ONCE upon a time, as the story-tellers say, there stood on the borders of Northumberland a great castle. Its grim towers, built as they were upon a rocky eminence, commanded the country side for miles around. About the base of the fortalice the deep waters of an unusually wide moat lapped and rippled under the strong breeze, which swept down upon it from the Cheviots.

Sakers and culverins pointed threateningly from its grey battlements. From its topmost turrets and weather-stained walls, armed sentinels kept watch and ward—arquebus, or long bow in hand—for at the period of which we write, the latter weapon was still in use—turning their fierce eyes towards the Scottish borders, the debatable land, which lay almost at their feet.

Bitter experience of burnt hamlets—harried fields—the fruits of northern forays—should have taught them vigilance; but the most watchful sentinel is liable to sleep at his post, the most experienced warrior to be caught some day, off his guard.

At the moment that our story opens, the garrison of the fortalice we are describing, was suffering for such indiscretion.

In the darkness of the preceding night, a band of their most hated enemies—the wild tribesmen of Douglasdale—had stolen down upon them, out of the border mists, and when the morning broke, the only traces of their visit had been a column of smoke rising from their herdsmen's cottages, and a view of empty pasture lands, which, the previous evening, had been dotted with a herd of their fattest beeves.

As a result of this predatory visit, the courtyard of the castle—one of the dependencies of the Northumbrian Piercys—resounded with the clash of armour, the stamp, stamp of iron hoofs, the jingle of spurred heels, and the hoarse voices of command.

An expedition, hastily assembled, was on the point of setting forth in pursuit of the marauders. Armed to the teeth with sword and spear, arquebus and long bow—the soldiers in jackets of stout bulls' hide and leathern caps, protected with bands of iron—the young knight, the second in command, in complete armour of glittering steel—they issued, one by one, from the armoury, and each taking his place at his horse's head, silently waited the command to mount.

But the minutes passed and the order came not. The young officer ever and anon glanced at the dial, noting with evident impatience the shadow, which marked the hour, gradually stealing towards noon.

"Where is Sir Guy? Has any among ye seen aught of our leader?" he exclaimed at last.

The soldiers addressed looked at each other knowingly while many a smile—though speedily repressed—played around their bearded lips.

One at length spoke:

"Methinks I saw the knight making for the Castle garden awhile since," he said.

"Ha!" ejaculated the young man significantly to his squire. "Then the reason is not far to seek. When the war-trumpet sounds the call to arms, naught would make a Piercy dally, but a woman's smile. Yet methinks this one is worth the winning though," he added thoughtfully, "and we must een cool our heels in waiting and give the Douglas men another half hour's grace. It will be that ere we shall put foot to stirrup, I ween!"

And who was this maiden whose smile could keep a scion of the Piercy's at her side when he should, in duty bound, have been spurring at top speed in the direction of Annandale?

Let us—using the privilege of the story-teller, and dividing time and space with a stroke of the pen—follow without.

Issuing through the raised portcullis, drawn up ready for the expected passage of the waiting troops, and passing through the narrow space intervening between the drawbridge, as yet unlowered, and the rough hewn walls, we continue along the base of the castle, on a level with the moat, till we reach a fairly broad space, covered with banks of yellow marigolds, sweet-smelling gilly-flowers, and a very tangle of blooming rose-bushes, and clinging honey-suckle—the castle garden,

Let us peer among the mass of eglantine, through the tall stems of multi-coloured hollyhocks, which hid an angle in the walls from a curious view of the warders who guarded the drawbridge.

There we shall find them both—Annabel and Guy de Piercy—of the same name yet not of the same parentage. She is seated on a huge moss-grown stone, probably from its shape and splintered appearance dislodged from the walls above—hurled perhaps from the battlements upon the head of some unfortunate wight below.

The white fingers of one hand are toying idly with the gold fringe of her girdle. The other lies in her lap, scarcely whiter and more delicate than the spotless robe, whose simplicity seems to emphasise the graceful contour of the form it is intended to hide.

He is stretched upon the greensward at her side, his ardent gaze turned admiringly on her face, which she keeps half averted, whether from a coyness, or a desire to tease, he is plainly doubtful.

It is a pretty picture that we gaze upon, from the security of our floral screen. In the foreground are the waters of the moat, glistening in the sunshine, the narrow stretch of grass-grown terrace, the patches of lurid-coloured flowers, the fairy-like form of the girl, with her tresses of nut-brown, flowing unconfined upon her shoulders, the martial figure of the young knight, encased in glittering steel, his plumed helmet lying at his side. While in the background, dark and forbidding, are the rugged, time-stained walls of the old keep.

But having gazed our fill, let us listen—using still the privilege we have usurped—to what is taking place.

The knight is speaking, his spurred heels digging nervously into the soft turf upon which they rest, bearing evidence that he is not so much at ease, as his attitude would convey.

"Sweet coz, it is high time for me to go," he is saying for the twentieth time during the quarter of an hour they have lingered there, making no attempt to rise nevertheless. "Thy father, my good uncle—Sir John—brooks no delay, and ere sundown we must be well o'er the Northern border."

"Then I say again why dally, cousin Guy?" she replied with a taunting laugh. "Thy troops stand ready armed and impatient, in the courtyard within, and only require the presence of their halting leader to set forth."

The spurred heels make a more vicious lunge at the unoffending turf which flies right and left in miniature showers, and glancing down, she proceeds:

"Methinks, Sir Knight, those spurs of thine will have to be put to better use full soon, than in digging pits in my poor garden."

"A truce to thy gibes, Annabel!" he cries impatiently, "If I tarry here thou knowest the reason full well. 'T is to have thy answer."

She heaves a sigh of mocking deprecation.

"Then I fear thou wilt tarry long, sweet sir, and my father's beeves be salted down and in the pickle tub, ere those long limbs of thine grip thy courser's sides," and eluding the hand with which he endeavours to detain her, she leaps quickly to her feet and poises herself lightly as a bird on the parapet which guarded the moat.

He is not slow to follow, and the beauty of the girl he gazes upon, conquering his vexation, he goes on:

"Annabel! Annabel! Remember that I love thee. Aye, all the better for thy teasing ways, thou sweet witch!"

"So does many another gallant, if soft looks, heavy sighs, love verses, and many a golden guinea spent in Jongleur's songs, under the Castle walls, are tokens," she says coolly.

His teeth sink savagely into his lower lip, while his clenched hand steals round till it rests upon the hilt of his dagger.

"Too true, I know it well! But let them ogle and send love verses, spend their guineas in love charms, play the troubadour under thy casement, what they will. I care not! But"—menacingly—"the gay springald who wins thee had better have bearded the Black Douglas at his own gate, than have robbed Guy de Piercy of the woman he seeks to make his bride."

His answer—in keeping with the fierce spirit of the times—evidently pleases the border maid, for notwithstanding the glint of mischief which still lingers in her hazel eyes, she says softly, laying her hand upon his mailed arm:

"Thou wouldst do doughty deeds for my sake, Guy, wouldst thou not?"

He starts like a mettled war-horse under the spur.

"Methinks it is o'er late in the day to ask that,"—reproachfully—"Has there been a tilting match these five years past, at which I have not proclaimed thy beauty 'gainst all comers? Aye, and maintained it at my spear point too. Give me thy scarf!" he goes on, making an impetuous movement to snatch from her shoulder the strip of scarlet silk, which lends the only touch of colour to her attire. "Give me thy scarf, I say, and ere to-morrow morn, it shall be tied to my lance, and carried as my pennon, to the very gates of Castle Douglas."

"And thy head perhaps would remain to grace those same gates, as the penalty of thy frowardness," she cries, laughing still, and keeping him at arm's length, "while my father would lose one of his best knights."

"What matter!" he answers gloomily. "There are others as fitting, to take Guy de Piercy's place!"

"I doubt it not, Sir Modesty!" she says, "but my father may think otherwise. Besides, he loves not such feats, and would blame me sore that I had sent thee on such an errand, more especially before thou hadst brought back his stolen cattle. But"—with a glance coaxing him once more into good humour—"there is a simpler and less dangerous way to win my favour."

"How?" he asks.

"See!" pointing to a tiny blue flower, growing on the farther side of the moat. "Fetch me hither that floweret, and, who knows? I may be tempted to grant thee the boon thou askest."

She glances down at the muddy waters, then turns her face aside, to conceal the mischievous smile which dimples it.

"Methinks the task thou hast set me is an easy one, sweet coz!" he cries joyously. "What ho, there, warder! Lower the drawbridge! Quick! Lower away!"

But the wind, sweeping down from the opposite direction, the warders hear nothing, and chat on unconcernedly, within the grille.

He is hastening towards the gateway to repeat his commands, when she stops him with a gesture.

"Nay, nay, not so fast, Sir Knight. Thy task is not so simple as the gathering of yon floweret, dry-shod. Neither would I wish it to be carried to my father's ears, that the captain of his riders is dallying in the garden, whispering love speeches to his daughter, when he should be shouting war cries at his foes. Thou must perforce wet thy jacket, bold sir, or wait my answer till some future time, when, who knows? fickle maid as thou hast often called me, I may have changed my mind."

"Then thy mind is made up at last?" he exclaims eagerly.

"Do my behest first, and ask thy guerdon after," she replies.

The knight tugs his moustache ruefully, looking from his spotlessly polished armour to the stagnant waters at their feet.

"By my halidom! That paltry blossom is scarcely worth the rusting of my war gear, to say nothing that 'tis no fitting dress for swimming. Prithee, choose some other task for thy true knight, lady mine."

The petulant maiden's face flushes.

"I meant that thou shouldst doff thy armour, ere thou leapt into the stream. But it matters not. Keep both thy mailed coat and leathern jerkin dry! 'Twas but an idle fancy. 'Tis a paltry blossom as thou sayest. Yet"—with a touch of scorn—"methinks 'twould have been more knightly of thee if thou hadst not said so, seeing that I had chosen it as a token of thy love."

Tossing her pretty head, the pampered maid takes a hasty step toward the gates, when the sound of a heavy plunge arrests her steps. The knight, stung by her words and regardless of the heavy weight of his mail, has leapt headlong into the black waters of the moat.

Remorseful and alarmed for his safety, she returns to the water's edge, but the sight of her lover, swimming slowly it is true, but sturdily towards the opposite bank reassures her.

An expression changing from gratification to mirth, then to something more tender, beams in her eyes. She watches him reach the other side, sees him pluck the frail blossom growing out of the soft mud at the water's edge; then after an ineffectual attempt to secure a foothold, or obtain a rest for his tired arms, turn and swim, very slowly now, towards the point where she stands awaiting him.

That the weight of his armour makes the task no easy one she also sees, but that he is distressed—nay, in imminent danger—she does not realise. To the swimmer it is different. He knows the truth, and despair is at his heart.

His blood is pumping through his veins, each stroke of his wearied limbs he thinks must be his last. Yet, brave knight as he is, he keeps a smiling face turned towards the maiden, whose own, wreathed in smiles, instead of drawing nearer, seems to the exhausted man, to be receding from him.

The effort is too great to be long sustained. He makes a bungling stroke, his mouth and nostrils sink below the surface, he gives a gurgling cry, and only by a desperate effort, keeps himself afloat.

At this moment, the sound of a trumpet call from the courtyard within peals over the waters.

The maiden turns her head in the direction of the sound, so remains ignorant yet of his peril.

"Haste thee! Haste thee! Thou sluggard!" she cries, "Hearest thou not the trumpet blast? Thy troop is growing impatient, and listen!"—as sounds of clanking chains and creaking pulleys break upon their ears—"they are lowering the drawbridge! In a moment thy riders will be pricking across. Would'st thou have them discover thee swimming like a tadpole, i' the moat?"

Neither the trumpet blast nor the maiden's banter can give strength to his wearied limbs, still doggedly he swims on—silently, too, for his bursting lungs will not permit the double effort.

If he speaks he must stop, and when he stops he knows full well, that he will sink like a stone.

Anxious that he shall not expose himself to the ridicule of his followers, and growing vexed at his seeming perverseness:

"Come! Come! Give me the floweret!" she cries, "give it me, ere thy troopers come, or count my favour lost!"

With a last expiring effort, he raises himself breast high out of the water, and hurls the fragile blossom towards her. It falls almost at her feet. As she stoops and plucks it, a whisper, soft as a sigh, falls upon her ears, from the dark waters:

"Forget-me-not! Love! Forget-me-not!"

Alarmed, she starts to her feet, and gazes down into the black flood with distended eyes, but only her own face is reflected there. Nought breaks the unruffled surface of the moat, but a rapidly widening ring of water. It is followed by a bubble which bursts and disappears—then all is still. Nothing betrays that a brave knight sleeps his last sleep below. Nothing—not even the maiden, at whose bidding he had leapt to his death.

When the troop files across the drawbridge, and forms up on the plain beyond, she makes no motion, gives no sign, standing immovable as a statue, with wide-open, meaningless eyes.

When they come to ask her, whither he has gone, and why he tarries, she starts for a moment as if unable to comprehend. Then she again and again presses a tiny blue flower to her white lips, and murmurs vacantly:

"Forget-me-not! Forget-me-not!"

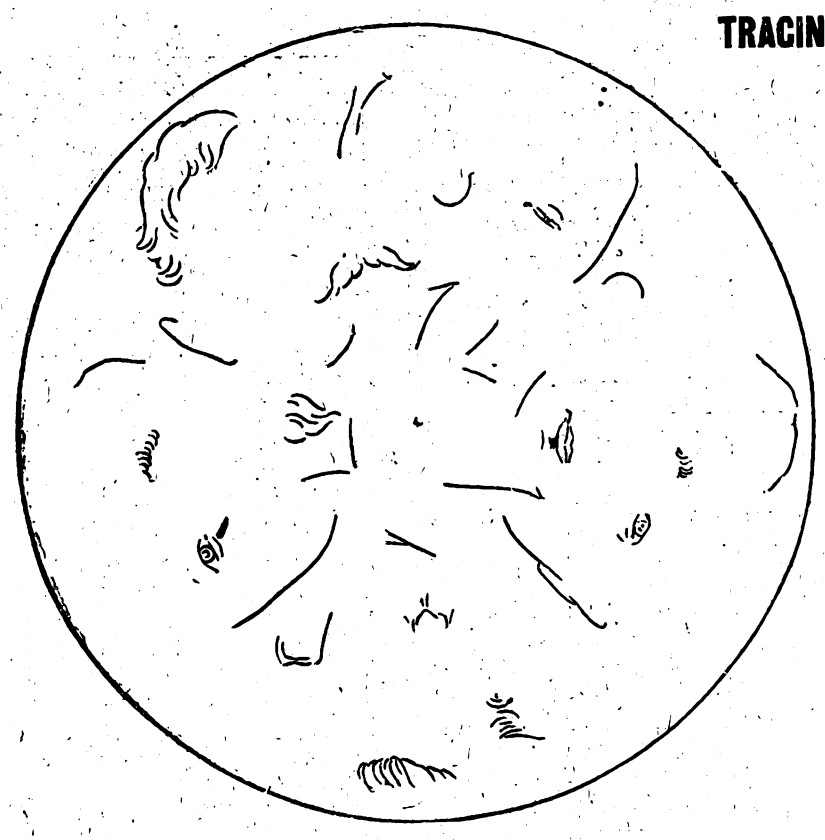
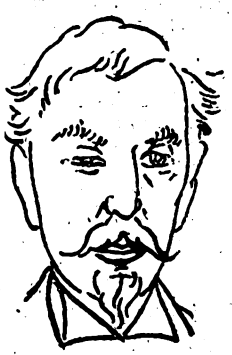
TRACING FACES COMPETITION.



Here we have a circle containing a number o lines. All you have to do is to take a strip of tracing paper about four inches long by two and a half inches wide, stick a pin through one end of it, and through the centre of the circle (indicated by the cross).

Trace one of the lines. Then shift your paper round until you find another line to meet it—an ear, or a pair of eyes, or a moustache.

When you have finished, the result should make the portrait of a well-known person. Any number of faces can be made, but there is only one correct face in each circle.



One of the faces you can make.

First Prize, £2. 2nd to 10th Prizes, a Six-Shilling Novel.

The first prize will go to the reader from whom we receive the correct solution. In the event of a tie, the prize will be awarded to the sender of the neatest solution. The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must enter on that understanding.

"HAIR LIKE AN ENGLISH WOMAN."

That is the generally expressed desire of a foreigner. To have hair like an English woman. Hair is a woman's chief adornment, but hair to be nice must have nice treatment. Hair must be stimulated to live.

Continual brushing does this, and nothing else does it as effectually. Our grandmothers, and even our mothers, knew this so well that hair brushing was one of the most important features of their toilet. Half an hour at night and half an hour in the morning were thought none too long a time to devote to this. If this attention cannot be given, recourse must be had to a stimulant, and as a stimulant for the hair there is none so safe and so effective as the discovery of Mr. Geo. R. Sims, called by him "TATCHO," which is the Romany word for "genuine."

GEO. R. SIMS' HAIR RENEWER "TATCHO."

"TATCHO" is a brilliant spirituous liquor, the colour of whisky, free from all grease. A sprinkle of a few drops on the scalp and five minutes with the brush daily works marvels with every head of hair, but more especially with those that have not received their quantum of care.

If you value your appearance—and who does not?—get a bottle of "TATCHO" to-day. The result will surprise you and be intensely gratifying.

"TATCHO" will stop the hair falling, and will make it beautiful in texture and double in volume.

"TATCHO" gives vitality to the hair at once, and after a few days of treatment its youthful brightness; and what is more, this vitality and brightness may be retained.

Mrs. BROWN POTTER, whose beautiful hair is the envy of her sex, uses nothing but "TATCHO."

Geo. R. Sims' Hair Renewer, "Tatcho," is obtainable of all perfumers, 2/9 & 5/- per Bottle; or can be had direct in plain wrapper on sending 2/11 or 5/3.

A SHOT IN THE DARK.

A Tale of the Veld.

"IS that all you have to say to me, Prusy?"

The girl was leaning over the low stone wall of the cattle kraal, her eyes fixed upon a cloud of dust which was moving slowly across the great treeless expanse of waterless waste, on the edge of which the Brandon homestead was situated.

The sun was dropping to the west, and the Brandon stock was returning to the pens after a day on the veld. Prusy Brandon rested her arms on the wall and looked out over the bare, brown, hummocky plain.

But in the picture at which Prusy was gazing, with an absorption so intense that she seemed utterly oblivious of the companion by her side, neither westering sun, nor rugged veld, neither distant height, nor lowing herd found any place. Her eye was filled with the vision of a white-painted gate set in a hedge of flaming red cactus.

At the gate stood a man and a maid. The man's head was half hidden under the rim of the broad-brimmed hat the girl was wearing, and he was talking rapidly in low earnest tones.

The gate led from the horse-paddock into the fruit-garden; and the cool, scent-laden breeze of evening, rustled musically among the leaves of the pear-tree overhead, while the man, who held the girl's hand imprisoned in his strong, firm clasp, continued to pour into her willing ear the story which he had ridden thirty miles to tell. And though her cheek had flushed, and her eye had kindled, as the hot, passionate words had rushed tumultuously from her lips, she had let him return without an answer. Now, as she stood there gazing dreamily across the veld, Prusy Brandon knew that Frank Bartols had taken her heart back to Amersdorp.

"Is that all you have to say to me, Prusy?"

The repetition of the question in tones that betrayed both sullenness and irritation, accompanied by the laying of a rude hand upon her shoulder, brought the girl back from the flower-scented orchard to the pungent-smelling cattle-kraal with a shock that jarred every nerve and fibre.

Oblivious of the companion by her side.

She turned and confronted the speaker.

"No, Jacob," said the girl, shaking off the hand, and drawing a quick, deep breath. "No, it is not all. I have told you before, as I have told you to-day, that I cannot honestly hold out to you any hope of being able to give you any other reply than the one I have given you already. But since——"

"You may change your mind," urged the man. "All women——"

"I shall not change my mind," returned the girl quietly.

"You've done it before, Prusy."

The girl looked him full in the face. There was a challenge in her eye.

He dropped his instantly.

"I say you've done it before," he repeated doggedly, "and may do it again—when you're tired of that——"

"How dare you?" she cried, stamping her foot.

"Anyhow, you were glad enough to see me till Frank Bartols came to live over at Amesdorp," sneered the man, devouring her wolfish eyes.

"I should be glad to see you now, Jacob; on the old terms. But I'm afraid that's——" she hesitated, "—— impossible," snopped Jacob, completing the sentence for her. "Well, I'm glad you recognise the position, if you refuse to accept the responsibility. Did you really suppose that that ridiculous brother-and-sister arrangement could continue? It was all very well whilst we remained children, but——"

"We shall not mend matters by discussing them, Jacob. Better leave them to time."

"Time!" he exclaimed, a curious gleam coming into his eyes. "Yes, I believe you're right, Prusy. Time is my best ally. Old Uncle Steve's half breed will find himself short in his reckoning on the question of time."

The girl drew back a space and surveyed him contemptuously. He shifted uneasily under the withering glance which she bent upon him. The man gave a laugh and forced himself to look at her.

The steady disdainful gaze of her scornful eyes seemed to shrivel his soul.

He turned away, and throwing himself across the low stone wall began to whistle.

"What are you waiting for, Jacob Maartens?" asked the girl, in a low impressive voice.

"For the end of the story you set out to tell," returned the man, a strongly cynical inflection in his tone. "It ought to be interesting; since upon it will depend the circumstances under which our next meeting will probably take place," and he recommenced the performance which her question had interrupted.

The girl did not speak. She remained very still. Her breath came in quick short gasps. The moment was tense with emotion. She was not ignorant of the feeling which existed amongst a large section of the Dutch population. Could Jacob really have intended to convey a threat? Her whole frame quivered.

Colonial-born, of English parentage, educated at Cape Town and brought up on the veld, Prusy was refined in manner but fearless in spirit. For Jacob to suppose that he could move her by a threat was an insult to her birth and an affront to her breeding. It showed also how little he understood her after all.

His words, she guessed, could only refer to the movement against the Englanders which had been going on now more or less openly all over the place for months. Her father had said only yesterday that it would come to a fight; and the District Magistrate from Newcastle, who was on a visit, had advised him to send the women-folk into Natal. But Ned Brandon had lived half his life amongst the Dutchmen. He counted many friends among the farmers round Normanton; and though he had sometimes wondered how things might go if a stranger who knew not Joseph were set over them, he had consoled himself with the reflection that at the worst the border was only forty miles away; and thereupon had determined to hold on to the last.

With the rumours which from time to time had reached her ears, Prusy had not concerned herself much. The veld was her home, and the children of the Boer families had been her playmates, as the son and grandson of her nearest Dutch neighbours were now her lovers. The talk of the transport riders, of the fossickers, and others who came and went, did not greatly affect Prusy. That was her father's business.

But the words of Jacob Maartens had a nasty ring about them. They sounded sinister and menacing.

Her hand clenched and her bosom heaved. She couldn't trust herself to speak. She must tell him how she despised him if she opened her lips.

Ned Brandon on his way to the sheep pens for the evening count-in, shouted a greeting to Maartens as he passed; but Jacob was very slow about responding. Ned opined there was a quarrel; and remembering his own courting days, whistled his favourite collie to heel and passed on.

"Are you ashamed or afraid to finish?" growled Maartens at last, provoked beyond endurance by the girl's silence. "Because if you've nothing more to say to me, I've something to say to you; but I'd rather you had your say first."

"You are angry with me Jacob, because it is not in my power to do as you wish."

"Not in your power? That's a lie to begin with," broke in the man vehemently.

He struck the wall with his fist, while a dull red glow stole into his face.

"You can send him away if you've a mind to. But it's Jacob Maartens who's to trek, and Frank Bartols who's to stay. You've made it up between you.

"Tell the truth, missy; and you'd rather see Maartens stretched out by the rooineks, than hear that Bartols had been scratched by a thorn-brake.

"Well, maybe it's yourself will have to trek, sweetheart; but I can't promise that Mynheer Franz will be escort. He——"

"Stop! stop! You've said enough, Jacob," cried the girl. "I will hear no more," and she turned to leave the spot, but Maartens seized her by the wrists.

"Are you mad?" she hissed, struggling to be free.

"Yes, I think I must be," he answered between his teeth. "It's Prusy Brandon's work. 'Tis she has driven me over the border, and roused the devil that lurks in every man's heart."

"You will make me hate you, Jacob."

He laughed.

"Hate me? Ha! Ha! Wait, myn lieb, wait. I won't ask you to finish your story. I know it. But hear mine. You have killed him."

He paused.

"You understand?—the man who has taken the place that should be mine."

She clutched at the wall for support.

"Frank Bartols is dead. Prusy Brandon has killed him."

She gave a low cry. He stifled an oath and hurried on.

"Bartols is a spy—a traitor; an enemy to his country. The Schweinhund that he is—he had an English mother. He was in their cursed country when his father died. Better had old Stephen let him stay there. The man is no Africander. He is a verdammt Engelschman, and a spy.

"He has been carrying news to the rooineks in Natal; but, Himmel! he will carry no more. I have only been waiting for this to denounce him.

"To-morrow, your lover, Frank Bartols, will be arrested.

"A week hence, every Africander from the Cape to the Limpopo, will be on the march; and we shall sweep every verdammt Englisher into the sea.

"I came here to-day, Fräulein, simple Jacob Maartens, ready to offer my protection in return for your promise. But to-morrow, I shall be Field-Cornet Maartens, and my first duty will be to warn Baas Brandon that he is suspected of harbouring traitors and that his farm is confiscated to the State.

"As for that Judas," he added significantly, "You will never call Frank Bartols, husband, Missy."

She stood up and faced him.

"You can go, Jacob. There is nothing more to say. Father will deal with the matter you speak of when it is put before him."

She spoke in hard, level tones. Her eye glittered, but her voice was firm and her pulse steady.

He glowered at her sullenly.

"Then you will let Frank Bartols go to his death without a pang?"

"Jacob!"

He started.

There was a note in her voice that he had never heard in it before.

"Have you no pity? Why do you not leave me?"

"You love him?"

She flung up her hand.

He thought she was about to strike him and recoiled.

"Coward!" she panted.

"And you will let him die."

"Brute!"

"What will it profit you? You refuse me; but you sacrifice him. Take me, and you give him a chance to die honourably in the future, instead of shamefully ——"

"Go! go before I kill you," she cried, advancing upon him, her bosom heaving and her nostrils a-quiver. "I hate you Jacob Maartens, I hate you; and remember,

"You will make me hate you, Jacob."

Digitized by Google

that for any evil that befalls Frank Bartols I will hold you to account."

He glared at her for a moment with uncomprehending eyes; then he lowered his gaze and turned away.

* * * * *

"Steady, Jenny! steady, good horse."

The sound of her mistress's voice, and the caressing hand laid upon the mare's neck had their effect. With a low whinny the intelligent creature presently settled down again into a long, lolloping stride.

She had swerved suddenly from the track at the Tower Rock, just after entering the five mile poort about mid-distance between Normanton and Amesdorp.

There was a good sprinkle of stars overhead, but the throat of the gully was narrow, and the heavy masses of rock which overhung the track for the first mile or two made the going in places as dark as a tunnel.

"Wonder what could have made her shy?" thought Prusy. "She ought to know every inch of the ground, every ragged rock and naked boulder. Must have smelt something, I expect—Kaffirs, likely, trekking into Swaziland till the trouble here's over. There's been a lot of natives on the move this fortnight past."

The mare kept on down the poort at a steady, even pace, knocking sparks out of the scattered flints as she spurned them with her flying heels.

There was more light now, for the defile broadened out at the Amesdorp end, and already the open veld could be dimly seen stretching away under the winking stars.

"Old Uncle Steve will think me daft; and Frank ——"

What was that?

She pulled up her mount so suddenly that the mare was almost thrown on her haunches.

Prusy knew the sound too well to be in doubt, but the question rose involuntarily to her lips.

It was the crack of a rifle—of two rifles, fired simultaneously, away up towards the further end of the long gully from which she was just emerging.

Her mind went back to the Tower Rock and the shying horse; and in a moment she found herself trembling at some unknown danger mercifully escaped. But intuitively she felt that, whatever the peril, it was Away across the veld, like the scurrying wind.

Prusy had said not a word in the house about the interview with Maartens. Brandon had shown some surprise at not seeing Jacob at supper; but had excused him in his own mind on the score of the "tiff"; while openly setting it down to the bad news from Pretoria.

"Oom Paul, I hear, has made up his mind for a fight; so I expect Jacob's a bit shy of sitting down with us, wife," had been Ned's observation on finding Maartens was absent; and thereafter the talk had run mostly on the chances of conflict, and the fortune of war.

When the family retired, Prusy had gone quietly to the stable, and saddling "Jenny," had started on her long night ride to Amesdorp. The revelation of Maartens, she was convinced, was nothing but a diabolical plot to remove a rival; which the threatened outbreak of hostilities rendered feasible. Her object therefore was to warn Bartols, and at the same time to tell him, without prudery or reserve, what a week ago he had tried in vain to wring from her unwilling lips—that he was the man, the only man, who held in his keeping her fresh young heart. That confession she owed him.

dead middle of the night had made her tremble. It awakened such an infinity of possibilities.

When she reached Amesdorp Frank Bartols had left, to join his commando at Standerton.

* * * * *

There was a wounded half-breed found in the Long Poort next morning with a Mauser rifle lying by his side; and scarce a dozen yards away lay the dead body of Jacob Maartens of Maartenspruit.

The injured man was brought into Normanton, and thanks to his Kaffir blood lived long enough to tell the tale.

He was half-brother to Maartens, who on the old Baas's death had hounded Setabo off the homestead; and not long since had done him a foul injury, and Setabo had sworn to be revenged if he had to wait years for it.

The mines, where he had been employed, being shut down in view of the near approach of war, he was trekking for Embesterk in Swaziland, when a longing seized him to go and have a look at the old homestead at Maartenspruit. He went, was recognized, and beaten off the place by Maartens and two Boeren armed with sjamboks.

At Helder's Farm he stole a rifle, and was on his way back to watch for Jacob when by good chance he met him last night on the veld.

Maartens was talking to somebody in the dark—to somebody that Setabo couldn't see, talking a lot, and wandering about in a silly sort of fashion. He didn't ride straight on, but kept pulling up his horse and looking all round, as if uncertain of his road.

"I crept up as near as I could," said the man, "hoping to get in a shot. I knew I should have only chance for one; and if I missed—well, Jacob was a dead shot. But he seemed crazed with the fancy that someone was dodging him, for he wheeled his horse right round, time and agen; his mouth full of strange threats, and shook his fist at the dark.

"After a bit he took to laughing. 'Peared he'd a notion that somebody was going to ride over from Norm'ton to Amesdorp in the dark, and it amused him. 'He'd wait for them,' he said, 'in the Long Poort; and they'd ride together—but not to Amesdorp; no, to—' and then he burst into such a queer laugh that I hated him worse than ever. So I just trekked off to the Tower Rock, meaning to give him what I'd got in the Mauser when he came by. Hardly had I reached the spot however, when I heard the sound of hoofs. Somebody was coming—Maartens?

"Stepping out of my hiding place, I saw the long skirt of a woman sweep past me in the dark.

"Then I heard the thud of other hoofs in the distance and I got ready for Jacob.

"That flying figure had brought old memories to mind. Had I been possessed of a dozen lives I would have given them all for his.

"Well, I didn't have to wait many minutes. Down the poort he came reviling his luck, and I got in my shot; but he was able to return it, and I shan't be long after.

"Yet I have this satisfaction Baas. He lived long enough to know who had sent him to the Evil One, and I spared him not to the last.

"It was a shot in the dark, but it went home; and now Setabo is ready to follow, whither the blackhearted Dutchman has gone.

"Long live the Great White Queen!"

An Australian Recluse.

Two of Mr. Robinson's bullocks had broken from the paddock at Toonarbin Run, during the night, and Ralph Robinson, their owner's nephew, and one of the stock-keepers, had started out in search of them on horseback, with a couple of collie dogs loping along in the rear.

Australian scenery is grandly impressive always. Particularly so at early sunrise, when nature is shaking off the night's slumber. Toonarbin Range was aglow with golden light, peak upon peak rising skyward as far as the eye could reach.

The missing bullocks were seen about noon in company with a herd of half-wild cattle. Jenkins, the stock-keeper, flourished his stock-whip in their direction.

"Stay you here, Mr. Ralph," he said hurriedly, "while I cut the two strays out from the herd—you head them if they turn away from the run," and off he galloped.

It was many a long day before Ralph saw him again. Instead of breaking, the herd plunged forward en masse, the bullocks in the midst. Cattle and keeper disappeared in a cloud of dust. One of the collies followed at the heels of the stockman's horse. The other remained behind with Ralph. This collie suddenly started a big kangaroo—a "boomer," or man kangaroo, as the colonists say—from the under scrub.

Before Ralph could pull his holster pistol, the boomer was out of sight in a little grove of oak at the right.

Forgetting drover and bullocks, Ralph urged his horse forward in pursuit, guided by the wild barking of the collie, and an occasional glimpse of the mouse-coloured animal making tremendous bounds through the scrub, which was broken by patches of clear up and in places. Kangaroos had become scarce around Toonarbin Run, and Ralph Robinson was an enthusiastic huntsman.

Absorbed in the ardour of the chase, Ralph did not think of the danger of losing himself in the bush. On and still on, when, suddenly emerging from the thick growth, the banks of a tortuous creek appeared before him.

In the shallow part of the stream stood the boomer at bay. Not being able to use its hind foot, armed with its long, sharp-pointed claw, the huge beast, almost as large as an average sized man, had laid hold of the poor collie and thrust it under water, despite the dog's best efforts at self-preservation.

Springing from his saddle, Ralph balanced the holster pistol across the bend of his left arm, and fired with correct aim. The big animal fell with a splash, shot through the heart. With infinite difficulty Ralph dragged the boomer ashore while the half-drowned collie sat panting on the bank. Then the young stockman began for the first time to look about him.

He was surrounded by virgin forest, whose silence was only broken by the babble of the creek flowing over some stony obstructions, and the chatter of occasional flocks of parrots flying high over the everglade. It was noon by the sun, and having heedlessly left his pocket-compass behind, Ralph, like the eloquent orator, "knew no north, no south, no east, no west." Even the peculiar-shaped, snow-clad crests of the Toonarbin Range seemed to have changed their individuality. In fact, Ralph was lost.

But he was a plucky young fellow, who had lived from boyhood on his uncle's stock farm in the wildest portion of the Warragara district. Twice before had he been similarly placed, and after hours of wandering, made his way back. The first thing he did was to cut off the boomer's immense tail, not as a trophy, but as a choice tit-bit for a roast. This he secured behind the saddle, and, whistling to the collie, led his horse up from the banks of the creek, where he stood for a moment trying to guess at the points of the compass.

A slight rustling in the long grass behind him, and a short, quick bark from the sheep-dog, caused Ralph to turn his head quickly, at the same time involuntarily stretching out one hand in the direction of his holster pistol.

Quicker than a flash, his right wrist was clutched and held in a vice-like grip. At the same moment a laughing, ebony-hued face, showing far more of intelligence than is seen in the features of the average Australian native, was brought within range of his astonished vision.

Now Ralph was by no means a weakling; yet, though his laughing captor seemed little more than a boy, he was astonished to find that he could not release his wrist from the wiry black fingers until the latter relaxed of their own accord.

"No use, white fellow! Mayfu cobung matong (very strong)!" said the black, good-naturedly.

He wore a sort of sheepskin coat without arms, and short leather breeches—nothing else—and Ralph saw at a glance that the stranger was unlike any of the natives employed in and about the stock farm.

"Who are you?" he asked, bluntly.

"Mayfu," was the brief response.

And Mayfu professed entire ignorance of the locality, his people—so he said, with pantomimic gesture—living further away to the north, in the Wallagiera, or Valley of the Mountain of Fire.

Digitized by Google

One peculiarity Ralph noticed: that while Mayfu used at times the singular dialect of the Australian black, he could speak a fairly good "pidgin English."

Thus, as a little later Ralph produced some cold "damper," with a view to lunch, while Mayfu started a fire, the latter exclaimed, in reference to the tail of the boomer he had begun to skin:

"Baal flying doe this one, mine think it," meaning that the kangaroo must have been of uncommon size, while the next breath he asked, with a sharp glance in Ralph's face: "What matter, white fellow? You look like sick." For all at once Ralph had felt a strange dizziness and weakness come over him, not unlike that which is a prelude to the fever of the Australian lowlands. His appetite suddenly left him; the cold damper and roast boomer tail became alike repugnant.

"I am sick," he said, wearily, and lay down on the purple heath as he spoke.

Mayfu unstrapped the blanket from behind Ralph's saddle, and arranged it for a pillow. He then fastened the horse with a picket rope, and getting water from the creek, bathed the sick man's burning temples.

It was midsummer, and the air, even as nightfall came on, was mild and balmy.

Too dizzy and confused to think, or even care, Ralph lay in a half-waking drowse, hearing the thousand voices of night in an Australian forest, seeing the fireflies blazing through the air, and conscious that Mayfu squatted beside him, and seemed never to close his eyes in slumber. At early dawn the black took the tin "billy" from behind Ralph's saddle, and disappeared. Half-an-hour later he returned. The billy was half full of glossy green leaves having a peculiar aromatic smell. These Mayfu steeped in water over the fire.

"Drink, my master," he said authoritatively, holding the tin to the white youth's parched lips while he supported his head. The draught seemed to give him a sort of unnatural physical strength, though Ralph himself, so nearly as he knows, was half-delirious when, a little later, Mayfu helped him into his saddle.

What followed was like the wild fantasies of a confused dream. Half supported on his horse by Mayfu's strong arm, Ralph was indistinctly conscious of hours—it might have been days—of continuous ongoing, through great defiles and wooded plains, over grass-clad hills, and in primeval forests. Then the way led upward, among immense elevations of volcanic origin. Lava and pumice were crushed by the horse's feet.

Up and still up among the eternal snows; yet strange as it may seem, Ralph seemed neither conscious of cold, hunger, loss of sleep, or fatigue. From time to time Mayfu gave him to drink from a hollow gourd of the infusion he had prepared.

When the light of reason dawned again in Ralph's mind, he was lying on a couch of fragrant grass. Above his head was a bark roof; the sides of the smoke-stained interior were of plain slabs driven deep in the earth. Through the open doorway and between the trunks of great fern trees he caught a glimpse of mountain slopes, covered with dense verdure rising on every side.

Near him, on a pile of kangaroo skins, sat a girl, seemingly a few years younger than himself. And in all his dreams Ralph had never seen anything half so beautiful. Her skin was dazzlingly fair, her eyes dark and lustrous, and her hair, intensely black and silky, fell over the folds of a simple dress of calico in a wonderful cloud.

No, he was not dreaming. For close beside her was Nero, the collie dog, who, as his master stretched out his wasted hand, licked it, whining a joyful recognition.

"Where am I?" Ralph feebly asked; "and please—who are you?"

"In the Valley of Wallagiera," was the quiet reply; "and I am Valetta; my father is the chief man of our settlement."

But it was not till two or three days afterwards, when Ralph, strengthened by savoury broths, was able to sit outside in the cooling shade, that he learnt from Valetta, who had constituted herself his nurse, more particulars as to the Wallagiera settlement.

It would seem that nearly two hundred years before, some Europeans had been shipwrecked on the west coast of the island continent. They had penetrated far inland, where they were taken prisoners by some of the Garri tribes. On condition that their lives should be spared, all but four had taken native wives.

Their descendants, a hundred years later, had little or no trace of native blood, and were socially ostracized by the Garris on that account. Banded together, they penetrated the interior, hitherto untrodden by man.

With them was a missionary, who had wandered from the coast to the Garri country, where he had been but ill-received. The little community finally reached the Valley of Wallagiera, where they located permanently.

Ralph was not lacking in ambition, nor was he weary of the world. But a stronger motive than either I have mentioned prevented his return to civilization.

Valetta was the most beautiful girl he had ever seen, and as good as she was beautiful. Ralph had no one in the world belonging to him excepting his Uncle George, who had a family of his own.

* * * * *

Nearly ten years later, an athletic, bronzed, full-bearded young man of thirty rode into the yard of Mr. George Robinson's extensive stock farm in the Warragara district just at sundown.

The helper who came forward to take his horse was an elderly man, with a peculiarly shaped blue scar across his nose. The stranger glanced inquiringly in his face.

"Well, Dick Jenkins," he said, quietly, "did you cut out the bullocks you and I went in search of from Uncle George's stock farm, nine or ten years ago?"

Old Dick started, whistled, and uttered a great exclamation, which brought half the household out on the stoop.

"Well, durn my cabbage tree if it ain't Mr. Ralph!" he shouted.

And it was. Yet no persuasion or pleadings on the part of Mr. and Mrs. Robinson, availed to keep Ralph with them beyond the one night.

"My wife and children await my coming with anxious hearts, and Mayfu, my servant man, will hardly sleep till I come back to the Valley of Wallagiera," he said, in answer to all solicitation to stay longer. An impulse to look once more upon civilization had seized the recluse for so many years, and he had obeyed it. But his only longing—the impulse gratified—was to return.

"Yes, I am perfectly happy," he said at parting. "My wife is the most beautiful and best woman in the world, and my children are like her. Our wants are simple, and we never go beyond the valley for them. Farewell,"

Nor would Ralph suffer anyone to accompany him on his return.

"So far as we can prevent it, we want no one to enter Wallagiera Valley," he told them.

And to this day it is not known that any have.

But Ralph will never again return to civilization. Why should he, indeed? W. S. L.

Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XVIII.—HE TAKES A COUNTRY HOUSE FOR THE SUMMER

"AND what do you think now?" shouted Mr. Bowser as he entered the hall the other evening and gave his hat a wave or two round his head before hanging it up.

"Have you bought a—a cow?" asked Mrs. Bowser as she recalled that he had spoken of new milk cows at the breakfast table.

"No cows! No spring tonics! No fire escapes! Rejoice, my dear woman, rejoice, and call me the best husband in the world while I give you an old fashioned hug!"

Mr. Bowser had taken a lease of a house in the country. It was a country house out in the country, and seven different doctors had told him that a month of agricultural air, with climbing trees, sliding down haystacks, and jumping fences would eradicate the rheumatism from his system, and bring back the flush of health to his wife's cheeks.

The house was furnished, and they were to go out the next afternoon with their cook and take full possession and begin to receive benefits.

"But why don't you go alone and see the farm and come back and tell me what you think of it?" protested Mrs. Bowser.

"Call me the best husband in the world while I give you an old-fashioned hug."

"Because I have already signed a lease for two months," he replied. "It's two hours' journey in the train, and it'll be a romantic little jaunt for us both. It's a mile from the station, and as we saunter along we'll pick daisies and run after rabbits and be young again."

She was dubious and he enthusiastic, and the result was that they were set down at the station nearest the farmhouse at six o'clock the next evening.

There were no daisies along the highway as they walked. They did not see any rabbits. There was one old crow flying about overhead, and a good many mudholes underfoot, and with all his enthusiasm Mr. Bowser couldn't work up any romance. By and by they reached the house, and as they stood at the gate he said:

"Now, then, this is the place, and we'll walk in. Isn't it a gem of a farm?"

"I don't see the gem exactly!" replied Mrs. Bowser as she looked about. "This can't be the house."

"Why, certainly it is."

"But there is no verandah, no blinds, no lawn, no flowers! The house seems never to have been painted, and, you see, most of the glass is broken. I never saw a more dreary place."

"I believe it's been used for a lunatic asylum!" added the cook.

"Now, don't begin to find fault!" protested Mr. Bowser. What can you expect of a farmhouse? We came out here for our health, not to find a palace. In two days I'll make everything shine like a new pin. Just observe that sunset, will you! By George, but how pure this air is! Why, I feel a year younger already!"

"Where are the trees?" asked Mrs. Bowser as she waded through the grass and weeds and sat down on the front steps of the house.

"Trees! Why, there's one, and—well, all doctors agree that trees round a house are unhealthy. We didn't come out here to get ill, but to get well. However, I have no doubt we can buy all the trees we want. Just look at that glorious sky!"

"I'm looking at the ground and fences and that old shed of a barn!" she sighed.

"You said we were to have cows and sheep and pigs and fowls. Where are they?"

"Yes, where are they?" added the cook as she listened for the clucking of hens.

"There's the cow right down there," replied Mr. Bowser as he pointed to a brindled skeleton looking at them over a fence. "As for the others, they'll be driven over to-morrow probably. I suppose I ought to go and milk the cow this evening, but as I'm rather tired she can wait. You just come inside if you want to see how cozy we are going to be this summer."

He unlocked the door, and they found whitewashed walls, rusty furniture and cobwebs galore. The place hadn't the cheerfulness of a hospital nor the conveniences of a canal-barge.

Digitized by Google

The cook reported a foot of water in the cellar and the kitchen worse than a stable, and Mrs. Bowser sat down on a knockkneed chair and wept, or had started to, when Mr. Bowser angrily exclaimed:

"Now, then, what's the matter with you? What's wrong with this house? What's all this boohooing about?"

"I—I can't live in such a place!" she sobbed.

"Oh, you can't! Can't live in the house where numerous scions of the aristocracy have passed their summers, eh! This is my reward for planning a nice little surprise! Haven't you got sense enough to see that two days' work will change all this—make a little palace of the place? I didn't expect to find things spick and span, but you might just give me a chance."

Mrs. Bowser realised that tears would be of no avail after things had gone so far as they had, and she wiped them away and tried to look more hopeful. Mr. Bowser wandered about outside until the cook had managed to get a bite to eat out of the provisions they had brought with them, and darkness had fallen upon the land when he said:

"You just chirp up and see how things will be to-morrow. Ah, but what's that?"

"It's a cricket singing," replied Mrs. Bowser.

"That's it—a regular, genuine cricket, alive and kicking, and none of your make believes to amuse children! When did we ever hear a cricket sing in town? By George, but that's a lullaby and no mistake! Think of it, Mrs. Bowser—genuine crickets to sing us to sleep in our own house!"

"Y-yes," she answered as she looked round with a sinking heart.

"And listen to that! There goes the song of the meadow lark to welcome us to our new home! If that isn't romantic, then I'd like to know what is! He is so glad we've come that he can't wait."

"Do meadow larks sing at eight o'clock at night?" she asked, knowing the sound to be the hoot of an owl in a tree beside the old barn.

"Not always—not unless they have special reason for it, as in this case," he wisely replied. "This bird probably saw us when we arrived, and, knowing that you'd feel a little lonely he remained awake to carol his song. Ah, Mrs. Bowser, give me the country above all other parts of earth! I can see an improvement in your looks already. Wait three days—a week—and then you'll bless me for what I have done."

"There goes the song of the meadow lark to welcome us to our new home."

Mrs. Bowser was ready to "bless" him then and there, but she held her peace and said she was tired and wanted to go to bed.

"And awake in the dewy morn to hear the robins and blackbirds and nightingales singing their souls away!" he cried out with a forced laugh as the owl uttered a hoot that lifted his hair. "I wonder where the cook is?"

"She's out on the doorstep crying, and I shan't blame her if she leaves us the first thing in the morning."

"She won't leave, and you'll wake up to laugh over the tears you've shed to-night. By George, but hear that rook, will you? I say, now, but there are people in town who'd give any amount to hear that song!"

"Don't you know a frog from a rook?" indignantly demanded Mrs. Bowser. "You'll hear 'em singing all night, and there'll be bats and owls and polecats to keep 'em company. If I'm found dead in the morning, you needn't bother about taking the remains home and holding a funeral. Just dump me into a swamp and tell the folks that I died of too much summer health!"

THE LOST FLAG.

GRANDFATHER was much worse to-day, Jeanette had said, at breakfast, but as little Howard Stanley glanced round the white bedroom, nothing met his youthful glance to warrant the statement.

Madame Villette was in the big chair by the bedside as usual, counting her beads.

From time to time she glanced wonderingly at the bed on which Grandfather lay, then turned away with a little whimper of senile amusement.

"One hundred and two years old," she mumbled, "One hundred and two years old. Mon Dieu, 'tis a great age—a great age for a man. To think he was a man grown when I was born, and I shall be eighty-two this coming Christmas. But then as I always tell Jeanette, he never will die till he gets the lost flag. Besides," as if summing up to herself the full secret of Grandfather's longevity, "he fought with the great Emperor—Mon Dieu! he fought with the great Emperor."

Aye! he fought with the great Emperor, this scarcely-breathing relic of a bygone age—fought and suffered for the honour of the little Corsican with the big high forehead, and impenetrable grey eyes.

Often did the English boy steal into the quiet room and listen almost fearfully to the ancient dame, for ever crooning the monotonous refrain.

"——great age. Ma foi! a great age for a man. But then he fought with the great Emperor. Mon Dieu! he fought with the great Emperor."

After which, she would invariably turn with awed amazement, pathetic in its senility, towards the great four-post bed, on which lay the barely animated remains of the man who, at Waterloo, had led the — Chasseurs when they died, almost to a man, for the glory of France.

Gaunt and great, its outline showing sharply along the line of white sheet, lay what was now barely more than the skeleton of the man, who in his day had carried many times the standard of the 10th Chasseurs to victory, and finally led the last great charge of his regiment at Waterloo.

Only the occasional flicker of the eyelids, or the shrivelled-up lips, eternally murmuring, "The flag! The flag!" betokened existence.

To the little English boy, staying with his mother at the Old Breton Farmhouse, "Grandfather" was a subject of awe—a grim sign-post marking the grave of a dead era.

He was so old—so very old, and beneath those yellow eyelids, rarely uplifted, were eyes that had once looked on so many peoples and places, and had seen the great battles and rich harvests of death, that had gone to the shaping-out of Napoleon's great road of conquest.

And those withered skinny hands lying on the counterpane, that looked like the shrivelled up claws in the mummy cases Howard had so often seen in the British Museum, had, once upon a time, gripped and swung the big sabre that hung by the clock in the hall, and killed so many men—how many?—the English schoolboy often wondered with awe.

On the romantic and sensitively constructed mind of the English schoolboy, all these associations exercised a powerful effect, and as he crept into the room on this hot August day, and looked at the thing on the bed, he experienced a vague feeling of dread.

The blind was drawn over the one big window, but not low enough to exclude a narrow streak of the sunlight which lay across the floor like a golden rod.

The boy vaguely felt it to be out of place! it seemed strangely incongruous, in that room so full of the tragedy of human existence.

Madame Villette ceased her mumblings and looked up as he entered.

"Come in, little boy." she whispered, "he," nodding towards the bed, "is very low to-day, But there, little one, one hundred and two is a powerful age. Holy Mother! Yes, 'tis a powerful age for a man, but he fought with the great Emperor too. Mon Dieu! he fought with the great Emperor."

The lips of the weird figure on the bed twisted themselves together as if to speak, otherwise the old man's form betrayed no existence.

"—— Emperor; The flag!" came a husky whisper at length, which to the English boy sounded like a whisper from a tomb.

"The flag! The flag!"

The last two words died away in a faint whistling moan. Madame Villette nodded comprehensively.

"Aye!" she muttered, "the flag, the flag, 'tis ever 'the flag, the flag.' He has been like that all day. 'The flag, the flag.' He can't die," she continued solemnly, "till he finds the flag. I always tell Jeanette so, but she merely shrugs her shoulders and laughs, and says he will die when his time comes, flag or no flag. Ah! 'tis ever the way of the young, to laugh at their elders. But you'll see, little boy, you'll see he will never die, till he holds the flag in his hand once more."

Often had Howard sat in the long, low kitchen, of an evening, and listened to the story of the lost flag.

Jeanette, Madame's middle-aged daughter, who looked after the farm, and took in English boarders during the summer months, had told him all about it many times.

How, at Waterloo, when the tide of victory was ebbing away, at last, from the feet of the great Emperor, the brave French soldiers threw themselves aga n and again against the grim British squares, only to be beaten back, vainly, or to die gloriously.

And none had fought more bravely than Grandfather's old regiment, the 10th Chasseurs.

Again and again had they hurled themselves right on to the British bayonets—and their brave horses fell like ripe corn before the sickle, till, at last, but a mere handful was left of the flower of the French Cavalry.

And then, with quickening breath, Jeanette would tell him how Grandfather, with the flag of the regiment in his hand, had rallied what was left, for the last great charge.

But ah! Mon Dieu! they all died in a heap before the Brit sh guns—all except Grandfather, who, although pinned down under his horse, still held the flag, and fought on, till the stock of a British musket laid him low. And the Emperor who loved a gallant action, even in the hour of his downfall, had said it was as brave a deed as he had ever seen, and said the wounded Chasseur should have a Captain's rank when the fortunes of war turned in France's favour once more.

That was why his soldiers were always ready to die for the Emperor—he spared none, but he never forgot those who served him well. But Napoleon, as everybody knows, died far away from France, and when Grandfather recovered from the blow which the British soldier had given him, he had lost all memory for anything but the captured flag.

Of course Jeanette was not born then, but Madame, her mother, was never tired of telling the story! How they had brought him back to the old farmhouse, and sat him in the gre t chimney nook, where he cried like a little child, all through the warm summer days for the flag he had lost.

And so it had been throughout all those weary long years, till he took to his bed, where he did not cry quite so often

But it was all so sad—so very, very sad.

And then Jeanette, with the big tears standing in her eyes, would suddenly quiet down, ashamed that her enthusiasm should have outweighed her religious principles.

"Ah! but war is such a cruel thing," she would wind up, "and there is no more bad blood between the French and the British now. We are friends! Pray to the Holy Mother, petite, that we may always remain friends, for war is such a cruel thing, Mon Dieu! such a cruel thing."

And to-day as the English boy stood in the room with the great four-post bed in the corner, he thought of the story Jeanette had so often told—of Grandfather and the lost flag. And, as if in echo to his thoughts, the shrivelled up lips which had fallen back into the toothless mouth once more whispered like the echo from the world of dead things "The flag! The flag!"

The pitiful cry brought the tears into the boy's eyes.

Grandfather wanted a flag so badly. Why couldn't they have given him one—any sort would do—surely he was too old and feeble to discern the difference, and perhaps it would calm the awful yearning, which pierced the sensitive boy's heart like a knife.

Any kind of flag, would—

Then an idea suddenly flashed across the boy's mind—something, he wondered why, had never occurred to him before.

Flags!

Why, there were two or three in the old chest which his mother had brought away from Rome, when Uncle Herbert died.

Uncle Herbert had been an antiquarian and had spent his time an l money in searching Europe for relics of the past, till a length, one day at Rome, he, himself, had been relegated to the regions of the past tense, by an attack of typhoid.

The iron-bound chest had constituted his mother's share in the eccentric old man's will.

Relics, however, exercised no attraction for her, but a question of sentiment towards the testator constrained her to keep the old trunk, and so it had accompanied them as far as France on their way back to England.

"Grandfather wanted a flag so badly, and perhaps," thought Howard, "he would rest and go to sleep, if he were given one of the old ragged banners in Uncle Herbert's chest.

"He could 'make believe' it was really the lost flag, and the result would be just the same."

Thoroughly imbued with the idea, Howard, without a word to Madame Villette, crept out of the room, and hurried towards the room where the worm-eaten chest lay in company with the other luggage.

It stood in a corner and as usual, was unlocked.

Inside were piled up all sorts of odds and ends—drinking cups of battered metal—fantastic looking, brass-mounted firearms and Italian daggers with many a grim and silent story hanging on their rusty blades.

With feverish haste, the boy removed the heterogeneous mass that lay on top and after much tugging arrived at what he sought.

They lay almost at the bottom.

Three old standards, frayed and torn and more than half-eaten away with mildew—mere bits of rags adhering to broken hafts.

One of them had once been a tricolor.

There were three scraps of red, white, and blue, still clinging to the worm-eaten pole, and on top was the one-time golden eagle of France.

Howard held it in his hand wonderingly.

It was a flag, such as this, that Grandfather had fought for so bravely, and would willingly have given up his life to save.

Just three scraps of colour and a golden eagle, why——

Then suddenly the boy's soliloquy stopped, as his eyes caught sight of some words roughly cut on the handle.

They were in English.

"Flag of the 10th Chasseurs," taken at Waterloo,

Evidently there had been a name of some sort originally attached, presumably that of the British soldier who had captured the flag, but the wood was grievously battered and worn, the above words alone being decipherable.

But to the shrewd little English school-boy their meaning was at once perfectly obvious.

This time-worn relic, which he held in his hand, was really Grandfather's "lost flag!"

In his wanderings, Uncle Herbert had picked it up somewhere, and now by a strange twist of Fate which oftentimes evinces more method than we nineteenth century sceptics are willing to conceive, it had come back to the man whose life had been one long wait, for that which he had lost.

"The lost flag of the 10th Chasseurs!"

Madame Villette was quite right, after all. She had said Grandfather would never rest till the flag had been found again.

And now that it had been found, he must have it, at once.

Thrilling with excitement the boy hurried back to the white bedroom.

Except for the drowsy ticking of the clock on the mantelpiece, the room was quite still.

Madame Villette, tired of saying her rosary, had fallen asleep.

The form on the bed lay immovable, but the wrinkled eyelids moved slightly on the boy's entrance.

"The flag! The flag!" came the whistling moan, once more, through the parchment-like lips.

"Here, M'sieu," said the English boy, softly, as he stepped forward. "Here!" and he laid it on the bed.

Then Howard saw what he had never seen before, the great black eyes of Grandfather, wide open.

For a moment they remained fixed on the battered flag, then the claw-like hand crept forward tremblingly, and grasped it.

The old man held it against his breast tightly for some moments, muttering:

"The flag, the flag—at last!"

His weird eyes frightened the boy, and the latter glanced round apprehensively in a vague desire for assistance.

But the streak of sunlight still lay on the floor, and Madame slept on peacefully.

With a long-drawn sigh of satisfaction Grandfather essayed to raise himself in the bed.

His great black eyes wandered round the room and fixed themselves for a moment on the boy, who shrank back in horror, then they wandered towards the window.

"There—there," he cried, quite clearly, "there is the Emperor, and—and the horses. See—see the swords glistening, and the horses prancing as they form up for the last charge. They only await the flag and—me. And now I am going—going. Hark! to the galloping hoofs. Ah! my comrades the Chasseurs, I join you—I join you—Vive—Vive—l'Empereur!"

* * * * *

The slant of sunlight still lay on the floor, as Madame Villette awoke, mumbling drowsily.

Jeanette was placing a big wooden crucifix between two lighted candles that stood by the bedside. Over by the door-way the little English boy stood, crying softly.

But Grandfather had joined the Emperor.

"I must go now, dear. Dear old dad will be tired of waiting for me in the trap—but I feel that I can't leave you."

It was a simple leave-taking between boy and girl lovers; it might have made a superficial observer smile, but it was intensely real to those two.

She had waited for him in the little flower garden at the back of the house—the little garden in which they had played as children and had plighted their troth; he had walked straight through the house to the spot where he knew he would find her, and, standing by the rustic seat, tightly clasped in a fond embrace, they had tried to say good-bye.

All the words of comfort, encouragement and anticipation of future happiness which each one had been trying to utter, failed completely, and they could only stand together, silent and vaguely trying to keep back the tears which would come to their eyes and obscure the last look of the loved one.

Good-bye! The hateful word would not come; it was replaced by a kiss, a long, passionate kiss, and then Bert left her and ran through the house without saying farewell to her mother, and half groped his way into the trap which was to take him to the station, whence he would journey to the far-off city. And Jenny sank on the seat in the garden and wept as if her heart would break.

Herbert Jordan and Jenny Bruce had loved each other almost from babyhood; as children they had been almost inseparable, and the neighbours had jestingly called them man and wife so often that it had come to be commonly understood that they were destined for each other. Herbert was always Jenny's champion, and it was quite natural that, as they approached maturity, the stronger passion should take the place of childish affection.

There was no doubt that the two young people loved with the whole force of their being; the prospective union had not been pleasing to Herbert's father, but he recognised the depth of this love and had yielded to what he considered the inevitable.

Bert had surprised and gratified his father by developing a taste for study. In that little out-of-the-way village, six miles from a railway station, isolated by bad roads and so much apart from the outer world that it seemed to be forgotten, it was difficult to progress beyond the education of the village school; but the carpenter enlisted the services of the school-master on behalf of his son, and, as the boy was one of the few who can learn from books quite as well as from a master, books were obtained for him.

The boy showed a liking for such subjects as might come under the head of "doctoring," and when Mr. Jordan discovered this, he determined to scrape every penny in order that his son might become a member of the medical profession.

The idea pleased the boy himself; he pictured the time when he would establish himself as a doctor, in a neighbouring village—it must be a neighbouring village for his native place was so inaccessible—and Jenny would be "the doctor's wife." How delighted the young people were at the thought.

Jenny was just as enthusiastic as Bert himself, and listened to his plans and to his long talks on the subjects of his studies with as much pleasure as if she understood all about them, instead of not being able to comprehend more than a mere fragment here and there.

And when she was "the doctor's wife" she would help him—oh! how she would help him! She did not exactly know in what way she could be of service, but that was a detail which she did not stop to consider.

Her mother should give up the little shop which she had kept on since the father's death, and Mr. Jordan would give up his small carpenter's business and "dealing," and they would all live together in "the doctor's house."

And now Bert had gone away to be coached for the Arts examination, which he was sure to pass; and then he would enter as a medical student and in five years he would be a qualified practitioner!

He would have to live very quietly and study hard, for his father could only send him just enough money to keep him going. It was rather rough on dad, but it would all be paid back when Herbert came home with M.R.C.S. or L.R.C.P., or both, at the end of his name.

Bertie Jordan sat in his modest den with his forehead puckered into a decided frown. On the table in front of him lay an open letter at which he had been staring for several minutes.

Four and a half years had passed since he had left home, and all had gone well with his plans. He was beginning his fifth year as a medical student, and as a result of capability and hard work, he had earned a reputation among his fellow students and his teachers, who regarded him as a man who would "do something" in the future.

He had not been home during the whole of that time; the return journey cost a fair amount, and the plain truth was that he could not afford it.

He had regularly received the stated allowance from his father, but that was all too small for a medical student. Had he not been lucky enough to do a good turn to a fellow student, he might have been forced to give up, as a poor medical student does not have a very pleasant time. But it certainly had been a lucky day for him when he fished Harry Baynes out of the river; the Baynes were well-to-do and Bert Jordan had been introduced into circles which he had at one time regarded as unattainable.

Harry always insisted upon paying when they were out together, and this enabled Bert to make a better appearance than he could otherwise have done.

The letter in front of him vexed him; he felt angry, yet—Why did she write to him like that? If she had the much-lauded woman's wit she would have guessed; Gracie Baynes and the other girls he met so often would certainly have guessed and would have not found it necessary to write and ask. Could Jenny not understand that things were different now, without forcing him to tell her so?

He took up the letter and read one paragraph again, although he knew it by heart.

"Bertie dear, why do you not write more often? Your letters have been longer and longer between, and it is now three months, three months, since I had a word from you. I look for a letter every morning, and every day I am disappointed. Letters seem to come for everybody but me. Then I thought that you were waiting for my birthday, but yesterday went by and there was no letter, and this morning again there is none. Bertie dear, are you ill? Do write and tell me."

There were traces of tears on the paper, and the writing was less firm than usual. Bertie shifted uneasily on his chair and became more angry.

"Any sensible girl would understand what was meant when a fellow didn't write, but Jenny is so simple, so——" He was about to say "so loving and trustful," but he crushed the words back.

For a brief space his mind went back to the old home, to the flower garden, the rustic seat and the leave-taking. He thought of the faithful friend of his childhood and early youth, the sweetheart of later days who had encouraged him and urged him on—the gentle, loving girl, so good. Good! Yes, that simple word summed up her whole character.

The look of vexation, which had disappeared for a moment, came back to Jordan's face in an intensified form. He strode about the room with his hands in his pockets and his head bent,

"That's all very well," he muttered savagely, "but things are different. We are not in the least fitted for each other now, and she ought to be able to see that. How on earth can she expect me to give up the chance of marrying Grace or one of the other girls, when marriage with any one of them would make me for life? She doesn't know anything about it, I admit, but as I have said, she ought to guess."

He went back to his table, unlocked a drawer and took a photo from it. It was a picture of Jenny, sent by her twelve months previously.

It was not a pretty face, and the style of dress and the mode of doing up the hair were decidedly "countrified," but it would not have been difficult to picture the original as a healthy, lovable woman who would give her life in the service of the man she loved. Even in the inanimate photograph there was something about the face which proved how devoted the woman would be. The sight of the photograph occasioned a momentary struggle within the man who was gazing at it.

"She is a dear little girl and would make a sweet wife. The portrait doesn't show you the tender expression in those soft eyes; it doesn't convey any notion of the kiss those lips can give or the way that girl can make you sit up and feel ashamed of yourself with just an expression when you have done anything not quite in order, or how she can stiffen you when your courage is drooping and make you feel that you could get through any difficulty."

He held the photograph at arms length, and between it and his eyes there came the vision of "the girls" he met at the parties given by the Baynes.

"Yes, it's the plain truth; she's gawkish. There's no getting away from it. We are not in the least fitted for one another now; she would be just out of it as my wife and would be as unhappy as she once thought she would be happy. She isn't a patch on any of the others, and I mustn't allow sentiment to interfere. We thought we were fond of each other, but that was only boy and girl love. People soon get over that sort of thing; I have, and so will she—if she hasn't already. She is lonely in that shop now her mother is dead, and that's what makes her look for a letter; it isn't love. Yes that's it. She ought to marry and have a man to look after the little business. I'll write to-night and explain it to her. Let me see. This is Thursday evening, so she won't get the letter till Saturday morning; but I'll write at once and get it over."

"It's all right!" he heard a voice say downstairs. "I know the way and it's only me!"

It was the voice of Harry Baynes and he was evidently mounting the stairs two and three at a time. Bert seized the letter and crumpled the missive and photograph into his left hand and crammed them into his pocket just as his friend made an unceremonious entry.

Young Baynes only stayed about three minutes, merely long enough to make an arrangement for the following evening. After his departure Bert sat down resolutely at his table and wrote the letter.

Saturday morning was usually a busy time at the little shop of which Jenny Bruce was now proprietress, and several customers were surprised that Jenny was not to be seen. After knocking on the counter three or four times, each one went away with the intention of calling again later. And while they were thus waiting for Jenny, she was lying unconscious near the little rustic seat in the garden, her right hand tightly clutching a letter—a letter which which had caused her the greatest joy when it was handed to her, for the address was in a handwriting which she had longed for three months to see.

It was a lovely afternoon, eighteen months later, when Herbert Jordan alighted from the train at the little country railway station and set out on a six-mile walk to his native village. He preferred to walk, and for the same reason—that his home coming should be as little observed as possible—he had not told his father by which train he should come.

Everything looked much the same as it had six years before; there had been very little change here, but what an alteration had taken place in his own life! He had passed his examinations with honours, he was about to fill the position of assistant to a medical gentleman of repute—thanks to the good offices of his friend and the elder Mr. Baynes—and it was tacitly understood that he was to marry Grace Baynes in due course, although the formal engagement had not been announced.

His father was taking tea when Bert entered, and the greeting between father and son was hearty and affecting. Old Jordan made his boy sit down without ado at the table to partake of refreshments.

"I had two cups and saucers, and plates set o' purpose, boy," said the old man, as he dumped two thick slices of bread and butter on the plate and swashed some tea into the cup. "There! You ain't had a tea like that since ye left home, I'll warrant! They don't give you good stuff like that in towns and cities, I know. Now you just go on with your tea, and you can tell me all about yourself while you're eating and drinking."

Herbert laughed heartily, and did as his father wished; he was hungry and thirsty, and able to dispose of the good stuff without difficulty.

By the time they had finished the meal, Herbert had given his father an outline of what he had done and what he proposed and hoped to do.

"Did ye see any of the people as ye came along?" asked Mr. Jordan after a pause.

His manner indicated that he wished to lead up to some subject and Herbert guessed what it was.

"I saw three of our people, dad," he answered, "but I fancy they did not recognise me. How is Jenny Bruce?" he asked, boldly.

Old Jordan started; he had reached the desired subject more quickly than he had expected.

"She's mortal bad," he returned with a shake of the head and dropping his eyes. "The work of that shop is a great deal too hard for her. She began to droop like, a matter o' two years or so ago, and after a few months she drooped still more. Fretting and the hard work have done it, I think."

"Is she very ill?"

"Yes, my boy, she is," said the old man solemnly. "The doctor told me this morning she wouldn't live only a few hours."

"I knew the work was too hard for her," said Herbert uneasily. "She ought to have married one of these young fellows, and I told her so."

"Yes, my boy," half muttered Jordan. "I know you did. She showed me your letter. She didn't want to, but I guessed as something had gone wrong and I managed to make her let me have sight of it. Bertie, you made a mistake!"

"What do you mean, dad?" demanded Herbert, much disturbed by his father's tone. There was something between his father and Jenny which he could not understand. "Phew! It's stifling here, come to the door."

"I'll ask ye to excuse me, Bertie. My leg is rather bad to-day."

"Your leg? What is the matter with it?"

"I had an accident nigh on three years ago, my boy, and I ain't been much good since. Only just been able to tiffle about just enough to keep myself going. I—oh!" Jordan stopped short, as if he had said more than he intended.

"Accident! Only been able to earn enough to keep yourself!" Herbert's face grew livid as he spoke; he stared at his father for a few seconds, but the old man kept his eyes on the ground, while his cheeks flushed. "Father!" gasped Herbert in a hoarse voice. "How did you get the money that you sent me—the money that has enabled me to reach my present position? You never said anything to me! Where did it come from if you could not earn it?"

"Jenny gave it to me!"

Herbert reeled and sank into the chair opposite to his father's.

"She wouldn't let me tell you; and even when you threw her over, she kept on giving it me, so as you might have your wish. She said that when a woman loved a man as she loved you, she loved him always and would give her very life to help him. Oh! Bertie, I think she has done it! She might have given up the shop and earned her own living easily, but she braved all the hard work—for you!"

The two watchers by the side of the dying woman raised their hands warningly as a man pushed open the door and entered the room.

The noise was but slight, yet Jenny heard it and turned her eyes in that direction. Immediately a joyous expression came into them, a smile appeared on her lips and she half raised her hands in welcome; then the thin arms dropped helplessly, but the joyful expression remained in the eyes and the smile still hovered on her lips.

The rays of the setting sun fell on a motionless figure on the bed and on the weeping man kneeling by the bedside, while the two watchers looked on stolidly at a scene whose inner meaning was hidden from them.

SUMMARY.

Major Wyvenhoe leaves England on the Campanella with a detachment of troops, raised by Major Barnish, to help the Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty. Major Barnish is accompanied on the vessel by his wife. At Cork a detachment of Irishmen is taken on board together with General Molyneux, who is connected with the Venezuelan Army, his secretary and chaplain. When the vessel has been out a few days Major Barnish meets with a fatal accident, and on that same day a mutiny breaks out among the troops, but it is speedily quelled.

Shortly after this Venezuela is reached, and as Captain Cautley does not know the coast well a pilot has to be obtained, and it is found that Conroy, one of the chief mutineers, is able to act as such, and the course of the ship is intrusted to him.

Just before reaching Pampatar the Santa Marta, a Spanish sloop, is captured after a sharp skirmish, and put in the charge of a prize crew. On arrival at Pampatar Major Wyvenhoe and Captain Cautley are received by the Governor, General Arismendez, and his second in command, General Urdenetta. A banquet takes place in the evening, at which all the British officers are present, and when they return to the Campanella they find that the Santa Marta, which was anchored close by, has gone.

CHAPTER VII.

Arismendez' Story.

We spent a long time and a great deal of energy in cruising where the sloop had been in the hope of discovering where she was, as well as making excursions in various directions on the off chance of her having, for some inscrutable reason, shifted her anchorage. Then realising that it was all in vain, that she was gone beyond recovery, we returned sobered and disconsolate, to the Campanella.

Cautley raged like a whirlwind.

"This comes of humanity, of sparing life, and doing people a good turn," he exclaimed bitterly. "I gave them the boats and they have taken the ship, after mastering the crew and, I have no doubt, cutting all their throats. Fifteen good men and true gone to their last account, and all my fault. Did anybody ever hear of treachery so base? The poor fellows, knowing that I had given the Spaniards leave to go would be off their guard; most of them, I daresay, were below, and half the anchor watch asleep. They would be easily surprised. And yet Don Tadeo spoke of his gratitude, and protested that if opportunity offered, he would behave to us as we behaved to him. I know one thing; if ever I have the chance, I shall behave to him as he has behaved to me, and the next time I hear of a Spaniard talk about gratitude, I shall know that he means treachery. We should have sent half a company of your soldiers to stand by until the Spaniards were out of the ship. My mind misgave me when the governor insisted on us all going to the banquet. It was not wise to leave the brig in sole charge of the boatswain, and the sloop in sole charge of a quartermaster. It is worse than if we had never taken her; instead of gaining distinction we have made ourselves a laughing stock. And what will General Arismendez say?"

I sympathised with the skipper in his anger against Don Tadeo, since though it is quite legitimate for prisoners to retake a captured ship if they can, no man of honour would have taken advantage of such an opportunity as we had foolishly placed at his disposal. But this fact did not acquit us of blame, and Cautley, as being more especially responsible for the sloop's safety, felt the humiliation more keenly than anybody else, and I was very sorry for him.

When we went on board the Campanella he told the astonished boatswain what had happened, and rated him roundly for his carelessness in not missing the ship.

"When did her lights go out?" he asked him.

The boatswain could not tell, and on further inquiry it turned out that he had been too much occupied otherwise to take notice of the Santa Marta.

While the officers had been feasting ashore, the men had been drinking on board, and got quite beyond the poor fellow's control. When he remonstrated they laughed, and when he knocked one or two of them down the others threatened to throw him overboard, and altogether he had a very rough time.

The skipper wanted to know where the men got their drink.

"From a shore boat that came alongside and sold them as much rum as they liked, which was a good deal," answered the boatswain.

"When was that?"

"About an hour after you left and a bit before Conroy went away—in another boat."

"Where did he go?"

"He said he was going ashore."

"And has he returned?"

"No, sir."

The skipper and I exchanged glances.

"I know what you are thinking," he said, taking me aside. "You are thinking, as I think, that Conroy is the prime mover in this affair. He is much more likely to have conceived and carried it out than that stupid, stuck-up Don.

Digitized by Google

My fault again. I made an enemy of him and he wanted his revenge."

"Don't be absurd, my dear fellow," quoth I. "Revenge may have been one of Conroy's motives, but you may be sure that he has joined the Spaniards in order to better himself, and would have done so even if you had given him a berth. When he heard that we were gone and that the Spaniards were going he saw his opportunity, went straight to the Don, offered his services, made his proposals, and no doubt stipulated for a handsome reward."

"Very likely for a command. Well, if we meet let him look out, that is all," said the skipper savagely. "My goodness, when I think of Don Tadeo's treachery and those poor fellows slaughtered like sheep I feel as if I could hang every Spaniard I meet. And there is no chance of overhauling them, was not from the first. The run is only twenty miles, and as the sloop sails well and the wind is fair half-an-hour's start was all they needed. They had two or three hours, and by this time are probably under the guns of Fort Arroya. It is a grievous disappointment and humiliation, and I shall never forgive myself, but there is no use crying over spilt milk. Let us say no more about it, only you will have to tell Arismendez. I cannot, my Spanish is not good enough."

Which was quite true and a very good reason for making his report through an interpreter, but not for imposing a disagreeable duty on me, as I told him, proposing at the same time that we should see the Governor together. To this Cautley agreed, though with evident reluctance, for though never backward to blame himself he could not bear to be blamed by anybody else.

So early next morning we went to Government House and informed General Arismendez of the sloop's escape and the way in which, as we thought, it had been effected. He neither found fault nor seemed surprised, though he smiled one of his grimmest smiles.

"You don't know the Spaniards as I know them," he said. "If you had told me what you were about I should have put you on your guard. Of course they have killed all your men. They are cruel by nature and return evil for good on principle. I am sorry the ship is lost, she would have been very useful, but as she has not been formally taken into our navy there will be no need for an inquiry. Misfortunes will happen sometimes, only I hope you won't give quarter any more. If you had either killed Don Tadeo and his men, or let me deal with them, you would have had nothing to reproach yourselves with."

"I beg your pardon, Señor General, but as we promised them their lives we should have had a great deal to reproach ourselves with," I returned. "I am sorry the sloop is lost, but we would rather lose ten sloops, Captain Cautley and I, and our lives, to boot, than break our pledged word."

"You are men of honour, and keep your word. I am a man of honour and have sworn that every Spaniard who falls into my hands shall die. That vow has been kept; even when the life of one dearer to me than my own was at stake I refused to break it. I am half Indian in blood and South American born. Think of the hundreds of thousands of my ancestors whom in past times they reduced to slavery and put to death. But it is not for their forefathers' sins that I give them no quarter, it is for what they have done since this war began, for what they are doing now. From the first they refused to exchange prisoners, and slaughtered with indiscriminate ferocity not only male non-combatants but women and children. See!"

General Arismendez took from his cabinet a newspaper and a letter.

"Read this passage," he said. "It occurs in a dispatch from a royalist general to the King, and is of frequent occurrence, with slight variations, in royalist dispatches."

The passage ran thus:

"The pueblo (village) of Pillar, with all its inhabitants, has disappeared from the face of the earth."

"This letter," continued the general, "was intercepted by Captain Chitty, a countryman of yours, who holds a command in our navy. As you see, it is addressed to King Ferdinand by General Morillo, and tells of the taking of Santa-Fé-de-Bogota. I would call your particular attention to this paragraph: 'Every person of either sex who could read and write was put to death. By thus cutting off all who were in any way educated I hoped to suppress the spirit of revolution.'

"And the massacres were carried out with every refinement of cruelty, some of the victims were shot, others hanged, husbands were put to death in the presence of their wives, wives in the presence of their husbands, young girls and boys, even little children, in the presence of their parents. Many of the gibbets on which the bodies were chained together in clusters are still standing and if you go to Santa Fé you may see them. It was then that we proclaimed guerra a la muerta (war to the death) and adopted the black flag as its emblem, under which we have since fought and under which you will fight."

"It means no quarter?"

"Yes, that which our enemies refuse to us, we refuse to them. And I think, Major Wyvenhoe, you will admit that we cannot, if we would, do otherwise, and that we are fully justified by the laws of war. The republic is poor, we have not the means of maintaining all the prisoners who come into our hands, and to release them would be equivalent to recruiting for our enemies. Besides, was it not returning good for evil?"

This, as a general proposition was undeniable, and I had no difficulty in agreeing with it, but being unable to approve of reprisal, yet not caring to argue the question with my superior officer and my host I evaded it by inquiring whether his remark that he had kept his vow, even when the life of one dearer to him than his own was at stake, had been suggested by some recent incident.

"Well, it occurred two years ago, if you call that recent,' and if you would like to hear and will give me your attention a few minutes I will tell you the story."

On which I thanked the general for his courtesy and said that Cautley and myself would very much like to hear the story.

"Good! You shall hear it. But first of all I must tell you that two years ago General Morillo landed here with 17,000 of the best troops of Spain, not a Creole amongst them, fortified the heights of Pampatar and prepared to attack Juan Griego, the possession of which would make him master of Margarita. But the only way thither, over the otherwise impassable mountains which stretch right across the island, is a rough road, made by the natives, which at its highest point runs through a gorge and crosses a torrent by a draw-bridge so narrow that it can be traversed only in single file.

"At the time of the invasion we had no organised force and only three hundred muskets. But we seized the bridge and withstood every attempt made by Morillo to dislodge us. Again and again we drove the invaders back with heavy loss. We got arms from the Main, recruits came in almost daily, and after a while I was able to take the offensive.

"Meanwhile, Morillo avenged his failures by wholesale slaughter. Everybody suspected of sympathising with the patriots was put to death, their bodies gibbeted, or their severed limbs impaled on stakes and nailed on trees.

"The officer most conspicuous in this work was Colonel Gomez, of General Morillo's staff, and I swore that he should not leave the island alive.

"But instead of helping the Spaniards these horrors kindled so fierce a spirit of resistance that we were joined by nearly every man in the island. Even women, maddened by the cruel deaths of those dear to them, fought in our ranks, and were often our keenest and most trustworthy scouts.

"Morillo's army melted away. Hardly a day passed on which we did not surprise and destroy an escort, a picket, or a detachment. There are only a few places in the island where cavalry can be used or infantry deployed, places which, of course, we avoided. And the European troops proved much less formidable than you might think. They were not acclimatised, they died of dysentery and black vomit, they lost their way and got entangled among the prickly-pear trees, we let them have no rest by day, and the zancudos and other insect pests let them have no rest by night, and so, little by little, we got the upper hand.

"And then, when all seemed to be going on well, I had a great misfortune. My wife, while bathing in a secluded pool, was surprised and carried off by Spaniards. When I heard of it I was wild with grief and rage, and took immediate measures either to rescue her, if she were still alive, or avenge her if she had been put to death, as I feared was only too likely.

"Calling as many of my men together as were in the neighbourhood I followed up the Spaniards and attacked their rearguard, without, however, rescuing my wife, who had been taken to General Morillo's headquarters. But we took nearly two hundred prisoners, and, greatest prize of all, Colonel Gomez.

"All but him had been disposed of when a boy prisoner—flags of truce were respected on neither side—brought a letter from General Morillo offering to exchange my wife for the Colonel, to which I replied that dear to me as was my wife my country was still dearer, and that before the bearer of my answer set out on his return the monster whose hands had been so often imbued in innocent blood would be dead. Then, in presence of the messenger, my son Ramon, with a single stroke of his machete, severed the Colonel's head from his body.

"'Now go and tell General Morillo what you have seen,' I told the messenger, and he went."

"And what became of poor Señora Arismendez?" I asked.

"On receiving my message Morillo gave orders for her to be put to death, but when she was brought out for execution some of his officers, moved by her tears and her condition, for she was in delicate health, interceded for her, and she was sent to Cadiz and there imprisoned; but, after a few days detention, she escaped by the connivance of friends, and, disguised as a seaman, took passage in a merchant ship bound for the West Indies, which somewhere about the Azores was captured by a Venezuelan privateer. When her captain knew whom he had rescued he made for Margarita, and not long afterwards landed Señora Arismendez at Pampatar, to my unspeakable surprise and joy."

"A strange story yet true," observed General Urdenetta, who, together with another caballero much younger than himself, had entered the room while the Governor was telling his tale. "You will admire our friend's iron resolution and inflexible patriotism as greatly as I do, though I shall never be able to emulate his example. If I had to choose between killing a Spaniard and losing my wife I am afraid I should be weak enough to prefer my wife."

This was said more lightly and with a pleasant smile, yet to me it seemed more like a sneer than a compliment. But Arismendez pretended to take it as a compliment, saying that he felt sure that the Señor General would act as he had acted, and was as devoted to their common country as himself, and then introduced the young subaltern as his son Ramon, with whom we shook hands, though it went against the grain.

"It was you who killed Colonel Gomez?" I asked.

"I had that honour, señor," he answered proudly.

"Captain Ramon is one of our most promising young officers and a brilliant swordsman," put in Urdeneta with his courtly smile. "I suppose he has made more Spaniards shorter by the head than any other man in Margarita. Hasta ahora, señores, (until we meet again, gentlemen.)" And after making a bow which included us all the general went his way.

"Why won't you let me kill him, father?" demanded Ramon passionately.

"Kill Urdenetta! Why, I should like to know?"

"Why? Don't you see that he is laughing at us? I cannot abide his smooth tongue and treacherous smile. He is as false as Satan and will do us an ill turn if he can."

"I should be sorry to think so, Ramon, and it would be going rather far to kill a man because you don't like his smile. There may be many people who don't like your smile, or mine. Kill as many Spaniards as you like, but I will have no killing of patriots. Moreover, raising your hand against your general would be mutiny, and (sternly) you know how I punish mutineers."

On this the young fellow rose from his chair and saluted, and then, muttering what sounded like a fierce imprecation, quitted the room.

"Ramon is a brave soldier and a devoted patriot, but rather hot-tempered as you see, and he does not like Urdenetta. Neither, to tell the truth, do I; but for various reasons it would be impolitic to quarrel with him," observed the Governor, and then, after arranging for disembarking the troops, we took our leave.

"I don't know what your opinion may be, but it strikes me that we have got into very queer company," quoth Cautley, when we were outside. "Are they all ruffians, do you think?"

"Gad, it almost seems so and a good match for the Spaniards; but we have been too short a time in the country to pass judgment."

"True, and, do you know, I rather like Arismendez, though he did have that colonel's head chopped off instead of exchanging him for his wife. There is no nonsense about the old fellow; he is straightforward, and according to his lights a man of honour. Anyhow, he is a better sort than Urdenetta."

"I quite agree with you. Unless I am greatly mistaken, Urdenetta is a sneak, and I daresay quite as cruel as the Governor; and it is hardly fair to judge these people by European standards. What can you expect from half-educated men like Arismendez—Spanish with a touch of the tar-brush on one side and of Indian on the other—brutalised by Spanish rule, and provoked to ferocious reprisals by wholesale slaughter. For that the royalists refuse quarter to the patriots there can be no question. Don Tadeo admitted it, and then that letter and those dispatches, I am sure they are genuine. They square with what we heard before we started, though I could not believe it, and there was a good deal in Arismendez' remark that war is not returning good for evil."

"For all that, two wrongs don't make one right, and I know of nothing more wrong than killing in cold blood men whose only offence is doing their duty, and who plead for mercy."

"Oh, I am not going to defend the practice, only before we condemn people we should try to put ourselves in their place. I don't know how it feels to be a Venezuelan rebel, but I am afraid that if the French were to invade England, give no quarter and slaughter women and children, such of them as fell into our hands would not receive mercy."

"I am sure they would not, and quite right, too," returned the skipper with amusing inconsistency, but his heart was ever sounder that his logic. "All the same I shall neither refuse quarter nor kill nor order prisoners to be killed, let the consequences be what they may."

"Neither shall I, rather will I resign my commission, or, if it should come to that, lose my life."

"But it cannot come to that."

"I am not so sure. Suppose that I, being ordered to take command of a firing party and shoot a batch of prisoners, were to refuse, as I certainly should, what would happen? These 'patriots' don't seem to stand on much ceremony and I doubt whether they have more than one punishment either for mutiny or disobedience. You heard the Governor threaten his son with death if he meddled with Urdenetta. At any rate I did."

"Hadn't we better throw it up then? Though I should be very sorry, for I think we are in for a stirring time, hard knocks and lots of prize-money."

Miss Sidonia sat with me under the verandah.

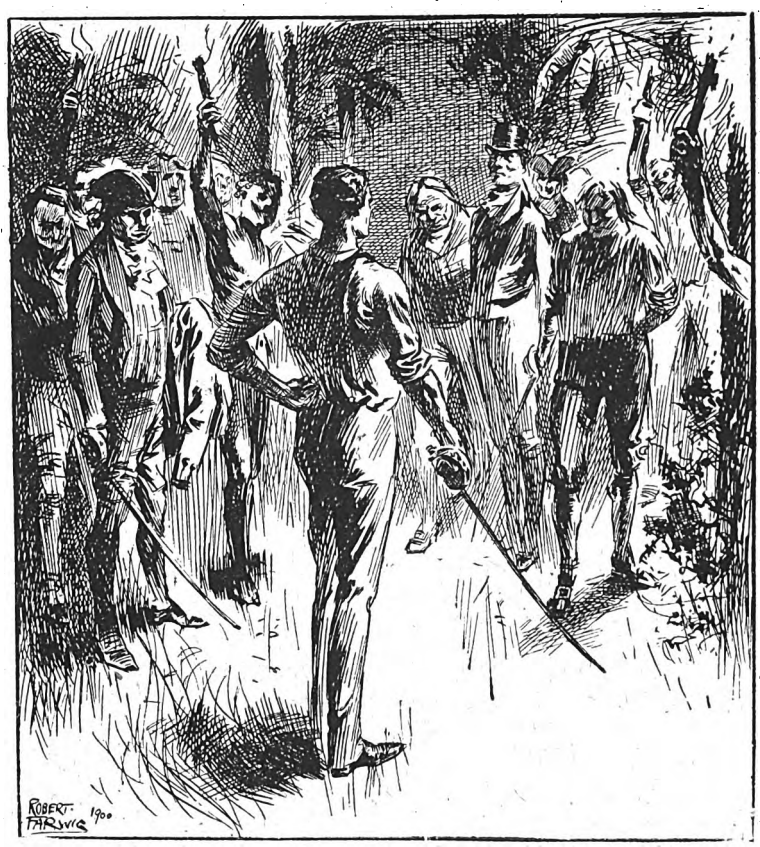
"It is too soon to talk about throwing it up. I must see more of the country and the people, and something of the war, before I do anything of that sort. It will be time enough to act when the occasion arises, I daresay we shall pull through, and if we don't, there will be an end, and nobody can live for ever. Were soldiering free from hazard it would be as tame as rabbit shooting."



The fight was just beginning when General Arismendez broke into the ring.

"All the same, I mean to live as long as I can," said Cautley laughing. "But it is time we went aboard. Everything is ready for landing the troops, and the sooner they are ashore the better I shall be pleased. Rations are getting scarce and the ship needs a thorough overhauling. What sort of quarters are these people giving you?"

"Poor, but as they are the best they have we must e'en be content."

While the men were being landed I made several trips between the ship and the shore, and as the last batch was being dispatched and the skipper and I were pacing the quarter-deck, we espied a small, single-masted boat coming from the south and, as might seem, making for Pampatar.

"What sort of a craft is that?" I asked him.

"A launch as sure as I am a sinner," he exclaimed after inspecting her through his glass. "A launch on the larboard tack. Now they are putting her on the starboard tack, coming this way beyond a doubt. What the dickens can it mean?"

"It means that they have business in Margarita, I suppose."

"Bah! Don't I tell you she is a launch?"

"You did, though I fail to see what difference it makes, a boat's a boat for all that."

"And a launch is a man-of-war's boat, and if that launch has not belonged or does not belong to a Spanish man-of-war, I never saw one."

"But the Spaniards would not dare——"

"To try to cut us out you mean. Of course they would not; anyhow with one boat. But what can those fellows be after, they come on as though they had nothing to fear, and there's a lot of them. I shall be able to count them in a minute and perhaps make out what they are. One, two, three, four—fifteen, and not a Spaniard amongst them. I do believe—yes, they are our own men, the poor fellows we thought we should never see again. Hurrah!" shouted the captain, waving his hat.

The cheer was repeated by all who were within hearing, taken up by the crew and answered by the men in the launch.

"Hurrah!" cried Cautley again. "I was never better pleased in my life. All there, and seemingly not much the worse. But how the dickens did they manage it I wonder! Getting away in the sloop's launch in broad daylight, I never knew the like."

A few minutes later the mystery was solved, the launch ran under our quarter, lowered her sail and made fast, and the next moment the men were on deck. The crew, frantic with delight, nearly mobbed them, shaking their hands, patting them on the back, and plying them with questions innumerable. So soon as order was restored, which took a little time, the quartermaster made his report.

It was as we had thought; the prize crew had been surprised and overpowered. Shortly after sunset Conroy came on board and had a long talk with Don Tadeo, and about nine o'clock the Spaniards began their preparations for departure, and, as might appear, were going to lower the boats when the attack was made and the Englishmen being all over the ship, unarmed, outnumbered, and taken unawares, were made prisoners to a man, fast bound and put below wondering why the Spaniards had not killed them out of hand, and expecting immediate death.

But nothing happened till dawn, when they had a visit from Don Tadeo and Conroy, who said they were free and might return to Pampatar in the sloop's launch, and that the captain spared their lives and restored them to liberty in consideration of the generosity with which Captain Cautley had treated the crew of the Santa Marta and himself.

"But this is quite an exception," added Conroy roughly, "and Don Tadeo desires me to say that if any of you are captured while fighting under the rebel flag you will be either scragged or shot without ceremony."

Then the Britishers, being freed from their bonds and going on deck, found the launch alongside and were soon under weigh for Margarita.

Before they left the ship Don Tadeo gave the quartermaster a letter which he charged him to deliver to Captain Cautley.

It ran as follows:

"Senor Capitan,—We are quits; as you treated me so I treat you. Do me the favour to present my compliments to your friend, Major Wyvenhoe, and say that I have an account to settle with him for the insulting comparison which he made between loyal cabarellos and Creole scum—and that, opportunity offering, I shall expect the satisfaction which I am sure he will not refuse.

"TADEO MOROY FALCON."

"That sounds like a challenge, the don is spoiling for a fight," said Cautley laughing.

"Well if an opportunity offers he shall not be baulked. Anyhow, Don Tadeo is a gallant gentleman and has been as good as his word."

"I suppose so; all the same, I am not quite sure about our being quits," rejoined the skipper dubiously, "for though he has surrendered the men he keeps the ship."

"You took it and he stole away with it, so you are still quits."

"And very mean of him it was to steal away with it confound him. However, the fault was mine, I should not have given him the chance. Yes, Don Tadeo has behaved well, a jolly sight better than I expected. I shall begin to think that these Spaniards are not so bad as they are painted. Hello! Here is something on the other side," said Cautley, to whom I had returned the letter after translating it. "In English, too! Just listen to this:

"Mr. Captain Cautley,—Dear sir,—It would have been worth your while to give me a berth, more so than you think. I have gone over to the Spaniards. No more of your dirty English and Irish for me. Yours to command,

"GEORGE CONROY."

"Did you ever know the like? 'Dear sir,' indeed! Hang the fellow. 'No more of your dirty English and Irish for me.' What is he, a Scot?"

"No, he calls himself a Manxman. I expect the ruffian thinks that his having gone over to the Spaniards will strike terror into us all."

"At any rate, he gives us warning, which is very kind, though on his part foolish. 'More worth while than you think,' means more than meets the eye."

"That's his bounce. What can he do? However, I am not going to be caught napping again, and if you can let fifty or sixty of your men come on board every night and remain till daylight I shall be obliged. They need not always be the same men."

"Certainly, send boats to the jetty every evening at sunset and the men shall be there."

Several days passed, occupied chiefly in drills, inspections and parades, also the contingent was formally mustered into the service of the Venezuelan Republic, but as to what we were to do or whither go I could not obtain information. General Arismendez was waiting for orders from the Government, which meant Don Simon Bolivar, the Supreme Chief, as he styled himself and liked to be called. This was tiresome, for Margarita is so dreary a place that a little of it goes a long way. The Campanella still rode at her anchor, greatly to the skipper's annoyance, who, like the rest of us, wanted to be actively employed.

Hence we heard with great satisfaction that the governor and his lady proposed to give a ball in our honour, since, though dancing is not campaigning, it is active employment and good fun, and in South America, as we presently discovered, may be very exciting and end in a fight.

The guests were numerous but rather mixed, and in all shades, from white to black and from saffron to sallow, and as uniforms were de rigueur and the ladies delighted in bright colours, the scene, albeit a little peculiar, was bright and picturesque.

Señora Arismendez, a fine handsome woman, her husband's second wife, made a capital hostess, and she and her husband introduced us to nearly every girl in the room, among others to the belle of the ball, Señorita Sidonia, a young lady of almost pure Spanish blood, with large Arab-like eyes, an oval face, and a delicate olive-tinted complexion. She was moreover tall and shapely, as graceful as a fawn, a beautiful dancer, a sprightly partner and an arrant coquette.

Ramon Arismendez was looking on when his stepmother introduced us, and I gathered from the scowl that gathered on his bull fighter's face that he was one of the señorita's victims, and regarded me as a possible rival. But Miss Sidonia only nodded to him, and laughing mischievously gave me all the dances I asked for and between whiles promenaded with me round the ball room, or sat smoking with me under the verandah. She even gave me a little cigar which she had already pressed between her coral lips, the greatest compliment a señorita can pay to a caballero.

If her intention was to provoke young Arismendez, she succeeded to admiration. I never looked at him that he did not threaten me with his eyes, and once when we met he laid his hand on my arm and in a fierce whisper said:

"If you don't discontinue your attentions to the Señorita Sidonia I will treat you as I treated Colonel Gomez."

"Not unless I am bound and unarmed, as he was. Butchering a helpless man is no proof either of courage or address," I answered and passed on, leaving Don Ramon speechless with rage.

Five minutes afterwards I was again dancing with Señorita Sidonia.

At three o'clock the ball was nearly over, most of the guests were gone and the skipper and myself were on the point of departure, when a young fellow in uniform touched me on the shoulder and said that he had come on behalf of Señor Capitan Arismendez to demand satisfaction for the insulting observation which I no doubt remembered having made to him.

"Certainly," I replied, "when and where?"

"Here—behind the house—and now."

"Good, please lead on. Come along Cautley, I am in for a duel and you will have to act as my second. I will explain afterwards."

The young fellow conducted me to a palm grove about a hundred yards from the house where we found at least a dozen men, presumably friends of Don Ramon, and nearly as many half naked negroes holding aloft blazing torches.

No time was wasted on preliminaries. Nothing had been said about weapons, but as it seemed to be taken for granted that we were to fight with swords I made no objection, for though I did not consider myself a brilliant swordsman I could fence passably well, quite as well as I could shoot.

Ramon's second measured two sabres, of which he gave me my choice. After doffing my coat and waistcoat I took one at random and my adversary and I stepped into the ring, which had been formed by the torch bearers and spectators, all of whom were in gala attire.

We crossed swords, and the fight was just beginning when loud exclamations were heard and General Arismendez, pushing aside all who stood in his way, broke into the ring.

"What is this?" he demanded angrily. "A duel here and now. Major Wyvenhoe, Ramon, I am astonished. If you want to kill anybody, kill Spaniards, not each other. Who is the challenger? What is the cause of dispute? A woman, of course."

"I am the challenger; Major Wyvenhoe—" began Ramon and there ended, the remainder of his explanation, if he made it, being drowned in the roar of three cannon shots from Fort Ciudad, fired almost simultaneously.

"Alarm guns! The Spaniards are upon us," exclaimed the general. "Major Wyvenhoe, assemble your men. Ramon, Garcia, Sapvador, to your posts, rouse the people and prepare to resist the invaders to the death!"

Evident.

SOME time ago some cows were being taken by a cargo boat from Belfast to Liverpool. The passa e was a very stormy one, and at last the capta'n gave orders for all cows to be thrown overboard to lighten th ship, whose upper deck was flood d to su h an alarming extent that the animals were tossed about in all directions.

When the gale had somewhat subsided, the crew were puzzled at seeing some of the drovers hanging by their hands on the upper rails of the cattle boxes, keeping their feet clear of the deck, and apparently taking turns as each became exhausted and dropped.

Asking one of them why he was so engaged, he replied:

"Shure, can't yer see it's to lighten the ship?"

The Bull Wouldn't Understand.

IN a certain town a farmer kept a large number of bulls, amongst them a mad one. Lord Blank was in the habit of crossing the field in which these bulls were kept, and one morning as he was walking across the field as usual he saw the mad bull running towards him.

The nobleman soon took to his heels, and just escaped being gored.

Much enraged, he went to the owner of the bull and demanded the meaning of the outrage. The farmer, not knowing the nobleman, told him, not over politely, that it was no fault of his.

The nobleman instantly said:

"You do not know who I am; I'm Lord Blank," to which the farmer replied:

"Well, go and tell the bull so," and shutting the door, he went in without another word. H. H. F.

The Cow was More Important.

A WOMAN went into an apothecary's shop the other day with two prescriptions, one for her husband and the other for her cow.

She inquired what was the price of them, and the apothecary replied it was so much for the man and so much for the cow.

The woman, finding she had not money enough, reflected for a moment, and said:

"At all events, give me the medicine for the cow; I can send for my husband's to-morrow."

Tired of Being Polite.

A GENTLEMAN was one day coming out of a shop in Glasgow, and in crossing the road accidentally ran up against a cow which was being driven past.

In the confusion of the moment the absent-minded gentleman politely raised his hat and exclaimed:

"I beg your pardon, madam!"

Walking through the town in the afternoon he happened to stumble against a lady acquaintance of his who was walking in the opposite direction. In sudden recollection of his former adventure he called out in a tone by no means fraught with the former politeness:

"Is that you again, you brute?"

The Wrong Kind of Soil.

MINISTER: "How is it, Jenkins, you cannot make your cows pay? Simpson down the lane has only got the same number, yet he seems to do very well."

Jenkins: "Well, yer see, sir, I ain't got the right kind of soil, and——"

Minister: "But what has the soil got to do with it?"

Jenkins: "It's like this, sir. Simpson's farm stands on chalky ground, and then, agen, yer see, he's nearer the pump than I be, and it all tells."

Guessed Exactly the Same.

AT the late Birmingham Christmas Fat Cattle Show, two men were gazing with undisguised admiration at an exceedingly fine, fat beast.

"I wonder what his weight might be?" observed the city man, without any pretentions or knowledge of cattle and the like.

"Oh, it's easy to guess pretty nigh it," said the farmer-looking man who evidently regarded his companion with some contempt.

"Ah, well," responded the city man, "I think I can guess just as near as you can."

"Can you, indeed?" said the farmer. "Then I tell you that I'll bet you a sovereign that you can't?"

"Done! How much do you say?"

"A hundred and twenty-two stone."

"Well," said the city man, "I'll say a hundred and twenty-two stone, too. And I've won."

"What do you mean?" asked the farmer.

"Well, I said I'd guess as near as you, and I've done so—I've guessed exactly the same."

The bystanders with one accord took the city man's part, and the farmer reluctantly paid. C. R. F.

A Bull in a Cricket Field.

While staying at a little village I was playing cricket with some local players, when our game was rudely interrupted by a savage bull, which, breaking through the hedge, came charging right into our cricket ground, scattering us in all directions.

We had resigned ourselves to the loss of our afternoon's pleasure, when a stranger, who had been looking on with an amused smile, offered to shift the bull from the field. We gladly accepted his offer, wondering the while how he was going to perform the feat.

He took a cricket ball, and taking careful aim, threw it with all his might at the bull, hitting it right between the eyes. I never saw a more astonished animal in all my life than that bull. It jumped into the air, but no sooner had it reached the ground again than our friend, seizing a bat, and giving vent to a fearful shriek, hit the beast once more. The way that bull turned tail and fled, closely followed by its pursuer, who every now and then gave another unearthly shriek followed by a terrific blow from the bat, was a sight.

When we tried to thank the stranger he cut us short with the remark that he hadn't been twenty years a stockman in Australia without learning a little about bulls.

R. F.

Too Risky.

A butcher, who had the misfortune to be cross-eyed, was going to kill a bull, so, calling the boy he employed, he told him to hold the beast by a rope fastened to his head, while he dealt the blow.

The boy, who was a son of the Emerald Isle, seemed rather fidgety about his task, and said:

"If yer plaze, sir, would yer moind informin' me if ye are going to strike where yer lookin'?"

"Of course," said the butcher sharply.

"Well, then," replied the boy, "ye can hold the bull yerself, fer shure Oi'm not going to, fer ye be lookin' straight at me. Shure if yer strikes where yer looks the old bull must live till the noo boy cums."

The Bull and the Government Papers.

Some members of the Ordnance Survey were touring in the south of Scotland.

In the prosecution of their calling they entered a field belonging to a crusty old farmer. Seeing the strangers after some manœuvres he could not understand, the farmer approached.

"What are ye wantin' in the field?" he cried.

"Oh, we have a right to go anywhere," returned one of the company. "We are surveying, and here are our Government papers."

"Paper here or paper there," returned the farmer, "oot ye gang oot o' my field."

"No, we shan't," returned the man, "and you are rendering yourself liable to prosecution for interrupting us."

The farmer said no more, but went over to his shed opening into the field and let out a vicious bull.

The bull no sooner saw the red coats than he went for them in full career. The surveyors snatched up their theodolite and flew for their lives, while the old farmer in great glee yelled after them:

"What are ye runnin' for? Can ye no show the bull yer Government papers?"

A CHINESE BRIDE.

A LUCKY SHOWER.

WHEN I was about fourteen years old my father, who had been a widower since my birth, took for his second wife the widow of an old friend, Captain Spinner. My father was quite an elderly man already, and the widow was nearly his own age. The terms of his offer were these:

"Mrs. Spinner, I have a fine old house with no one to keep it. You are the best housekeeper I know, and have no house to keep. You have hard times, I know. So have I, in another way. Think it over."

You see, it was not a romantic wooing. As for the widow—a portly woman with a high colour, who refused to let her hair grow grey so long as there were dyes to be obtained, she replied frankly:

"Oh, I don't want to think long over it. It's too good an offer. But I never do anything without consulting the captain."

As Captain Skinner had now been dead ten years, this might have startled a new acquaintance, but my father knew what it meant very well, and said:

"Very well, ma'am."

Then Mrs. Spinner brought forth a little triangular table and sent her compliments to Mr. Maddler, and would he spare her an hour.

Mr. Maddler came at once. He was a remarkable youth of the neighbourhood, in whose presence tables danced and raps were heard—not a professional medium, Mrs. Spinner used to say with a sigh, "they came too expensive for her," but a gifted amateur. Under his long white fingers the table danced about beautifully and these words were spelled out.

"Ship ahoy, my hearty! Shiver my timbers if I could choose a better mate for my late consort. Take her, with my blessing!"

Now, Captain Spinner had never said, "shiver my timbers," or called my father "my hearty," in life. But no one's attention was called to that fact, and the result was that Mrs. Spinner became Mrs. Hardman very shortly, and fulfilled my father's highest expectations.

She looked very well in the rich black silks and satins she could now afford to wear, made us very comfortable petted us as if we were babies, and kept the house in apple-pie order.

In return my father made no objection to a seance in the library every Friday, where we heard the three-legged table dancing away at a great rate.

Mr. Maddler always attended these meetings, but my father did not ask him at other times. He was a mere youth in those days, but I did not like him either, so he gained no foothold in the house.

On the whole we were very happy for four years, and my father had slowly grown very fond of his Jane Eliza—whom he had married because she was a good housekeeper—when death stepped in and struck him a fatal blow.

* * * * *

When he died I thought at first that I should never be myself again, but at eighteen one is elastic. As for my stepmother, she mourned in the deepest crape, and cried a great deal.

Then a change came o'er the spirit of her dream. I detected a curious alteration in her manner, and startled into curiosity, looked for its cause, and found it in Mr. Maddler. That young man now our constant visitor, was evidently paying his addresses to my step-mother, who was well on the way to sixty.

I liked her, for she had been so kind to me. I detested Maddler, who seemed a very sneaking and contemptible person. I had read the papers sufficiently to know that such unions generally ended very badly for the lady in the case.

As my father had made his will I had only a sufficient sum for my expenses until I came of age, and my stepmother could do what she pleased during her life-time.

Poor father never dreamed that his second wife would marry again, and had wished us to make our home together and be as mother and son.

I had never doubted the wisdom of the will before, but now I saw that once married to Maddler my stepmother would soon be induced to place everything in his hands.

I determined to speak plainly to her, and I did.

She was confused, and simpered a little, but confessed I was not wrong.

"For goodness' sake, consider what you are doing, mother!" I cried. "Can't you see the man's motive?"

"He adores me," she said.

"Do you believe that?" I cried.

She simpered again.

"He is young enough to be your grandson," I said.

"Not quite," she replied. "But, at all events, years make no difference. The spirits that hover about me, Mr. Maddler says, and so does his particular friend, Mr. Tucker, preserve my youth by making me inhale flower essences in my sleep. Really, I woke up the other night with the smell of lavender all about me. They say I don't look thirty, Mr. Maddler and Mr. Tucker do."

"You don't believe all that, do you?" I asked.

"Well, yes, I do," replied my stepmother. "And then Mr. Maddler is wildly in love with me."

"It's all nonsence," said I, with the brutal candor of youth. "You look every day your age. I'm a young man, and I assure you that though any one could respect and admire you as—a mother or an aunt, you know you're entirely past falling in love with. Why, your common sense must tell you that. And the table-tappings Maddler does with his fingers. I don't say all of them do, but he does. He is a rascal and all he wants is your money."

My stepmother could not for some time find breath to speak in reply to this. At last she said contemptuously:

"Money; oh, yes, that is what you think of! I should have been careful of your interests if you had behaved decently, but now—" she paused, and added, "the sooner we part the better."

The end of this was that the next day I took lodgings near the college.

In a month I heard that the day had been fixed for my stepmother's wedding. She had insisted on waiting a year and one week after the date of her widowhood before she changed her name.

Maddler went about smirking, arm in arm with his great friend, Mr. Tucker. From his spruce appearance I fancied that my stepmother had already been generous to him.

And so my father's money was to pass from me, for I should refuse to enter into any legal conflict, and the foolish woman who had been so good to me once, would end her days miserably.

The week of my stepmother's freedom had arrived, and she had blossomed out in colours suited to her idea of her well-preserved beauty, and wore costumes unsuitable to any but a girl in her early teens.

One day I saw her coming up the street thus attired, and stood still to look at her.

In past days my stepmother had had a certain dignity about her presence that became her age. Now she reminded me of the clown in the circus, dressed in female attire, and pretending to flirt with the ring-master. Her very high heels and very short skirts had much to do with it, the cut of her gown more.

It was the time when the "Dolly Varden" costumes had just been introduced. She wore one of flowered foulard—brightest pink. The jaunty hat had roses in it. We had been members of one household, and she still bore my father's name. A sense of shame crept over me and I was about to turn away when a heavy shower came suddenly upon us.

The elderly butterfly had only a white parasol, with pink fringe, with which to protect herself from the wild torrents of rain. Raising this she began to run. Her high heels betrayed her and she slipped, fell flat, and lay upon the path evidently unable to rise.

I was not brute enough to leave her thus. Hastening to her aid I found that she had sprained her ankle and broken her parasol, crushed her bonnet, and ripped the stitches that festooned the "pannier" of the costume. She was weeping bitterly and was a pitiable object.

It still poured; she was unable to walk; but shelter was close at hand. Under the shed of a carriage-maker was an old omnibus which was waiting its turn for repairs. Into this I helped my stepmother, piled cushions under her ankle, pulled down the blinds and made her as comfortable as possible.

"As soon as it stops pouring I'll get a cab and take you home," I said.

"You're very kind," she answered. "Oh! I'm in such pain, and if any one should see me!"

"I'll take care of that," I said; and as the rain began to drive in at the door I closed it. The next moment two men came running into the shed.

"Whew!" cried one of them, "we're lucky—high and dry after all, Tucker!"

"You're a lucky fellow, anyhow, Maddler," answered his companion. "Good to know a sort of mascot."

"Oh, dear! it is Mr. Maddler!" whispered my stepmother. "And such a sight as I am."

"Keep quiet, and he won't guess that you are here," I said, and silence reigned within the stage—but not without, Tucker was fond of talking.

"How is the widder?" he queried.

"Fat as ever," replied Maddler. "The sacrifice is near at hand now. Well, I fancy she'll be easy to manage; I was afraid of the cub."

"Meaning Tom Hardman!" queried Tucker.

"Of course," said Maddler. "But a quarrel between the two freed me from him. The old man never dreamt Mrs. Hardman would marry again, and everything is left just the way that suits me. Between my fascinations and the raps I can make the old lady do just what I please. How do you suppose I managed now for cash?"

"Don't know," said Tucker.

"The spirits advised her to give me a certain sum. I say, 'No no; pray, don't.' I declare that I'd rather not take it. The table insists, bangs frightfully; there are knocks everywhere. She draws a cheque, I put it in my pocket, kiss her hand, call her an angel."

"Can you keep it up though?" asked Tucker.

"No need after I've got the ring on her finger and her signature to a paper or two. I think she'll let me have my own way, and if so, all right; she'll get good treatment, but if she kicks I'll show her who is master," replied Maddler. "I shan't see much of her anyhow, after the knot is tied. We'll have jolly times, you and I. I don't desert old friends. You've helped me ever so much with the old woman."

"It's stopped raining," said Tucker.

"So it has," said Maddler. "Come along."

We were alone again, my stepmother and I. I looked at her, she was white as a ghost.

"I do feel so ill, Tom!" she said.

Poor woman! between pain and shame and anger and the sudden murder of her vanity, she was in a wretched state and I felt very, very sorry for her.

I did my best for her. I interviewed the carriage-maker, got him to allow me to put two horses to the omnibus, and so convey the sufferer home. Having been put to bed and the doctor sent for, I waited to see if I could be of any use, but it was not until twilight fell that my step-mother sent for me.

"Better?" I asked, kindly, as I entered the room.

"Yes, Tom," she answered, quite in her old way, "and very thankful. I think good spirits—your poor pa maybe—made me fall down, and sent you to put me in that old 'bus, just to save me from the awful fate I was rushing into."

"Certainly it happened providentially," I said.

"I see what a goose I've been," she continued, "and how honestly you spoke, though very plainly, that time when I was so vexed, Tom. I see it as you did, now, and thank goodness it's not too late. Tom, won't you come back and be my son again? I seem to need taking care of."

For answer I kissed her, but I did not think my whole duty done to my stepmother until I had kicked Mr. Maddler down the steps, which I did promptly the next time he called.

A MISERABLE SINNER.

If there was one person who thoroughly applauded the prospect of war with South Africa it was Thornton Frere, Captain in the—th Fusiliers and a fine soldier into the bargain. For the war had given him a wife.

It had come about in this way.

The engagement between the gallant captain of forty-five and pretty Ruth Waring, aged twenty-two, had been hanging fire for over a year, and though it was perfectly plain to everyone that the soldierly-looking man was head over ears in love with the girl, she hung back, and it was not until the war was declared that things came to a climax, and from being hurriedly engaged they were even more hurriedly married.

There had been a short honeymoon lasting a few days and then the husband was called away to join his regiment, leaving his bride to go back to her mother and spend the next few months in weary waiting.

When the parting words came to be said it was the bitterest moment in Captain Frere's life, for under the blunt and somewhat homely exterior of the soldier, he owned a heart as tender as a woman's.

Love, coming late in life as it had done, seemed to have gathered strength and force in all the years it had been lying dormant, and it was a feeling almost akin to worship that the great, strong-hearted man felt for his wife.

It was one Tuesday night towards the end of November that the Fusiliers and one of the mounted Batteries had orders to march at once through the enemy's lines and take up a position ready for the following morning, when they were to attack and turn the enemy's left flank in order that the main army might catch them.

The night was pitch dark when the two regiments filed slowly out of camp. The men were forbidden to speak, or on any account to strike a match. Everyone moved as quietly as possible, even the mules seemed to tread softly.

All went well for about six miles; the men, hardened by their late experience into utter indifference to their present danger, were trudging along cursing under their breath at the inforced silence, when, without a moment's warning, hundreds of Boer horsemen seemed to spring out of the ground itself.

Taken by surprise, but realizing they had been led into a trap by the guide, a scene almost bordering on panic ensued, made worse by the inability of the soldiers to distinguish friends from foes owing to the darkness that enveloped them.

Luckily for Captain Frere, he was spared all memory of what happened, for he lay stunned by a heavy blow on the head from the butt-end of a rifle, and it was not until the sky began to lighten in the far east with the coming dawn that he returned to consciousness, to find himself lying in a dry ditch, almost covered with brushwood, where he had fallen.

Getting up with difficulty, for his limbs were stiff and cramped, he crawled to a rising in the uneven ground, and although it was still dark he managed to discern the bodies of several men lying on the grass.

Gazing about him he noticed on his left a plantation of trees. Feeling giddy from the blow on his head he made his way over to their shelter, and scrambling through the bushes, almost fell headlong over the body of a man that was stretched full length on the ground.

At first Frere thought he was dead, but in another moment the man had opened his eyes.

"Where am I?" he said in a dazed voice. Then glancing at the Captain's uniform he added: "Thank Heaven, you're English."

There was a puzzled expression on his face, as though he were struggling to recollect something, Suddenly his face brightened.

"I remember it all now! You are one of the chaps that got cut up last night?"

Frere nodded. "How did you manage to get here?" he asked, noticing the man wore ordinary civilian's dress.

"I volunteered to take some dispatches through the enemy's lines. They let me come because I knew every inch of the country round about here. I should have got through all right if it hadn't been for those brutes lying in hiding for you. I came right on them and got a bullet in my shoulder before I could get away. I managed to crawl here and must have fainted. When I came to, there was a fight going on. Some of your fellows got away, but they took most of them prisoners. Then the Boers went round and collected up the prisoners. It was awful lying here helpless."

Frere's face looked black and he muttered a curses under his breath. But the man beside him was wounded, and needed attention.

"Let me have a look at your wound."

He knelt down and bending over the younger man, endeavoured to find out the extent of his injury.

In removing his coat an unopened letter addressed, in an unmistakably feminine handwriting, to "Charles Cleaver, Esq," fell from the inside pocket.

The wounded man picked it up.

"This has been following me for over a month. I only got it just before starting yesterday. Fancy reading it here!"—and he gave a feeble attempt at a laugh.

Frere was busy examining the wound.

"The Boers have not done for you this time," he exclaimed cheerfully. "You've lost a lot of blood, but it's not dangerous."

"I'm glad of that," said Cleaver, in a relieved voice, "for I don't want to peg out yet," and he tore open his letter with a significant smile.

Captain Frere lifted his head and listened. His quick ears had caught the sound of horse's hoofs on the veld. Cautiously parting the bushes he looked through. Not twenty yards away stood a small Boer pony, contentedly munching the long grass.

It was the work of a moment to catch the animal, in fact, it offered no resistance, and tethering it securely to a neighbouring tree, Frere hurried back.

"What a stroke of luck!" he exclaimed. "A pony, and riderless, too!"

But a glance at his companion told him something was wrong. He lay back, his face ghastly white, his eyes closed. He had fainted.

Frere's eyes fell on the opened letter. He seemed to take the situation in at a glance.

"Poor chap!" he muttered compassionately, as he raised the young man's head on his knee and endeavoured to force a little brandy from his own flask between the tightly-clenched teeth: "that letter brought bad news."

Presently his efforts were rewarded and Charles Cleaver opened his eyes.

Frere laid his head back gently. "How do you feel?" he inquired.

"I'm all right now," the wounded man replied huskily, and then relapsed into silence, staring stonily before him.

Frere noticed how drawn and haggard his face looked. In the last few minutes he seemed to have aged years.

"Look here, you chap," he said at length, after waiting in vain for his companion to break the silence: "every minute we lose now is precious. If we are going to try and get away we had better make a start at once. It will be daylight in an hour and a half. While you dropped off just then I managed to secure a Boer pony. He'll do for one of us—unfortunately the animal is too small for both. Don't give up, man," as the wounded man made an impatient movement with his hand, "there is hope for us yet."

Cleaver turned his eyes on the speaker's face, and the hopeless expression in them disconcerted Frere.

"That fellow has had a nasty shock," he mused to himself.

"I can't ride," Cleaver said, "my back is too painful. You take the pony, sir, and make for camp—I shall stop here."

"Bosh!" said the Captain, "I shall do nothing of the kind. Do you suppose I am going to leave you and go off, young man? Why, it would be simply suicidal in your state."

But Cleaver refused to move or be moved.

"I shall stay where I am," he persisted, doggedly.

Captain Frere tried all his persuasive powers, but to no good.

Charles Cleaver was obstinate.

"Then there is nothing to be done but for both of us to sit here and see what the day brings forth," and the Captain took a seat beside his wounded companion, hoping that his latest plan of action would bring him to his senses.

And he was not disappointed.

"I can't allow this, sir, really I can't," protested Cleaver earnestly. "Because I insist on staying here it is no reason why you should. You have friends, no doubt, who are watching the papers every morning for news of you. I have nobody. That is why I don't care. If I had something to live for it would be different—it was different before I had that letter. You don't know what it is to lose the only soul in the world that has made your life worth living."

"No, I don't know, but I can understand if it is a woman," Frere replied in a low voice, for he was thinking of Ruth. Then turning to his companion he laid his hand on his arm. "Death," he said gently, and, his, was a wonderfully soothing voice, "comes to all of us."

"It isn't death," cried Cleaver, lifting himself up on his elbow, and looking at Frere with blazing eyes. "She has married, I tell you—married!"

There was a long, uncomfortable silence. Presently Cleaver began to speak.

"I came to this wretched country four years ago. I had no money, or we should have been married. Her people were poor, and I had nothing but an old name and an estate mortgaged up to the hilt. Then they had an invalid sister to keep."

Frere felt a rising interest, for Ruth's little sister was a cripple.

"I've worked day and night, slaved far more than any Kaffir—I got a farm at last, and I was just beginning to make a good thing out of it when the war broke out. And now she is married—sacrificed herself to save her family from starving—you might read me what she says, sir, I don't think I got through it all."

Frere picked up the letter. There was something strangely familiar about the handwriting!

"Dearest Charlie," it ran. "This is the last time I shall ever address you in the old way, for to-morrow I am to be married. You must try and not be angry with me, dear, for he has asked me over and over again, and there was nothing else to be done. Last month mother heard that all the little that remained of her money was gone. It meant starvation, for though I could have made enough to keep myself, there was mother and the children to think of, and the boys ought to be going to a good school now. Charlie, you must try and not hate him, for he has been so kind to all of us, and he knows nothing about you. Mother would never let me tell him—and when he asked me again to marry him and said he was under orders to go to South Africa, I had not the heart to tell him I was engaged to you. Don't judge me too harshly, for you don't know what it is to marry a man I can never love. I feel I am wronging one of the best and kindest friends

The soldierly-looking man was head over ears in love with the girl.

The two men clasped hands.

I ever had when my heart can never be his, for I love you, Charlie, and you only! Your broken-hearted ——"

"I can't read the signature—it's blotted," broke off the Captain, "but she does not tell you the man's name."

"I know who he is—a captain of the Fusiliers, and old enough to be her father," said Cleaver, bitterly.

A spasm of pain crossed Frere's face, he snatched at the letter, and tried to decipher the signature.

"And his name?" he asked quietly, without looking up.

"Thornton Frere."

Five—ten minutes passed and neither man moved. Frere sat bolt upright, with stern, set features. Suddenly his face relaxed; a smile lit up and transformed it, making it appear almost handsome.

"Yes," he said slowly, and there was nothing in his calm, even voice to rouse Cleaver's suspicion—"it's a facer, but not such a facer as you think. I knew Frere well—he was my greatest chum in the regiment—" he paused, as though the words would not come out, "and he died from his wounds received two days ago in a skirmish."

In the few moments of silence after he had learnt the awful truth Frere had decided what to do. His idol had been smashed, dragged ruthlessly from the pedestal he had placed it on; broken so that no human hands could piece it together again. He knew how Ruth had never loved him—it was but the reflection of his own love he had read in her eyes. And yet he felt no anger at the knowledge, only pity, a great pity that surged up in his heart and blotted out every other feeling. For his had been the fault, not hers; he could see the folly of his marriage now. What was there about him for a young girl to love—he, greyhaired and old beyond his years? Cleaver was both young and good-looking. Ah, he understood it all now—and yet he had been so ridiculously happy.

"Dead!" gasped Cleaver, aghast.

"There is no doubt about it, for I helped to bury him. There is nothing in your way now—you can marry his widow—she will be rich, for he left her all his money. What you had better do is to get on that pony, ride for all you're worth, and deliver those dispatches. I'll lie here in hiding until you can send some men to bury the poor chaps who fell last night. But there is only one stipulation I make, and that is, that you don't risk your life any more, but get back to England and take care of Frere's widow. Before he died he left her as a sacred charge to me, but in face of that letter and what you've told me I think I am right in passing that duty over to you. Frere was a peculiar chap, but I feel sure he would wish it, for her happiness was everything to him. Come, is it a bargain?"

Cleaver seemed quite overcome. "You are very good," he said brokenly. "If ever I get home and we're married, she shall never have cause to repent it, or you either, sir. But your news about her husband has knocked me over—so soon, poor chap," he said feelingly.

"Yes, poor chap," echoed the elder man as he stared out across the veld with unseeing eyes. "But she made him very happy, and he died happy, too, perfectly happy," he added with conviction.

"I'm glad of that, it will comfort Ruth. But I can't go alone, sir. You would not leave me, remember."

"That was different. You are under orders to deliver those dispatches, and besides I'm not wounded."

Frere was right—the dispatches were important.

"Then I'll go, sir."

Half lifting, half carrying him, Frere managed to get Cleaver into the saddle.

His wound was stiff and the pain from it almost made him faint, but a pull from Frere's whiskey flask put fresh life in him. On the flap of an envelope which he took from his pocket Frere scribbled these lines:

"Good-bye, Marry Cleaver if he can make you happy. Remember, your happiness, before anything else, has been the one desire of your devoted husband,

"T. F."

Placing the scrap of paper inside the case which held his wife's miniature, with a long, last look Frere handed it to Cleaver.

"Give it to her—it is something her husband gave me and contains his last message."

"I'll not forget. But why not keep it, and give it to her yourself?"

"There is more fighting to be done and who knows—?" Frere never finished the sentence. Cleaver understood.

The two men clasped hands. Frere watched the pony and its rider till both were out of sight.

Then taking out his revolver he examined and cocked it. He knelt down.

"Heaven have mercy on me a miserable sinner!" he said in a firm voice.

Raising the revolver to his forehead he uttered the words "For your sake, Ruth," and pulled the trigger.

And that night, when Charles Cleaver ran out to greet the man who had saved his life, he met the rescue party bringing their silent burden into camp.

THE MAN . . . . UP A TREE.

I AM something of a reformer not only in theory, but in practice, and when I discovered the man up a tree I determined to try my hand at elevating his moral standard.

I hold that no man is so bad that he can't be reformed to a certain extent, and I hold that any way to bring about a betterment of his moral character is justifiable. I mean by that, to speak frankly and plainly, that, while some men can be reformed by sympathy and encouragement, others need a rap on the head with a cricket bat to arouse their dormant integrity and ambition.

I had extended sympathy and more or less financial aid to this man up a tree. In a burst of confidence he had confessed to me that he had been a swindler, a gambler and a great deal more. He had been "laid away" in prison two or three times during his career, had sailed under a dozen different names, and he might have admitted a murder or two had I not cut him short.

I draw the line at murder. I can set out with a good deal of confidence in the task of reforming burglars, highway robbers, incendiaries, perjurers, and so forth, but when it comes to murderers I hesitate.

Having become interested in this man, I didn't want him to own up to anything worse than robbing a blind man or burning an orphan home. He had come to me as a man who had at last seen the error of his ways and longed to turn over a new leaf and be counted with the good and respectable.

He had given me the name of H. Jones-Jones. It struck me that there was an extra amount of Jones about him, but the name is an honest one, and I didn't find fault about it.

He was a man of about forty-five, with all the evidences of his career in his face, but I didn't look for babylike innocence in his eyes.

When he threw himself upon my mercy, as it were—when he made a clean breast of his wicked career and added that if anyone would point out the path of honesty he would turn into it and travel on without a limp, I agreed to take him in hand.

He had whiskers with which the police were acquainted, and I sent him to a barber's shop. He had clothes which gave him away altogether, and I bought him a modest suit of blue.

Then I gave him money for a week's holiday from crime, and when the holiday was over we were to see what further could be done. I took my week off at the same time and spent it amid the fresh buttermilk and dew-kissed gorse of the country.

On the second night of my stay, as I sat by my open window at midnight to finish the last of my cigar and wonder if my Jones-Jones had kept straight dur ng the last forty-eight hours, I suddenly caught sight of him on the ground below.

It was a farmhouse at which I was stopping. I had a corner room, and at that corner of the hous stood a large apple tree. I had obser ed that a big limb branched out so close to my window that I could have descended by it. What you can descend by you can also ascend by.

I had no sooner caught sight of Jones-Jones at the foot of the tree, at an hour when everybody was supposed to be in bed, than I unders ood that he intended pay ng me a secret visit. How he had tracked me to my lair was of no consequence. Why he should imagine that I had broug it any great am unt of money with me on my week's outing I didn't stop to think. Indeed, I am not sure that he had tracked me. In looking for lodgings in the country he might have stumbled upon the place. He might have thought the open window belonged to some other boarder.

No matter how it was, however. Mr. Jones-Jones had no sooner begun to climb that apple tree than I made ready to receive him with all due hospitality. There was no stick in the room, but the water jug had been filled for the night and made a good weapon. Armed with that I took my stand on one side of the window and waited.

Jones-Jones was not an impetuous man. He had all night in which to climb and creep. and it was at least a quarter of an hour before he grasped my window sill with his hands and drew his body into the opening. I waited with patience until he had reached a particular position and then brought the jug down on his head.

The idea was to administer an anæsthetic, and it was a success. He pitched forward into the room with a long drawn sigh, and I lighted the lamp and took from his wrist the "billy" which he had bought in town with my money to use as a "cracker" in case his sleeping victim woke up before being plundered.

Then I forced brandy between his teeth, bathed his face with water, and in the course of a quarter of an hour my midnight visitor had so far recovered his senses that I ventured to remark:

"Well, Jones-Jones, why didn't you tell me that you were coming, that I might be on the lookout for you?"

Jones-Jones sat up. He didn't recognize me. He himself had a different look on his face. That dissipated but yet crafty look had disappeared, and in its place was wonderment if not honesty. It was my wicked man in the flesh, but not in the spirit.

He got off the floor and felt the bump on his head and sat down on a chair, and it was a long five minutes before he said:

"Sir, my name is Brown-Brown, and I don't exactly understand the situation. Am I in your room, or are you in mine?"

"I believe it's my room," I replied, "but since you arrived late and the landlord is asleep you can stop until morning."

"Very kind of you, sir—extremely kind. As to this bump on my head—is it a bump or not? If it's a bump how did I receive it?"

"You hit your head on the door in the darkness, I believe."

"Ah! Just so. Very stupid of me, but it's only a trifle. Now, then, Mr. Ashmere, as to the business in hand. If you think you can advance me a hundred pounds, I am sure I can make good use of it."

It took me a little while to understand, but by and by I discovered that Jones-Jones had disappeared and Brown-Brown had taken his place.

Jones-Jones was a shady character who wanted to reform; Brown-Brown was a poor but honest man who wanted to start in business. He knew nothing whatever of Jones-Jones. He picked up the conversation as if he had been talking about the business when the accident happened.

He called me by another name than my own, and it was plain to me that he was also another man. I sounded him about crime and prison, but he solemnly assured me that he had never been arrested. He was Brown-Brown so far as his name went, but as for his past history he was rather hazy on the subject.

I had turned Jones-Jones, the shady character, back into Brown-Brown, the honest man, by a knock on the head. It was rapid transit reformation, and I looked upon the problem as solved. Having been willing to assist a shady character, I could not refuse an honest man.

When my week was up, we went back to town together, and I gave Brown-Brown money enough to set up in business. He had on the clothes I had bought Jones-Jones. He had the hair, the eyes, the mouth and the build of the shady character, but there had been a change of souls.

So far as the present went he was bright and talkative, but when asked of the past he looked puzzled and could not understand what I meant. The doctors a reed with me that it was the whack on the head that had made Brown-Brown of Jones-Jones and that the police ought to be given full power to go round breaking water jugs over suspects' craniums; but, alas, that was a part of the business we hadn't the foresight to discover and prepare for.

My man prospered wonderfully well. People said he was a little eccentric, but he was honest and a hard worker. In one year he had paid me back half my money and built up a good business.

One day a detective entered the shop to make a purchase. He had known Jones-Jones as a burglar. He knew that Jones-Jones had a crooked finger on his right hand and a mole on his left cheek. When he discovered that Brown-Brown had these same identification marks, he began to look at him more closely, and by and by he made up his mind that the old burglar stood before him. He was so sure of it that he started to make an arrest.

Brown-Brown was an honest man, but in his surprise he started to bolt off. As he ran out of his shop and down the street, pursued by the detective, he encountered a policeman who tapped him on the head with his truncheon. Brown-Brown went down like a log and was carted off to the station. I was present when his senses returned, and you can imagine my feelings when he sat up and said:

"Well, you've got me at last, but I gave you a run for it. You fellers ain't half sharp."

"You are Jones-Jones, the burglar," said the sergeant.

"Of course I am, and the sharpest one in the country. Is it that bank business you want me for this time?"

"Mr. Brown-Brown"—I began as I stepped forward, but the burglar stopped me with:

"Who in the name of goodness is Brown-Brown?"

Then I realised how it was. I had smashed Jones-Jones, the burglar, over the head with a water jug, and changed him into Brown-Brown, the honest shopkeeper. The policeman had smashed Brown-Brown with his truncheon, and changed him back into Jones-Jones, the burglar.

The taps on the head had done the business. My tap was all right, and I had founded a new theory upon it and invested a hundred pounds in cash. But I hadn't foreseen that a second tap might come any day, as come it did, and my theory had been knocked into a cocked hat, and I was fifty pounds out of pocket.

The Brain Gymnasium

In these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver plated pencil-cases or ten popular six shilling novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by first post on Monday, August 20th, 1900.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

AN EASTERN COUNTY; A BIRD; A VESSEL; A MUSICAL T RM; A VEGETABLE; AN EASTERN OFFICIAL; A TOWN IN JAPAN.

And yet now in this latter day
To strike it gives delight.

And to a city, so 'tis said,
It brought disaster dire.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"67 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Mrs. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 607. FOR WEEK ENDING AUGUST 18TH, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

A SERGEANT IN THE FIELD POST OFFICE AND

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

THE LIGHT INFANTRY BRIGADE UNANIMOUSLY IN FAVOUR OF VI-COCOA.

Sergeant F. W. SPENCE, Sunday's River Camp, near Elandslaagte, 22 miles north of Ladysmith, No. 10 Field Post Office, 4th Brigade, 2nd Division, Natal F.F.

"I have been asked by my comrades in the Field Post Office to write you on the subject of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, which we frequently use. I have said frequently, because we cannot always obtain it, but when we do we lay in a stock, as we find it more satisfying, more palatable, and thirst-quenching in this country, where to drink the khaki-coloured water is almost certain dysentery. I have asked many of the men of the Light Infantry Brigade how they like Vi-Cocoa, and almost unanimously they declare for it in preference to other sorts. But, speaking from my own experience, whilst on long marches, sleeping at nights under wagon, or in the open air, or in a standing camp, we generally make the Vi-Cocoa night and morning, and I firmly believe that it has helped me greatly to bear the fatigues of campaigning, and so preserved my health unbroken during the five months or more we have been working in the field, and now that winter is coming on we shall use it more than ever.

"If you should consider the foregoing of any use, you are at liberty to make what you please of it."

SHORT STORIES

No. 607.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending Aug. 18th, 1900.

A Desperate Remedy.

"DOES not the end justify the means? And yet—and yet——"

Arnold Mervyn could find no conclusion to his thought better than a sigh. He was standing at the window of his library, looking out on the lawn. Here a significant group of three had fixed his attention for the past half-hour. It consisted of a handsome young man and two girls; the one blonde, the other of a dark brunette type. A subtle air of rivalry between the two latter pervaded the scene, and would have been apparent even to a casual observer.

Just now the fair-haired girl was decidedly at a disadvantage. She was alone on the tennis-court, idly tossing the ball to and fro.

A moment before Claude Evans had been at her side. But he had left her to steal behind a rustic seat, and shake down a shower of blossoms about a dark head, and to bend over a laughing upturned face.

It was this position of affairs which had more than all disturbed the unseen looker-on, and stirred thoughts which had been often in his mind of late.

"It is only too easy to see how it will end," Mervyn told himself wretchedly. "Oh my Greta, my love."

He turned away from the window, and dropped into a chair by his desk, his head resting against his hand.

He remained quite motionless in the same attitude, without again glancing out of the window, or a long time—how long he did not exactly know. But he was aroused by a light rustle behind him; and then a pair of soft dark eyes looked over his shoulder into his own and a voice said in his ear:

"One would fancy you were planning some crime, cousin Arnold."

A tremor passed over him at her nearness, but at her words he drew away, as if with an almost guilty sensation.

"I was thinking of you, Greta," he responded, in a moment, and regarded her searchingly.

"Have I done anything to offend you?" she asked, with quick, affectionate concern. "How could you be thinking of me with such a murderous expression, dear Arnold?"

All rights reserved.]

"I am not offended, only worried," he returned, evasively.

Then, looking away from her, he asked, abruptly: "Have your friends gone?"

Greta drew herself up with an air of elation.

Her tone had the same quality, as she replied:

"Bella has gone. She went some time ago."

"Mr. Evans did not accompany her then."

"No doubt she expected that he would, but he—didn't. He is in the drawing-room. He—would like to speak to you, cousin Arnold."

Mervyn had opened his desk, and now let the lid fall with a crash. He was quite pale as he said:

"I cannot imagine what Mr. Evans can possibly have to say to me."

Greta blushed and pouted.

"You are not often so obtuse. As my guardian, you ought to be prepared for such things. I believe this isn't the first time it has happened. Only it is different now, because—well, Claude and I are engaged."

"Why are you so silent?" she queried, after waiting in vain for a response. "I thought you would be delighted. I wanted to be the first to tell you."

At this he rose and confronted her. His face was white and set, and his eyes sad.

"Greta," he said hoarsely, "even before uncle and aunt died and left you to the sole care of my mother and myself, you had learnt to trust me in all things. Will you not heed me now?"

She gazed at him wonderingly.

"You look and talk so strangely, Arnold, you frighten me. Instead of congratulations, you give me something that seems more like groans and hisses. Of course, I will heed you, but—but really I do not think this treatment is quite fair. If you told me that you were engaged I should——"

She did not finish her sentence, but stopped suddenly, as though its significance had struck more forcibly upon her mind than when she began, and had appalled her a little. Mervyn flushed slightly, but, controlling his feelings, said gently:

Digitized by Google

"Now, tell me, Greta, what it is in Claude Evans that makes you love him enough to be his wife."

She twirled nervously the hat she held in her hand.

"I should think the reason was evident enough. Why all the girls rave about his Greek profile and gentlemanly bearing, and Bella Dean has determined to catch him."

"But what if, by-and-bye, when the exhilaration of having carried off the prize that Bella and the rest have desired is gone, and if then your woman's heart, your woman's intellect, demands something in your husband besides a Greek profile and a stylish air?"

Greta burst into a laugh, and then suddenly became serious.

"Of course, I know that he is everything that is noble and good, and—and all that, or I should not be willing to marry him. We like the same things—dancing, tennis, dogs and poetry. We have never had a single quarrel, and he is as attentive as a knight in the days of chivalry. What more could one possibly desire in a husband?"

"Spoiled by flattery, selfish, fickle, indolent and pleasure-loving, Claude Evans has hardly a quality calculated to make a woman happy as his wife. He can never love anyone so well as he loves himself. Five years from now you would not think for a moment of choosing him as the companion of your life. You do not love him in the least now. Greta, I must save you from the sin of ignorance. I must refuse to sanction an engagement between you and him. You shall not make a false start in life, if I can prevent it."

He spoke with a heat which he knew was not wise, but his emotion was too strong to be controlled.

She stopped twirling her hat, and stared at him as if she doubted the evidence of her own ears.

"You will not give your consent to my marriage with Claude," she gasped.

Even while regretting his declaration as premature, he could not recede from the position he had taken.

"If it will avail dear, I will beg you on my knees, to wait; to learn to know yourself better before you decide on such a momentous step," he said. "Do not force me to seem harsh and tyrannical."

"You talk as if I were a child, and I am nineteen years old," she broke out, a dangerous flash in her black eyes. "I know my own mind—it is absurd to suppose I do not. Why you are so prejudiced against poor Claude I cannot imagine. But if you persist in being so unreasonable, and refuse your consent to our engagement, I suppose we shall have to do without it."

Mervyn covered his face with his hands. Too well he knew that arguments would strengthen her obstinacy, and her blind belief that it was love she felt for the handsome fellow whom she had won away from Bella Dean. He was powerless to make her comprehend what he himself perceived so clearly.

Then he felt her breath upon his cheek, and the touch of her head upon his shoulder, as she always used to rest it when a child.

A thrill went over him with a wild regret. Perhaps if he had not been so patient in his waiting, if he had let her know his hopes, and the real quality of his love for her, she might not have turned to another.

"Dear Arnold," she whispered, in her old affectionate way, "we have never quarrelled, and nothing ought to come between us. Try to like Claude for my sake, and do not think that I shall care any less for you because I am engaged to him."

She had divined his jealousy, though not its depths. The thought came that he was, perhaps, blinded by it, as she was by the exhilaration of conquest.

She drew away from him as if hurt.

"Why do you not answer? You are not like yourself to-day, Arnold. Are you trying to be like one of those disagreeable, domineering guardians we read of sometimes?"

"I am trying to be kind—I am trying to understand my duty," he said. "For a long time I have been apprehensive of this hour, and I have seen only one course open if persuasion failed. In desperate cases physicians use desperate measures, and take the responsibility.

"There is a way by which I can test the worth of this young man, and prove the sincerity of his feelings for you. But to do it, I shall have to give you pain, and destroy some of your most cherished illusions. Must I do this Greta?"

"You speak in enigmas, Arnold," she replied, slowly, and more thoughtfully than she had yet spoken. "I do not think anything could force me to give up Claude, and I am sure neither he nor I need be afraid of tests."

"Let me say to him that you are willing to wait a year before entering into a formal engagement, because it is my wish," he pleaded.

"I would yield to any resonable wish of yours, but this one is too exacting. It is not fair to him. I defy you to prove him unworthy."

Mervyn's air of irresolution gave place to one of settled determination.

Crossing to the back of the room, he opened the door of a smaller apartment beyond.

"Step in here, and listen to the interview between Claude Evans and myself. But I warn you that it will try your fortitude."

She hesitated, then, without a word, but with a proud uplifting of her head, passed him and entered the room.

"If, indeed, I am mistaken in him, Greta," Mervyn said, with agitation, "I will—I pledge my word—I will give you up to him, trusting that a real love will spring from what is now a girlish infatuation. Do not be startled by the disclosure I shall make. It seems necessary you should know the truth, and although it may give you a shock, it can change nothing, dear. Remember, I am talking to him for a purpose, and, consequently, shall put the matter in its worst light."

"You have made me very curious, but you have not frightened me. This is rather theatrical, though, isn't it? But be sure the curtain will come down on Claude and me embracing each other, and my stern guardian blessing us," said Greta, but looking rather flustered, nevertheless.

"If I am using means that I had better have left unemployed, try to forgive me, Greta, though I shall never forgive myself," he rejoined; and he partially closed the door upon her, leaving an aperture through which she could hear distinctly all that passed.

It was several minutes, however, before he felt equal to ringing for a servant, and sending a message to the young man, who all this time had been waiting in the drawing-room.

At length he did so, and when Claude Evans obeyed the summons, he found Mervyn seated at his desk, and was slightly offended at not being received more effusively.

As he motioned him to a seat, and apologised for keeping him waiting so long, Mervyn scrutinised him sharply.

The Greek profile was apparent enough, but the effect was somewhat marred by his hair being parted in the middle. His clothes were faultless, and his hands white as a girl's. His eyes were of a violet blue, and had a sort of brooding self-satisfaction in their exp ession.

"I suppose Greta has taken all this time to tell you that she has made me the happiest of men," he said pulling at his incipient moustache and smiling. "I suppose it is the proper thing to ask your consent, as her cousin and guardian. Or, ought I to speak to her aunt, your mother?"

"You are correct in coming to me," returned Mervyn. "Under the circumstances, I am compelled to make certain very practical inquiries. Your social position is, of course, all that could be desired. But I do not know what means you have of supporting a wife."

Claude left off stroking his moustache and looked aghast.

"Why, I—really, Mr. Mervyn, isn't that rather straining a point? My father is a man of wealth, and Greta is an heiress in her own right. Surely nothing could be more propitious."

"You are the eldest of five children, if I am not mistaken. Your father's wealth would hardly be wealth when divided amongst so many, and you have been educated to follow no profession. If Greta were a poor girl, should you feel that it would be expedient to make her your wife?"

Claude moved uneasily in his chair.

"My answer to a question based on an improbability can only be that I love her," said Claude, grandly.

Mervyn heard a rustling sound in the little room beyond, and fearing that Greta might take it into her head to rush in with an "I told you so," hastened to say:

"I need not hesitate, then, Mr. Evans, to tell you the truth. At present it is known only to myself."

The rustling ceased, and for a moment there was a dead silence.

Then Claude asked, uneasily:

"What do you mean?"

"To explain, it will be necessary to recall some details connected with the Mervyn family. You are doubtless aware that Mr. and Mrs. Dent Mervyn resided in Italy for many years."

"You are speaking of Greta's parents," said Claude, blankly.

"When they returned they brought Greta with them. She was then a child of six, who was born while they were in Italy," Mervyn continued, without making any more direct answer. "Within a few years Uncle Dent lost his wife, whose health suffered in our uncertain climate; and when Greta was twelve years old, he, too, died. As he left no will, she, as his only child, inherited his wealth. She was given into my mother's charge, and although I was only about your present age, I was appointed her guardian at her request and my mother's."

Claude bowed assentingly. These were facts with which everyone was acquainted, and there seemed no reason why they should be dragged into the present conversation.

"Everything concerning Greta and her inheritance appeared perfectly simple until about eight months ago. Then in going through my uncle's old desk, searching for certain papers connected with the estate, I accidently touched the spring of a drawer which I never knew existed. In this drawer I found papers which materially changed Greta's position and explained something my uncle tried to tell me on his death bed, but—that I was unable to understand."

"A will containing some eccentric condition!" ejaculated Claude, much disturbed.

Mervyn paused before answering.

He remembered that he had another listener, and that it was she and not the young man before him, who must be considered.

"Unfortunately there is no will," he said presently. "I say unfortunately, for, as things are, a will was essential to make the property legally hers. If you will glance over these papers, Mr. Evans, you will at once comprehend the meaning."

Claude received the papers mechanically which Mervyn took from the desk and handed to him.

He was so astounded that for a time he lost consciousness of being a handsome, faultlessly dressed young man for whom the world was made; and the effect of his swift, eager scrutiny of the documents was a sort of stupefaction.

"Is it really true?" he questioned feebly. "Greta an adopted daughter—not a Mervyn at all."

Mervyn's strained and anxious ears caught no sound from the inner room, and nothing in his calm tone betrayed the tension he was under, as he replied:

"The same to us all in love, as though she had really been a Mervyn by birth. But, as you see, her father was a German musician, her mother an Italian, and she was never legally adopted. Her real parents died of the Roman fever when she was an infant, and my uncle and aunt having no childr n, took her, and no one suspected she was not their own; as indeed, she was by every tie of affection."

"Then, I suppose, it is you who are the real heir to the property?" gasped Claude.

"Exactly," returned Mervyn, tersely.

A silence followed.

Claude was entirely overcome by the revelation.

Mervyn watched him attentively, and waited.

"Does Greta know?" the former asked, finally.

"You are the first one to whom I have confided the truth. You can comprehend that the discovery placed me in an unpleasant position, and one in which it was difficult for me to see my best course of action. You will appreciate my motives in not disturbing our dear Greta's tranquility until it became necessary. To one who aspired to become her husband, I was in honour bound to state the exact position of affairs."

"Precisely so," said Claude.

He passed back the papers, his handsome face clouded. Then brightening as a thought struck him he remarked.

"After all, it need not be made public. As Greta is your ward, and you are so fond of her, I suppose in the end it will be all the same as far as she is concerned."

"You mean that she will be my heiress," queried Mervyn. "You forget," he added drily. "I am not an old man. I am barely thirty. I may marry."

At this Claude looked indignant.

"Surely you will make some provision for Greta," he urged.

"Be that as it may," rejoined Mervyn, decisively, "whoever marries her must take her, not as Greta Mervyn, the heiress, but as Greta Retzsch, an orphan without a penny she can call her own."

Claude gave him a searching look, moved uneasily in his chair, and coughed.

"You see now the importance of the question you thought so unnecessary as to your means of supporting a wife," said Mervyn, quietly.

"Certainly—quite proper, of course," stammered Claude. "But—under the new aspect of the case, I fear—I really do not see how I can answer it in a satisfactory manner."

Mervyn drew a deep, long breath.

The young man was beginning to hedge, and Greta would be saved from a life-long mistake. It would be time enough to count the cost later.

"It will be best for you to be quite frank as to your intentions," he said. "Do you still desire to make my ward your wife?"

"Of course, nothing can alter my love and admiration for Greta. This hits me very hard, Mr. Mervyn. But, as you intimated, I should not at present be able to support a wife as—as I should wish. Besides, my parents would never consent to my marrying a girl without a—a pedigree, when there are so many good families to select from. You appreciate the extreme delicacy of my position, Mr. Mervyn."

Perhaps, there were those of the young fellow's most ardent girl worshippers who would hardly have admired his appearance now, so devoid of all manliness Mervyn thought.

He rose and regarded him with an air of decision.

"I have, then, to say to Greta that there are insurmountable objections to an engagement of marriage between you and her."

Claude also rose, but did not meet the other's eye, or respond immediately.

"It is hard to lose her—it will break her heart to have to give me up," he burst out at last.

Mervyn frowned.

"Greta is too young and inexperienced to distinguish between a pleasant sense of companionship, and a deeper feeling," he said frigidly.

"I do not think you need apprehend that she will break her heart. In any event, as I told her, I should withhold my consent to a formal betrothal, at present."

At this Claude looked rather piqued and relieved. The latter emotion only, however, found expression in his response.

"Of course, if you thought our engagement inexpedient, the matter is easily arranged, and it only remains for me to withdraw my suit, although I hope you will say to Greta that I do so with great sorrow."

"She shall know your exact words," returned Mervyn, with a truth that the owner was far from comprehending.

Then, with a few confused regrets, Claude hastened to take a departure which even he could not feel to be dignified.

But that he had a realisation of being well out of an awkward predicament was apparent enough as he walked away.

He had gone, and Mervyn was master of the situation. But there are some victories which cost more than a defeat, and this might prove one of them.

While he stood irresolute, uncertain, the strength which had thus sustained him thus far in his purpose leaving him, the door towards which he was afraid to go was flung open, and Greta appeared on the threshold.

"Greta," he cried wistfully.

Without heeding him she rushed across the room to the desk, seizing upon the papers which had been given her suitor to read.

There was a hard look on her features, and the rich colour in her cheeks seemed to burn there like flame.

"Ah," she exclaimed, as her eyes ran eagerly over the letters signed by the man she had always thought her father, which were addressed to someone by the name of Retzsch. It is true then, it was not a story made up for the occasion."

She crumpled the papers in her hands, and turned upon him with a look of anger such as he had never seen in her face before.

The hot blood of her Italian mother was stirred, and boiled in her veins.

"You are a villain, and I hate you," she cried fiercely. He recoiled, growing pale as death, and could not speak.

"You did not think when you were robbing me of my illusions about Claude, that you were also destroying those I had about yourself," she went on in the same vehement way. "You succeeded in making him despicable enough—in blighting my happy dream of love. But you took from me at the same time my Cousin Arnold, whom I have trusted all my life, who was dearer to me than anyone in the world—yes, not even excepting Claude—and you put in his place an underhanded scheming creature, who had not the bravery to take openly what he coveted, but seized upon the first pretence that offered to get it in a hypocritical way."

As these accusations fell on his ear, Mervyn felt like one stunned by a blow from an unknown enemy.

"Greta," he said, his voice trembling, "I was prepared for grief—for censure, even, but not for this. It is true I had to shatter your girlish dream, but would it have been better to have continued to dream, until the awakening came too late?"

"I would not marry Claude Evans if he were to beg me on his knees," she flashed out. "I despise him."

"Then need you condemn me so harshly? If it was bitter to learn the facts of your birth in such a manner,

"Did you wish to see me, Greta?" he questioned.

and at such a moment when you could least bear it, remember there seemed no other way to save you from a mistaken impulse. Of course, dear, you understand that—whatever I said to him—there can be no real difference in your position."

"No difference?" she echoed. "Do you not suppose I comprehend your intentions. Could I not see that you wanted me to think you only claimed the property supposed to be mine, because you were obliged to do so, to prove his unworthiness. Have you not waited all this time for a chance? You mean to say now, of course, that you will not take it from me, knowing all the time that nothing could induce me to touch a farthing of it."

As he listened, the realisation of her meaning penetrated his mind at last, and he saw in what a warped and distorted aspect she regarded the measures he had taken.

A spasm of pain went over him, and seemed to reach his very soul.

He wheeled round abruptly, and going to the window, stood staring out, but seeing nothing.

Greta watched him with a wrathful, rebellious look, into which, however, there crept an expression of bitter anguish.

There was a long interval of silence. When at last he turned towards her again, he was able to speak without anger or unfairness.

"I will not reproach you, Greta," he said. "I can understand that in the first pain of losing your faith in one you thought true you rush to the extreme of suspecting everyone else of being false. Some time you will see more clearly. As for the property, my only desire since my discovery has been to make it legally yours, as it is yours by right. I admit being a little underhand, as you call it, in intimating the reverse to Mr. Evans. But I had to save you from yourself, Greta."

"Oh! But if you are crafty in one direction, you can be in another. I shall never touch the property. You know that. I shall take the name which belongs to me, and go away and earn my livelihood."

"You are speaking from an impulse—you cannot mean to grieve me so much. If I have committed an error of judgment, if I have fallen in your estimation, I am still the Arnold who used to share your joys and sorrows, and to whom you will ever be dear."

She was moved so much by his appeal, that the fiery light in her eyes was dimmed by a sudden rush of tears. But through them she looked at him with an obstinacy that he began to fear could not be overcome.

"If I could forget what you have been to me, this hour would not be so hard," she said. "But now, I would not accept a favour from your hands—I could not. I am not speaking from impulse when I say that I shall always regard this money as yours, and shall act accordingly. You will want it, when you marry, you know."

She was turning to leave the room, when Mervyn, maddened by the possibilities her words held, lost his self-control at last, and, barring her way, cried out, passionately:

"You shall not go, Greta, until you know what going like this means to me—until you know just what you are to me. Even if it puts me still more in the wrong, I must tell you at last that I love you—love you not as a cousin, as a guardian, but as a man loves a woman who alone can make his life complete. Love you, oh, my dearest, with a love which has grown with the years; with a love which would make any sacrifice possible that secured your happiness. Because I love you like this, Greta, because of the hopes I dared to cherish, and which to-day has done so much to destroy, because of the pain I must inevitably suffer, do not wound me unnecessary, I entreat."

Both anger and tears vanished from Greta's eyes as she became conscious of his meaning, and an indefinable expression, part wonder, part confusion, part a betrayal of the strange incomprehensible emotion that thrilled her whole being, took their place.

She stole one swift look at him and knew she could never forget the face that she saw transformed by his long suppressed love.

It was a face, with its strength, its intelligence, its passion, better, better worth gazing at than the handsome one of Claude Evans; and the truth shining in those clear grey eyes shamed her previous unjust suspicions.

But, somehow, she not could ask his pardon, could not respond by any word that might mitigate his suffering. All she did was to clasp her hands together, shrink back and avert her head, then rush from the room, exclaiming as she went, frantically:

"No! no! Do not say more! Do not!"

They did not meet again until the next day at dinner, and then in the presence of his mother.

Mervyn, although the storm of emotion he had experienced had left its traces on his countenance, had regained his self-possession; but Greta was nervous and embarrassed, and did not once glance in his direction.

There was no longer any look of hatred or violence in the dark, beautiful face, but instead a pensiveness such as he had never seen there before.

Was it wholly because of Claude's faithlessness, and her lost illusion, that she grieved; or was there a tinge of regret for the pain she had inflicted on himself? Did she distrust him still? He could not tell. He was sure only of the fact of her avoidance, which did not lessen as the days went on.

He had not the courage to attempt to break through the constraint which now marked all their necessary intercourse, and tell her of the steps he was anxious to take to make his uncle's property legally hers; he trembled still lest she should persist in her resolution to refuse it.

There was no reason why she should not still be Greta Mervyn to the world, as Claude was not likely to betray a secret which would involve placing his own conduct in an aspect that admitted of criticism. Only her own will, consequently, could alter anything. But it was of this perverse, undisciplined will that he was afraid.

Not from Greta, however, but from his mother, did he learn at last precisely what determination the young girl's reserve covered.

Mrs. Mervyn, who loved Greta next to her son, had suspected nothing unusual; for by a mutual, tacit consent, both Arnold and Greta had made an effort to seem as usual when in her presence.

But one morning she broke into the library, where he was in vain trying to work, and sank into a chair entirely overcome.

It was some moments before she could explain the cause of her emotion.

"Oh, Arnold!" she finally ejaculated, "why did you let Greta know of that dreadful discovery? You ought to have known the mischief it would do. She has just been telling me about it, and has sent me to break the news to you that she has made arrangements to leave us next week."

The pen dropped from his fingers, making a disfiguring ink-splash on the neat page of manuscript before him.

"Where is she going?" he questioned, in a voice which his mother would not have recognised as his if he had not been before her.

"She intends to take a situation. Through an old schoolfellow of hers, Miss Rayburn, she has heard of a governess who is ill, and wants a substitute for a few months. Greta says it will give her a start to take the position, and that she is determined no longer to usurp a place that is not hers. My son, what is to be done. I cannot move her in the least."

He did not answer, but sat motionless, with white set lips and bowed head.

"I have no doubt your reasons for revealing this unfortunate secret of her birth to Greta were perfectly justifiable," Mrs. Mervyn went on, distressfully. "Yet it might have been better to have waited until she was older. I—I wish you had consulted me first. But you have so much influence over her, even in her most obstinate moods, surely you can dissuade her from this needless and foolish step."

Arnold rose abruptly.

"I can do nothing, mother," he said, like one who was weary and heart-sick.

With those words he left the room, and a moment after she saw him hurrying across the lawn.

In that long, tumultuous, miserable walk which Mervyn took, he formed a resolution which enabled him to accept Greta's decision for the time being.

To the young girl's astonishment he offered no opposition to her plan and made no attempt to overcome her avoidance.

He told his mother, briefly, that the arrangement was probably for the best at present, and to trust to him to find a way to induce her to come back.

Mrs. Mervyn was obliged, therefore, to yield, and prepared to accompany Greta, and leave her with her friend.

Greta herself showed no signs of altering her determination. But she was very quiet and thoughtful, wholly unlike the laughing, careless, impetuous girl she had been.

Mervyn wondered sometimes if she had really cared more for Claude than he had believed, and after the first anger of his desertion had passed, had begun to pine for him, and to find the rumours of his renewed attentions to Bella Dean unbearable.

In view of the change in her towards him, he was prepared for a very formal leave-taking. She, who had been his darling all these years, would go away without a word to soften the cruelty of her repudiation.

He sat on the terrace in the twilight, heedless of the chilly spring wind, oppressed by the thought of to-morrow, when she would be gone, taking the sunshine of his life for ever. Then into the midst of these reflections came the intuition of another presence near. Expecting to see his mother, he looked round. But it was Greta who stood there, her slim pretty figure outlined against the shadows, her head drooping, her hands clasped together.

"Did you—did you wish to see me, Greta?" he questioned, doubting and hoping, as he sprang to his feet.

"I—I could not go away without telling you how wrong I was to distrust your motives as I did," she faltered. "I cannot take the money. I feel I am right in that; but I am ashamed and sorry that I accused you of any intentions that were not generous and good."

Her words lifted a weight from him, and yet left him sad. For the barrier of his acknowledged and unreturned love, of her implacable determination, was not removed by them.

"I have already forgiven you, Greta," he said, gently.

"And will prove it by keeping the money?" she asked eagerly.

"I hope you will not force me to keep what I never wanted, and what is yours by right," he answered.

She grew pale and red, and pressed her hands together nervously.

She waited impatiently while it was being read.

"I could never feel that it was mine now—never," she said.

He looked at her silently a moment, then taking a step nearer, he responded:

"We will not quarrel about it now, Greta. Some day I hope you will see everything differently. Let us part as friends should. I have not asked you to stay, because I feel it might be better for you to get away for a time from the scene of a painful disillusion. But, before you go, I want you to make me a promise."

"A promise?" she faltered, gazing round as if she would like to run away from him.

"Do not be alarmed. It is nothing that need trouble you in the least. It is only that if I resolve to go away for a time, to pursue certain anthropological researches, you will come when your engagement is ended, and stay with my mother. She will not miss me so much if you are here, and it will be a favour to us both."

Greta's manner changed as she listened. She seemed suddenly like one stunned. He waited in vain for a response.

"Will you not give me this promise—for my mother's sake, if not for mine?" he questioned, at length, again.

"I promise to come if—if you should go away," she said in a low agitated tone. Then abruptly, she added, "Good-bye."

"Good-bye, dear," he answered, sadly, and stooped and touched her forehead with his lips.

This was their parting, and he at least knew that it was very uncertain when and how they would meet again.

For the resolve he had made on becoming convinced of the implacability of her determination to leave her home, was that, since one of them must be an exile, it should be himself, and not Greta.

He was convinced that the sight of him was now too painful and embarrassing to her, and that the love which might have brought them nearer together had, instead, put them irrevocably asunder.

He had felt quite sure that she could be induced to come to his mother, ostensibly for a short time, and that so long as he remained absent she would prolong her stay.

On his own part, he had a consciousness that it was better for him to be among new scenes. He had been living here in a fool's paradise, his fatuous hopes mocked from their ashes.

It seemed to him now that he had been very presumptuous to have imagined the young girl's cousinly fondness would ever be transformed into love.

Far far away from all that was familiar, and all that was associated with her, he would be better able to learn resignation; consequently three months afterwards, he left England, en route for South Africa, where he proposed to make a study of the people. He had timed his departure just before the termination of Greta's temporary engagement, and, in another week, she was again an inmate of her old home.

Mrs. Mervyn had heard from her often, and knew that she had sometimes been homesick and depressed. But she was not prepared for the continuance of the girl's low spirits now that she had come back. It must be she was fretting for Claude, the elder lady decided.

She had heard the story of her son's heroic measures, before he went away, from his own lips, with the reservation of the confession of love into which he had been betrayed, and she had shaken her head over it dubiously.

Claude's betrothal to Bella Dean had been announced before Greta's return, and Mrs. Mervyn had taken pains to prepare her for the news by letter. Greta had made no comment, and when Bella called upon her, received her with an air of triumph with apparent equanimity.

Even on meeting Claude himself, for the first time since their parting as engaged lovers, she was much less embarrassed than he was. Nevertheless, Mrs. Mervyn felt assured that there was in the girl's heart a secret yearning for something gone. It could not be on account of the fact of her birth—she talked freely and frankly about that, with no undue regret. It must be then, she had really loved Claude, or, at least that the shattering of her first romance had left a void nothing could fill.

She did not venture to talk much of her son, therefore, except when his letters came, and then Greta would listen attentively enough to such extracts from them as his mother read aloud. There was never a word about Greta herself in them, though Mrs. Mervyn wrote him always her own doubts and fears concerning her. Neither did Greta ever send him any message, or make any comment on what was in his letters.

But on the day that Claud and Bella were married, after returning from the wedding, Greta broke out suddenly with the unexpected question:

"When is he coming back?"

Mrs. Mervyn put on her spectacles to look at her. There was a far-away expression in her eyes, and there were tired lines about her mouth. Evidently this wedding had been too much for her strength, and she was trying to forget it by talking of Arnold.

"You know he has said nothing about coming back at present," was Mrs. Mervyn's response.

"He has been gone more than three months. I should think you would ask him his intentions," said Greta, in a tone that was not quite natural.

"Perhaps I had better," returned the other, slightly surprised at the suggestion, and Greta said no more.

But from this time she evinced a restlessness that could not be accounted for, Mrs. Mervyn thought, except by the supposition that witnessing Claude's marriage had upset her completely.

When Arnold's next letter came, there was a feverish glitter in her eyes, quite alarming, as she brought it from the postman to his mother.

She waited impatiently while it was being read, and finally interrupted the mother's fond pondering over it.

"You asked him when he was coming back, what does he say?"

Mrs. Mervyn sighed.

"He writes he is much engrossed by his studies, and is likely to remain in Africa for a long time to come."

Without a word more Greta turned and left the room.

It was several hours before Mrs. Mervyn saw her again, and then her restlessness had all disappeared, and she was strangely quiet and pale.

In the months that followed nothing more was said about Arnold's coming back.

Greta had grown very tractable now, and made no references to her determination to earn her own livelihood. But time did not bring back her old happy self.

The months went by, and a year had passed since the day that had changed the current of her pleasant life.

A year that had taken away Bella's air of elation, with much of the pretty colour in her cheeks, and had brought her to say, with tears in her eyes, to her quondam rival:

"Never—never marry, Greta! If girls only knew how selfish men are!"

A year and the fruit trees were again in bloom.

As Greta stood gazing mournfully at the blossoms white in the moonlight that streamed over them, Mrs. Mervyn's agitated voice behind her broke in upon her meditations:

"I am much affected by what I have heard, Greta. Arnold's lawyer has been here, you know, and he says my son is going to buy an ostrich farm, and stay in Africa permanently, or at least for many years. How can I bear him to be away from me so long?"

But Greta returned no sympathetic answer. She had drawn a quick, gasping breath; and then, as Mrs. Mervyn paused, she said moodily:

"Ostriches are supposed to be the most stupid creatures on earth. I do not see how anyone can be interested in them."

As she spoke she went down the steps, and on across the lawn.

Hurt and perplexed, Mrs. Mervyn stared after her a moment, then went back into the house.

Had she followed the young girl, she would have found her on the garden seat, weeping as though her heart would break, and have made a better guess as to the cause of her hidden sorrow of the past year.

Greta herself had made no mistake as to what it was she had missed out of her life all this time. Since she had seen that look of passionate love on Arnold's face, even in that moment of mortification and confusion and change, she had realised dimly that something in her nature had been awakened by it, which had never responded to any look of Claude's.

It had not needed the significant words of his wife to convince her she had made a false start, which but for Arnold could not have been retrieved. Slowly the consciousness had grown, from which at first she had shrunk afraid, that he whom she had loved as a child and a girl, was he whom alone she could love as a woman.

Those lonely, homesick days had shown her how little she had known her own mind, and stamped upon her heart a longing for another look of love from Arnold's eyes, which had never left it since.

Now—now she would see him no more. It was too evident that she had driven him from his home. Perhaps he despised her—how could he help it, when she had been so obdurate, so unjust—a spoiled child?

"Oh, Arnold! Arnold!" she sobbed out, "will you never, never come back to me?"

The trees overhead rustled in the breeze, and a shower blossoms fell upon her. Then a voice said, through the still evening air:

"I am here, Greta."

With a shriek, she started up. Surely it was a phantom of her imagination—not Arnold himself who stood there, with the love-light in his eyes that she had yearned so long to see?

"Do not be frightened, dear. I had a sudden impulse to come home that I could not resist. I have just arrived. Mother said you were here, and I came to find you. Is it true that you wanted me, Greta—is it true you said, 'Arnold come back'?"

She was pale and trembling, but as he held out his arms wistfully, hopelessly, she ran into them, and laid her head on his shoulder.

"I am not worthy of your love, Arnold; but I will try to be—I will try very hard. I will do anything you wish—only—do not leave me again, for I cannot live without you."

The Tiger's Bell.

THE weather that autumn, was so fine and warm, as the forecasts say, that almost everyone stayed on at Loch Neven—that is, of course, everyone who was worth talking to or talking about. And others came, sporting people, not "sporty" people, who are an abomination in the eyes of the god Pan and his true disciples, but men, real men, clad in weather-beaten tweeds, disreputable head gear and heavy tramping boots and accompanied by dogs and guns.

These tarried not at Loch Neven, though femininity there was sweet and lovable and flirtatious, but hied away by waggon to the north; save one, MacNichol, who tarried because fate brought him face to face the next morning with someone in white, someone fresh as the morning, and because the law of natural selection bade him tarry.

So the good MacNichol forgot the promises he had made to his friends in town of no end of braces of partridge and mallard; forgot his sworn determination to take a pair of antlers home, and let the other comrades in arms go north; and the ducks continued to fly in across the red of the western sky, and the gun of the native pot-hunter echoed from afar, but he neither saw nor heard.

And everything would perhaps have gone well and ended happily and uneventfully, had not interference in the shape of one Bronson came by a subsequent boat and made himself obnoxious in the eye of MacNichol. He was a plausible, well-dressed fellow, immaculate from morning until midnight, and he neither swam nor fished nor shot nor played tennis, but straightway monopolised Miss Muriel Manning's society to the exclusion particularly of the tardy MacNichol.

It was maddening to Mac to hear Bronson talk; and his appetite fell away, and he became moody and taciturn, until at length even the preoccupied noticed his complaint.

"They've got the queerest yarn up the river," said Jimmie Brown one evening, as all the guests sat at ease upon the broad verandah of the hotel. "When I was up there this afternoon a farmer told me there was a strange wild animal in the woods, a big yellow thing that wasn't like any other animal that he had ever seen except in the pictures and circuses."

"What do you think it was?" said Bronson.

"Well, he said it might seem like foolishness to say so, but he believed it was a tiger."

Some of the ladies screamed. Bronson said:

"He must have thought you easy, Brown. Next time it will be elephants, or rhinoceri from Lake Nyanza."

"I tell you, he was in dead earnest," said Brown. "He wasn't the only one, either, he said, who had seen it. One of his neighbours, he said, had lost a sheep that they couldn't find a trace of, not even a lock of wool; and another neighbour, he said, had been driving back one day, and his team had all of a sudden become possessed with fear, and wouldn't go any farther. I tell you, there's something strange about it."

"Very," said Bronson sententiously.

"Oh, a man who knows as much as you do about live stock might easily think he saw live elephants and rhinosceroses!" retorted Brown. "If you weren't so slow that you couldn't walk more'n a hundred yards past the tennis court, you'd see buffalo in the meadow and hippopotami switching their tails over the rocks."

"Hippopotami," echoed Bronson, musingly.

"What do you think about it, Mr. MacNichol?" She said, breaking the tension.

MacNichol felt for his tobacco pouch. It was dusk, and MacNichol was dark skinned, so that they did not see him flush. But he always flushed, at least inwardly, when She spoke to him. Remembering this, he did not light his pipe just then, for one flame might have betrayed another, and because Bronson was looking at him from beneath his heavy lids.

"I think it possible," MacNichol said.

"Won't you say why?" she said.

"Never mind the why and wherefore," hummed the sceptical Bronson. "It's sufficient that MacNichol thinks it possible."

"And why impossible, O Self Sufficiency?" said MacNichol.

"What! elephants and rhinoceri and hippopotami?" said the evasive Bronson.

"Yes, elephants and rhinoceri, if you like," said Brown.

"Is this a kindergarten?" said Bronson.

"We will suppose that it is your class, and I will give you an object lesson," said MacNichol, "to demonstrate my belief in the possibility of a tiger having been seen by Brown's farmer.

"Not long ago," he continued, after he had lighted his briar, "a circus showed at Smithville, forty miles from here. During its stay there, so the papers said, a tiger escaped from its cage and its keeper and made its way into the hills to the north——"

"There you see!" cried Brown triumphantly, while the ladies exclaimed in horror, and drew in their chairs.

"At least we hear," said Bronson sneeringly.

"Of course," said MacNichol, "when Mr. Bronson sees the tiger we shall both see and hear."

"Yes, we'll hear Bronson all right," said Brown; and that was one on Bronson, for he did not like to hear her laugh at him.

"Of course," he said, ere the laugh had died, "Mr. MacNichol has every intention of hunting the tame tiger."

"Every intention," said MacNichol. "Would you care to accompany me?"

Brown laughed annoyingly.

"Not on a wild goose chase," said Bronson a little out of humour.

"It will be a wild tiger hunt," said MacNichol. "If there is any chasing——" he paused significantly, and Brown laughed triumphantly.

"You might carry Mac's gun, you know," he said gaily. "Only no climbing trees, Bronson, no climbing trees."

"I'll bet Mr. MacNichol twenty pounds he don't see any tiger," cried Bronson vulgarly, "and I'll bet him another twenty that if he does see one he won't shoot him."

"I'll compromise," said MacNichol, "and bet you fifty that if I see the tiger I shall kill him."

"That's all right," said Bronson, "only——"

"Only," said the mind-reading MacNichol, "you would have to take my word that I hadn't seen the tiger. Quite right. We will hunt him together, you and I and Brown. Brown can be stake-holder."

"That's all right!" said Bronson again. "But if you think I've nothing to do except tramp through a bush all day on the jolly of a hayseed, you're away off! Tell you what I'll do; if you shoot the tiger, I'll give ——"

"If Mr. MacNichol shoots the tiger," She put in adroitly, "you will give twenty pounds towards the bell for the new church."

"Good idea!" said Bronson. "I'll make it the whole bell!"

And so it was agreed.

And now, from morn till eve, from dawn till dusk even by moonlight, Brown and MacNichol did the hills and hollows, the marshes and meadows of the country roundabout, intent upon the slaughter of that mythical tiger, until at length even Jimmy Brown grew tired if not sceptical, and returned to tennis and the dance and flirtation.

At the end of three days, MacNichol had to submit to much chaff, in which even she joined, and it would have provoked a less determined man into packing up and getting out. But MacNichol, smiling grimly, held his peace.

More stories floated in from farmers of the strange "something" that had frightened horses and incidentally the farmers themselves. The farmers had gone out, armed to the teeth with family heirlooms more dangerous to the family than the quarry; but nothing came of that.

And MacNichol did not say that the story he had told of a tiger escaping from a circus menagerie at Smithville was pure fiction, invented at the time to silence the aggressive Bronson; yet he clung to his strange faith that something—if not a tiger, then something alien, something strange, perhaps even uncanny—was haunting the wilds about Loch Neven, and his adventurous spirit would not be quenched.

And it was upon the fourth day that his perseverance was in some measure rewarded! For suddenly coming upon the sandy shore of the river, miles above Loch Neven, in a desolate place, he came upon the footprints of the tiger!

At least, he concluded they were a tiger's. They were large, feline, terrible. He had never before seen the print of a tiger's paw, and these if not a tiger's were those of a very large cat of some sort.

Perhaps, after all, he said to himself, a monstrous wild cat was in the locality; and remembering the proclivities of wild cats, he turned half-fearfully and looked into the trees roundabout.

Failing to find the returning trail, as the ground above the sand was barren and rocky, he came again to the place, and waited. But the strange creature came not; and Mac, though believing firmly in its existence and proximity, came to doubt his luck, and reviled the freak of humour that had led him into the undertaking.

Meantime, the weather remained marvellously mild and fair, and the moon grew round and smiling above the gaiety of Loch Neven.

MacNichol had come in one night, tired and ill-humoured, from a four mile row up the river, where he had lain for an hour or so hoping against hope that Fate would bring the cat his way. It was eleven o'clock, and the mellow moonlight flooded all the water and the long, crescent-shaped beach, turning river and shore to gold.

Mac could see as he walked up, rifle in hand, to the hotel, that Muriel and Bronson were sitting on the beach a little way below the bathing houses almost within the shadow of the deep pine grove. He could hear their voices, and her laughter, which doubtless was at his his expense.

Poor Mac! He began to pity himself, and then decided that a fool deserved no pity.

When he got to his room, which overlooked the beach, he lit his pipe and sat at his window, and by the clear light of the moon re-read a newspaper paragraph that had come by chance into his hand one day.

The paper slipped to the floor, and MacNichol sat at his window, smoking and thinking. He was not thinking of his tiger now, but of the "lady" down there with Bronson, on the beach. Mac could see or thought he could see, with his emerald eye, the gleam of Bronson's diamond upon her hand, even as he could see the ruby-like glow of Bronson's cigar.

He wished he had never come to Loch Neven! If he had never come to Loch Neven, he would never, perhaps, have seen her, he would never have come across this confounded paragraph with its cock-and-bull story about—

A moving something—a shadow—grew out of the blackness of the shadow of the grove; a stealthy, silent, seemingly impalpable something that moved along the sand. But no one saw—no one, save MacNichol, sitting breathless and wide-eyed at his window.

How still it was for a moment! Then came the music of the pine tops moved into murmuring by a vagrant breeze; and after that, the music of her voice, low and sweet; and then again silence, to MacNichol, save for the thumping of his heart as he snatched his rifle from the corner, sprang nimbly in shoeless feet through his window to the balcony, ran along that to its end, climbed over it and dropped noiselessly to the sand twelve feet below. And then as he turned, there in the shadow of the hotel, he saw, not the shadow of the tiger, but the tiger itself!

And at that moment, even as he ran into the moonlight, fell upon one knee and levelled his rifle, the full left side of the tiger toward him, his involuntary vision caught an impression of Bronson springing to his feet and running like a terror-stricken thing down the beach. And as he ran, Bronson screamed like a maniac.

Then She turned her head, wondering, and saw fastened upon her the horrid gleam in the moonlight of those awful yellow eyes; and petrified by horror, she sat like white stone, fascinated, mesmerized, unable to stir a finger, not even the finger upon which Bronson's diamond lay cynically gleaming. Then she closed her eyes, for the tiger was about to spring.

And even as he made to spring, MacNichol's rifle spoke out, even as the rifle spoke MacNichol sprang up and ran madly towards her, ready to give his life, and even as he ran, the beast flung itself into the air, and fell dully and lifeless across the yellow sand.

The tiger was dead. And so it is no wonder MacNichol held her white and lovely, and trembling now, in his arms, though there was much screaming in many keys from the hotel, and heads at windows and voices calling, and eyes upon them, and even Bronson, panting and white, coming back cautiously along the beach.

"You have your wish," she managed to say, gazing at the prone bulk of the gaunt beast lying there in the glamour of the moonlight, black and yellow like an outcast spirit of the night. And she drew back, leaning against him.

"My wish," murmured MacNichol. "Yes, I have my wish in part."

And perhaps the pressure this arm gave was involuntary.

"I mean you have killed the tiger," she said gently withdrawing from his arm.

"I was not thinking of the tiger," said MacNichol.

"No," she said, looking down.

"I had another wish, I have wished for you, because I have loved you from the moment I first saw you."

"You have saved my life," she said, looking steadily at him. "You may have—your other wish—if you care."

"Not because of this, altogether?" pleaded MacNichol, with a gesture towards the tiger.

"Perhaps I want you to take care of me always," she said smiling, and holding out her hands.

"By George!" said Bronson, coming up. "You were right about the tiger, after all, MacNichol; I've always heard that a tiger could be scared by an umbrella or a good yell. Didn't have an umbrella, so I thought I'd try the yell, and I thought if the yell failed, and I ran a bit, you know, he would follow me, and——"

"He couldn't run fast enough," she said. "But fortunately, there was one man near."

"Oh, look here!" said Bronson. "Every fellow don't go walking round with a rifle, you know, Muriel."

"Not 'Muriel' now, Mr. Bronson."

"Oh, I say!" said Bronson, staring.

"You will, I am sure, not forget the bell which you now owe to the new church."

And then she turned and walked away on MacNichol's arm, leaving Bronson motionless and staring, and a dozen people in negligé gathering in.

Bronson went away by the early boat next morning; but he was as good as his word, and sent an express order to the vicar for a goodly sum with which to buy the bell.

In due time the church was completed, and the bell arrived and was put in place, and in clear and resonant tones called the people to worship. When I attended service there this Autumn, I met MacNichol and his wife. Mac, brown and radiant, and his wife even lovelier within the past twelve months.

They were spending their first married weeks at Loch Neven, under a moon as wonderful and warm as that of a year ago.

The tiger? The tiger was the expensive importation of a wealthy individual, who owned a vast natural park which he purposed turning into a sort of cosmopolitan menagerie and game preserve, by turning into it wild animals of all sorts from all parts of the world.

The tiger had got away and was making tracks south, and it was the knowledge of that, communicated through the medium of a newspaper item, which had kept MacNichol on the hunt, solely of course, for the philanthropic purpose of winning for the chapel a tiger's bell. Of course.

Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XIX.—HIS NIGHT ADVENTURE AT HIS COUNTRY HOUSE.

In the last sketch it was related how Mr. Bowser had hired a farmhouse for the benefit of his health and rushed Mrs. Bowser and the cook out there at an hour's notice. The house was found in such a state of dilapidation that when night came the cook was weeping, Mrs. Bowser was homesick and Mr. Bowser was doing his best to make out that things would be all right next day.

Amid the songs of larks and blackbirds and the hoots of owls they went to bed. Mr. Bowser had just fallen asleep and was dreaming that he was a farmer eleven feet high, cutting grass seven feet tall with a scythe fourteen feet long, when Mrs. Bowser awoke him to say:

"Get up this minute! I can hear someone prowling about outside the house!"

"My dear woman," he answered as he slowly got out of bed, "I am getting tired of this nonsense. If you are going to keep it up I'll send you home the first thing in the morning. I came out here for rest and quiet, but you——"

"Don't you hear footsteps?" she interrupted.

"It's probably a rabbit hopping about, and I'll open the door and scare the legs off him."

He went downstairs and unlocked the door and threw it open, and was just on the point of uttering a "Shoo!" when a man appeared before him and said:

"Hello, old pal, but what you doin' in my nest?"

"Who—who are you?" demanded Mr. Bowser in considerable confusion.

"Dusty Jim, of course, and you'd better clear out at once."

"Look here, you old tramp, but what are you doing about this house?" shouted Mr. Bowser as he recovered from his surprise and began to get cross.

"And what are you doin'?" shouted Dusty Jim in reply. "I've bin sleepin' in this crib for the last three months, and I don't propose to let no man turn me out. Come out, or I'll make you tired!"

Mrs. Bowser and the cook were now calling to know what was the matter, and as Mr. Bowser fell back from the door to answer them the tramp slipped inside. He was a big man and a bad man, but he had made a mistake.

Mr. Bowser turned and tackled him at once, and in five minutes he was a beaten man and being dragged off the doorstep by the heels. Mrs. Bowser was crying, and the cook was on her knees, praying as Mr. Bowser shut the door and demanded:

"Now, then, what have you broken loose about? You two women seem determined to act like idiots. I hired this place for the benefit of my health, but no sooner do we get out here than you try to upset things. I tell you I want it to stop!"

"You—you call this a holiday?" sobbed Mrs. Bowser as Dusty Jim was heard moving off for the road.

"Of course it is. I never saw such an inconsistent woman. We are out in the country. We are getting the benefit of the fresh air and the songs of the night birds, and yet because a few things are not to your liking you make a fuss. You may cry and sob and howl and kick, but we shall stay here just the same. Now you two go to bed again, and I'll sit up the rest of the night and keep things straight."

As the night was warm, Mr. Bowser opened the door and sat down on the steps. The house had hardly become quiet when Dusty Jim reappeared. He had come in peace to make inquiries. He was willing to acknowledge that he was a beaten man, but he wanted to ask:

"What you doin' in my nest?"

"How did you do it, old pal? You're a fat man and a baldheaded man, and I thought I could do you in two minits. If you'll show me that little trick you used, I'll give you half-a-sov."

"If you don't shift yourself," replied Mr. Bowser as he rose up—"if you don't get a mile away before I count a hundred, I'll mop the whole farm with your body."

"And you won't show me the trick?"

"Never!"

"All right, old boy. The conquered flies before the conqueror. If I had that trick I'd lick every tramp between here and London, but I ain't goin' to stop and argufy the matter."

An hour later, as Mr. Bowser leant against the doorpost and dozed, something cold touched his hand, and he sprang up to find a stray dog sitting in front of him. It was a dog in search of a kind-hearted master and all the comforts of home, but he had made a mistake in the number of the house.

Mr. Bowser uttered a yell which woke up both women and then went for the dog. In his hasty movements he tripped over his own feet and took a roll among the weeds round the house, and he had just reached his feet again when Mrs. Bowser appeared at the door to ask:

He tripped over his own feet.

"Is it murder or robbery, or what?"

"And if it ain't, then what is it?" added the cook from behind.

"Oh, you are dancing about again," he replied as he came forward. "It beats all creation how you women act. Why in thunder can't you go to bed and stay there like sensible people?"

"But when you screamed out I thought——"

"I never screamed out. I was yelling at the dog. I have tried to be a patient man since we arrived here yesterday, but I warn you that the limit has been reached."

"What a holiday!" murmured Mrs. Bowser, with tears in her eyes.

"I know I shall never see home again," sobbed the cook as she turned away.

"There you go!" shouted Mr. Bowser as he combed the weeds out of his hair. "What has happened to spoil this holiday? Nothing whatever. I have simply licked a tramp and frightened away a stray dog. Now, don't let me hear again from you till morning."

He resumed his place on the step, and the house grew quiet again. Dusty Jim and the stray dog were far away, and there could be nothing more to disturb the remainder of the night.

Mr. Bowser had dozed again for half-an-hour when the owl which had hooted in the evening and gone off to see a friend now returned to have another try at it. He alighted in a tree across the road and, drawing a long breath, uttered a "hoo-o-o-o" that would have lifted a bag of potatoes a foot high. It lifted Mr. Bowser off the doorstep, and it lifted Mrs. Bowser and the cook out of bed, and for two minutes there was wild alarm.

Day was breaking, and when the women declared they would not go to bed again Mr. Bowser did not oppose them. The thought was in his mind to start for home at sunrise and to seek out the man from whom he had hired the farm and kill him as quickly as possible, but Mrs. Bowser spoilt it all by saying:

"If you will only take me home to-day I won't ask for a new thing for the next year."

"Go to all this trouble for a twelve hours' holiday!" he replied, with his obstinacy aroused in a second. "Never, Mrs. Bowser. We came out here to find rest and peace. It's just the place for it. Do you suppose we are to be driven back home by a tramp, an owl, and a dog? Not much. We stay here for the summer."

"Then I'm afraid you'll have to bury me out among the weeds."

"There'll be no funeral. I am already feeling better for the pure air, and in a week you won't know yourself. Look at that sunrise and tell me if you ever saw anything to beat it. Italy never furnished a sunrise like that. I'll go down to the road to have a better look at it while cook is getting breakfast."

When Mr. Bowser reached the gate he found Dusty Jim seated on a log opposite. The tramp rose up and removed his hat and bowed.

"Do you want another licking?" was shouted at him across the gate.

"No, kind sir," he humbly replied. "I'm a beaten man, and a beaten man don't want any more of it. But I came back to see if you wouldn't really tell me how it was done. I'm wantin' to lick Highway Bill, and if you'll show me the trick I'll run him out of the country."

Mr. Bowser rubbed his hands and opened the gate, and Dusty Jim fled for the third time. M. Quad.

A Narrative of the Future.

THERE was trouble in the Central Rain Producing Company. The last order for a two-hours' rain had not been satisfactorily accomplished.

The rain had only lasted twenty minutes, and as this company made a speciality of guaranteeing the length of storms, or money refunded, this job had been a losing one for them, both in pocket and reputation.

Wallace Carlton was held to blame for the failure, as he had used his new explosive in the balloon that was sent up without consulting the company who employed him.

Wallace had insisted that there was no fault in his explosive, but that the failure was wholly due to the fuse being too long, thereby allowing the balloon to get too far away before exploding. His explosive in a balloon travelled more rapidly than the other kinds used.

But Mr. Wilson, manager of the company, was not to be appeased, and Wallace was officially notified that the company no longer desired his services.

"This is only an excuse," Wallace muttered; "the real reason for my discharge is that he knows I love his daughter. But I will prove the value of my explosive to his cost, and I will win Ethel yet."

A week from that day was the time set for a grand fête on Mr. Wilson's grounds in honour of a certain influential political friend.

Wallace determined that the fête should be deluged with such a rain as the most successful explosions had never yet brought upon this earth.

But Fate had another victory in store for him. That same morning Ethel Wilson had started homeward on the air-ship Pegasus. It proved a most disastrous voyage, for a few minutes after the start there was blown against them a balloon, sent up for a small local shower, which exploded as it struck the Pegasus.

Fortunately, it was of the smallest size (known as the lawn-sprinkler balloon), and the Pegasus, though badly shaken up, was not blown to atoms, as would have been the case had the balloon been of the regular rainstorm size.

One of her hydrogen gas compartments remained unhurt, and the Pegasus still floated slowly along, though entirely unmanageable.

Floating thus it came into the view of Wallace Carlton, who was watching the slow ascent of a rain balloon just sent up by the man who had been promoted to his place.

Wallace saw with horror that the air-ship must be blown to powder when the balloon exploded. Suddenly he remembered that Ethel was coming home in the Pegasus this very trip.

There was no thought in his mind of his own risk; his only thought was that he must save Ethel. His private flying-machine was anchored near. He looked at his watch.

In just two minutes the balloon would explode; he knew exactly the workings of those slow, old-fashioned things. Could he possibly reach it and extinguish the fuse in time?

Springing into his machine he weighed anchor and darted upward, steering straight for the slowly-ascending balloon. It seemed ages to him as he flew upward, straight and true as a bullet.

On came the Pegasus. Would he be in time, and would he do it?

There was no time for slackening speed as he neared the balloon. He must sail by close enough to reach the fuse, yet not to collide with the balloon, or he would explode it with the concussion.

It was a beautiful and neat piece of airmanship.

Now he could see the fuse. It was burning not four inches from the balloon! He leaned far out as he swept by, and firmly grasped the fuse in one hand.

His hand will carry through life the scar where the slow match burned deep into it before it was extinguished.

But Ethel was safe.

He could see her leaning over the side of the Pegasus, white with terror.

Wallace sailed up to the disabled air-ship, and threw her a rope; then he slowly descended with the Pegasus in tow, and landed on the firm earth in safety.

A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

By WILLIAM WESTALL.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

Major Wyvenhoe leaves England on the Campanella with a detachment of troops, raised by Major Barnish, to help the Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty. Major Barnish is accompanied on the vessel by his wife. At Cork a detachment of Irishmen is taken on board, together with General Molyneux, who is connected with the Venezuelan Army, his secretary and chaplain. When the vessel has been out a few days Major Barnish meets with a fatal accident, and on that same day a mutiny breaks out among the troops, but it is speedily quelled.

Shortly after this Venezuela is reached, and as Captain Cautley does not know the coast well a pilot has to be obtained, and it is found that Conroy, one of the chief mutineers, is able to act as such, and the course of the ship is intrusted to him.

On arrival at Pampatar Major Wyvenhoe and Captain Cautley are received by the Governor, General Arismendez, and his second in command, General Urdenetta.

During the stay there of the Campanella the British officers are lavishly entertained, and Major Wyvenhoe excites the jealousy of Arismendez' son, Ramon, owing to his attentions to a Spanish lady. This results in a challenge, and a duel is about to commence when Arismendez appears on the scene and stops it, and just at this time the alarm guns from the fort are heard, on which Arismendez orders everyone to their posts.

CHAPTER VIII.

An Encounter with the Enemy.

The governor's stirring words were followed by a general stampede, everybody bolting from the grove and making for the beach, in a state of great excitement, except the skipper, who took it all very coolly.

"You need not call out the troops. I don't think there is going to be an invasion," he remarked to Arismendez in broken Spanish, having by this time acquired a sufficient knowledge of the language to make himself intelligible.

"The alarm guns are only fired when danger threatens, and I know of no danger but invasion," answered the general curtly. "And look, what is that?"

"A rocket from the Campanella."

And then Cautley explained that by putting two and two together—Conroy's scarcely veiled threat and the movements of the sloops, which had been reinforced by several flecheras, as reported by fishermen and others, he had come to the conclusion that an attempt would be made before long to cut out the brig, and as it was just as likely to be made that night as any other, he had arranged for a boat to be sent seaward on a reconnoitring expedition, with orders to fire a rocket if anything suspicious were seen, which was to be repeated by the ship as a warning to us.

"And I suppose," he added, "that the commandant of the fort, thinking that the rockets betokened danger, fired the alarm guns?"

"Which shows that he was on the alert, and he did quite right."

"At any rate you did not see the rockets," retorted Arismendez sharply.

"I should have done but for the duel, which I had no reason to expect. All the same, we can beat off the dons without calling the entire population to arms. The wind is too light for the sloops to venture among the shallows. It can only be a boat attack. But we shall soon know. I am going on board right away."

"Is there nothing we can do?"

"Of course there is. Here are two flecheras close inshore. Put fifty soldiers and a few sailors on board each of them, and let them join us as soon as possible, and I should like Major Wyvenhoe to bring two or three score of his men for service on board."

"It shall be done, Señor Capitan," answered the governor and Cautley, stepping into his gig, went off to his ship.

I saw at once that Arismendez was a bold leader; his orders were clear, peremptory, to the point and promptly obeyed.

One of the flecheras which were brought to the jetty was to be manned by Englishmen and commanded by Martley, the other by natives under the command of Don Ramon, but both were to place themselves at Captain Cautley's disposal and strictly obey his injunctions.

"Disobedience will be punished with death," said the governor sternly, a warning which, as I thought, was given for the special benefit of his son, whose hot temper might lead him to refuse obedience to an Englishman and take a line of his own.

Flecheras, it may be well to explain, are narrow boats from thirty-five to a hundred feet long, carrying one gun or more, generally two-masted, yet easily rowed, and admirably adapted by their build and light draught for service in shallow waters.

While the two in question were being prepared for action I was getting my detachment together, and it was so smartly done that we ran under the Campanella's counter in little more than half-an-hour after the alarm, and several minutes ahead of the flecheras.

So soon as we were aboard the boats were sent back, and when the flecheras came alongside they were ordered to remain there pending further developments, the troops and seamen being meanwhile enjoined to observe strict silence.

We found the brig cleared for action and the men at quarters, though it was, as yet, uncertain whether we should be attacked. The people who had been out reconnoitring reported having seen two big ships and the vague outline of several large boats under the lee of a small island some six miles to the southward, on which they hurried back, and when they sighted the lights of Pampatar sent up a couple of rockets.

"The big ships are no doubt the sloops, and the large boats, flecheras or launches," said Cautley. "I am pretty sure the dons did not see the rockets, and hope they did not hear the guns, for if they think we are on the alert they may not attack, which would be a disappointment after all the trouble we have taken."

"Why not send the boat again?" I asked.

"It would be of no use and might do harm. We cannot be more prepared than we are, and if Conroy, who is sure to be there, were to catch sight of the boat, he would draw conclusions. We must just wait, and it won't be a long wait either, for if the villains don't come soon they won't come at all. It will be daylight in two hours. But we cannot both talk and listen. There is noise enough already. Pass the word for silence, Mr. Pritt."

The order was obeyed, all voices were hushed, and the skipper and the rest of us, leaning over the rail and bulwarks, peered into the darkness, listening intently.

Soon a faint rhythmic sound, like the splash of oars, was heard above the ripple of the tide. Gradually it grew more distinct, and presently, through the night glass, could be distinguished shadowy forms moving on the face of the water.

Cautley gave a grunt of satisfaction, and a murmur, which sounded like a cheer, ran round the ship.

The skipper's idea was to make no sign until our assailants were so near as to be easily seen, then to give them a broadside, followed by a volley of musketry, and at them with the flecheras and the corvette's launch, which was lowered and ready. But Conroy was too crafty to fall in with the skipper's plan. He made what soldiers would call a front attack, thereby exposing his boats to the fire of one gun only—the bow-chaser, instead of eight. There were four of them, flecheras of the largest class, each carrying two pivot-guns, and, as presently appeared, crowded with men.

When the leading boat came near enough to serve as a target we gave her a shot from the bow-chaser, which, though it went home, and probably did some execution, failed to stop her. On this all the flecheras let fly, most of the balls missing, though one hit the foremast, and the other took off a man's head.

"The beggars mean boarding," said the skipper to Martley and Don Ramon. "Be prepared, and as they run under our bows, fire slap into them with your two guns, then a volley of musketry, close action and cold steel."

To which Martley answered, "Ay, ay, sir," and Don Ramon, "Con mucho gusto, Señor Capitan (with great pleasure, Mr. Captain)."

The flecheras were so low in the water that the bow-chaser was of little use, and as they drew near of no use at all.

Then came the tug of war, the Spaniards attacking us with a boldness and resolution I never saw surpassed. Though engaged at close quarters by our flecheras and the launch, and assailed by a murderous musketry fire from the ship, they ranged alongside, and nearly a hundred big black fellows, who climbed like monkeys and fought like wild cats, succeeded in getting on board. In the end, though only after a desperate hand-to-hand struggle, all, except a few who jumped overboard, were slain. Yield they would not, go back they could not, for a cold shot, dropped into the nearest Spanish flechera, had started a plank and sunk her, and our flecheras and the launch, still hotly engaged, had thrust themselves between the others and the brig, all being so intermingled that it was difficult to distinguish friend from foe.

After a desperate hand-to-hand struggle all were slain.

"The black fellows are Zambos," said General Arismendez, "and Zambos neither give nor take quarter nor fear death."

The defeat of the Zambos was the end of the battle. The Spaniards, having lost one of their flecheras and half their men, beat a retreat, unpursued except by a few futile shots from the bow-chaser and the boats.

Our losses were also heavy, and many of us were hurt. Martley, Don Ramon, and Pritt rather badly; Cautley had a nasty cut on the head, and myself several wounds which, however, though unpleasant, were not serious.

Altogether it had been a stirring night, and even keen fighters like the skipper and Don Ramon were quite satisfied, except with the result, Cautley having counted on capturing or destroying at least two of the enemy's boats.

General Arismendez, on the contrary, thought we had done exceedingly well, saying that but for the danger signals and the skipper's foresight the brig must have been cut out, and that fighting Zambos, of whom the flechera's crews were mainly composed, was a very different matter to fighting Spaniards or Creoles.

Digitized by Google

Zambos, he explained, are a mixed breed, descended from fugitive slaves who have taken to the woods and intermarried with Indians. In feature and physique more African than American, they combine great strength with an untameable ferocity, delighting even more in carnage than battle, and fighting only to kill. Though more friendly to the patriots than the royalists, they never hesitate to take the side which pays the best and promises the most bloodshed.

I agreed with Arismendez. The attack was well planned and ably led, and had we been less thoroughly prepared might have succeeded. It was so well-timed, indeed, as to suggest a suspicion that the Spaniards had heard about the ball, the date of which was a matter of common knowledge at Pampatar ten days or a week before it came off, and thought to take us unawares. I asked the general if this were possible.

"Quite," he said. "There are traitors everywhere. Nothing is easier than to get secret intelligence from Cumana, if you like to pay the price, and I suppose it is just as easy for the Spaniards to get intelligence from Pampatar on the same terms."

It was the general opinion that Conroy had piloted the flecheras and probably commanded the expedition, but as to this and also whether he was alive or dead, no information was forthcoming—for a very good reason, we had taken no prisoners, and as there was barely enough light to distinguish between black faces and white, he might have fallen or escaped without being recognised. Some of the Spanish dead were stripped before being thrown overboard and papers had been found which, when they were examined, might solve the mystery. These were of course handed to the governor.

My quarters were at the posada, an inn of modest pretensions with a patio (inner court), a verandah, and a very obliging posadero, where I had a large chamber with bare white-washed walls, furnished with a truckle bed, one chair and a washstand, and infested, especially at night, by rats, cockroaches and mosquitoes. For which cause I had hitherto slept in a hammock slung in the patio, but as I was weak with loss of blood and my wounds rendered rest for a few days imperative, I had to keep to my room, the patio being available only at night. Yet I had no reason to complain of my lot, John Ready catered for me and kept me company, and visitors came every day. One of the first was Señor Don Esteban Sidonia with kind inquiries and a beautiful nosegay from his wife and Inez, his daughter, and an intimation that when I was sufficiently recovered to get about it would give him great pleasure to place his house and all that it contained at my disposal.

It was his way of asking me to become his guest, but as I had not fallen in love with his daughter and it would have been as much as my life was worth to accept the invitation, the young lady having many admirers and Ramon and Arismendez many friends, I gave Don Esteban hearty thanks and an evasive answer.

Another visitor was General Urdenetta, who after some fulsome compliments began to ask insidious questions and make innuendos against the governor, whom he accused of incapacity, and more than hinted that affairs would be much better managed if the Supreme Chief were to provide him with a successor. To which I replied that these were matters that did not concern me, but that, personally, I held the governor in esteem and considered him my friend. On this Urdenetta protested that he also had a great regard for the governor, and tried to laugh the matter off as though he had been jesting, but with an ill grace, and I saw that by refusing his advances I had incurred his enmity.

On the following day came General Arismendez, looking very serious. After we had exchanged inquiries and compliments he said that he had a bit of paper to show me. It was found in one of the Spaniards' pockets, and answered the question I had asked him. The bit of paper was an unsigned letter without address, consisting of a single sentence: "On the night of next Monday week the governor gives a ball at which all the military officers and the officers of the Campanella will be present."

"So you were right," he added.

"You also," quoth I; "but who is the spy—or the traitor?"

"I think I know, yet fear I cannot prove. Compare the handwriting of the unsigned letter with this" (handing me another letter) "but don't look at the signature, which is on the other leaf, until you have given your opinion."

After carefully comparing them I said that despite some slight differences I had no doubt that both letters were in the same hand.

"Now turn over the leaf."

Which I did. It was signed "Urdenetta."

"But it is not possible. Why should the general commit such an infamy? What conceivable motives——"

"Mainly to injure me; incidentally to injure you English, whom he detests. Urdenetta is intriguing to supplant me, had the Campanella been taken I should have been blamed for inviting her officers to my wife's ball, instead of leaving them on board to look after the ship, and my enemies, both here and at Angostura, would have made the most of it."

"But why should he hate us? We are fighting for the same cause."

"Out of jealousy. Jealousy and greed are our bane. I think they are in our blood. If our leaders would pull honestly and harmoniously together, making the country their first thought, we should be rid of the Spaniards within the year. If the royalist generals would cease thwarting each other, robbing the king and starving their troops, we should be subjugated in six months. But you must not think we are all alike. There are a few, of whom I hope I am one, whose only aim is their country's good."

"It is all very strange," I said, still incredulous, "but why don't you put Urdenetta under arrest and have him tried by court-martial?"

"Because I have no positive proof of his treachery, and he is protected by Bolivar, who is jealous of Congress, from whom, and not from him, I hold my appointment."

"Which is the higher power?"

"Congress, of course, whose minister and servant he is, or ought to be; but practically he is, as he likes to call himself, the supreme chief. I am speaking to you very openly, Major Wyvenhoe, but you are an English caballero, and will not abuse my confidence. It is only among the higher ranks that you will find the jealousies, and greed, and ambition of which I have spoken. The common people, both civilians and soldiers, though ignorant, are honest and brave. All the same, I must sorrowfully admit that we have more to hope from the faults of our enemies than our own virtues."

The governor was so much put about by Urdenetta's treachery, and his mood so gloomy, that I attached less importance to this conversation than I otherwise should have done. I thought he exaggerated; I could not believe that the patriot leaders were such scamps, and the Republic in so bad a way, as General Arismendez made out.

A few days later his cares were increased by the arrival of a part of the British legion, some two thousand strong, under General English, who was, of course, an Irishman.

There was some difficulty in finding them quarters, but the chief difficulty was finding them something to eat. The governor's repeated applications to the government for money and supplies had elicited only vague answers, or fine promises that we were still to keep, and he had absolutely nothing to give the troops but sugar-cane, which could be got for the asking, or at any rate, for the cutting.

This, for men who thought they were coming to a land flowing with milk and honey, was distinctly disappointing, and I was not surprised to hear that there was a good deal of grumbling and some apprehension of mutiny. Discipline was relaxed, drills were discontinued. For as the only way of extracting the sugar was chewing the cane, the men had time for little else. They were always either chewing or smoking, tobacco being as plentiful as cane, as also, unfortunately, was rum.

Money there was none, nor had been for weeks. Except the pound apiece I had given the men of my battalion they had not received a penny; the officers had received nothing.

Neither had Mrs. Barnish, though she had sent particulars of her claim to Angostura with a pressing request, supported by the governor, for an immediate payment on account. The poor lady was in despair, and Cautley wildly indignant, both on her account and his own. Being dependent on his pay he had no money except what I, thanks to an open credit on a house at Port-of-Spain, had been able to lend him, and his sailors were as badly off for rations as were our soldiers.

"I won't stand this any longer, neither will my crew," he said one day. "They cannot chew enough sugar-cane to keep themselves alive, and their jaws ache so at night that they cannot sleep a wink. I am off on a cruise, and I will either make a fat prize or go below. My fellows are so sick of sugar-cane that they would tackle a three-decker if they thought there was any hard tack and salt pork on board of her."

"You had better speak to the governor first."

"I have done, and he says that though he has strict orders to detain the Campanella until the arrival of Admiral Brion's squadron, he can see no further than anybody else after dark."

"Which means that if you like to slip away unobserved you may try your luck."

"Also I take it, that if I am successful I need not fear further troubles. If I am not, Margarita will see me no more. I shall weigh to-night at the turn of tide, so good-bye for the present, old man."

The disappearance of the brig caused some excitement and gave rise to a good deal of talk and more or less malicious gossip. General Urdenetta was especially curious on the subject, and asked both the governor and myself whether we had authorised El Capitan to go, or knew whither he was gone, to both of which questions we gave decided negatives.

But the excitement rose to fever heat when, a week later, the Campanella sailed in, followed by a full-rigged ship with the Venezuelan flag at her peak and under the Spanish ensign reversed.

The beach was crowded with spectators, most of whom were soldiers chewing sugar-cane. Urdenetta and I boarded the brig so soon as she let go. He had invited himself to accompany me, and pretended to be very friendly.

The skipper was all smiles and I could see by the faces of the crew that they had been feeding on something more substantial than sugar.

"Why did you go off without saying anything?" I asked him (glancing at Urdenetta), "and where have you been?"

"I have been on a cruise and taken a prize, La Stella, bound from Cadiz to Maracaibo. There she is, what do you think of her?"

"A very fine ship. I congratulate you, Señor Capitan. What is her cargo?" demanded the general.

"A few bales of clothing for the troops—wine, biscuits, salt pork, salt beef, salt fish and a few dollars and doubloons."

"Doubloons! Did you say doubloons, Señor Capitan?" cried Urdenetta, his little black eyes glittering with greed.

"Si, Señor General, I said doubloons."

"Are there many, Señor Capitan? But you have not counted them, perhaps, if so——"

"I have counted the cases; they tally with the number set down in the ship's manifest, and contain twenty thousand."

"Twenty thousand! Madre de Dios! Twenty thousand gold doubloons! Where are they, Señor Capitan, where are they?" and Urdenetta's fingers worked with an eager claw-like action as though they were raking in money.

"I have them safe. You may be sure I did not leave them on board the prize."

"But they will be very much safer ashore, Señor Capitan, The Campanella might be sunk or be cut out by the Spaniards. I shall give you a receipt and put them in a strong-room under guard, and in due course you and your brave crew will receive your share of the prize money, so if you will kindly show me——"

"Not quite so fast, Señor General," interrupted the skipper. "Before I part with this treasure there are a few claims to be dealt with. Mrs. Barnish must have two thousand doubloons in part satisfaction of her claim on the government, my men two, and the officers five doubloons a piece, on account of their share of the prize money, and all of us our pay up to date. The balance I shall hand over to General Arismendez and yourself, against your receipt, to be disposed of as a prize court may direct."

"But this would be highly irregular, my dear sir, and I cannot possibly sanction such a proceeding. The money must be taken as it is and placed in safe custody until these claims you speak of are investigated."

"Not a doubloon of it shall be taken ashore unless my conditions are accepted. Remember that though the brig has been sold to the Republic she has not been formally transferred, so there is nothing to prevent my sailing away and disposing of her and all she contains on Mrs. Barnish's behalf."

"Did you say doubloons, Senor Capitan?"

The implied threat was effectual, so frightening Urdenetta that he accepted Cautley's terms without further demur. The dollars and doubloons were brought into his cabin, and the two thousand for Mrs. Barnish counted out and put into bags, and the bags into a box. Next, the officers and men received their pay and the doubloons as agreed. But the skipper took only his pay.

This business being concluded we went ashore escorted by a dozen bluejackets, who carried the treasure, which, on our arrival at the Government House, Cautley made over to the governor and Urdenetta, taking their joint receipts for the full amount, and giving them his own for the sums which he had disbursed and retained. Urdenetta would have made difficulties, but Arismendez overruled him, saying that he was astonished at the captain's moderation, and I could see by Urdenetta's manner that he thought him a fool for taking so little.

"We have brought you something, Mrs. Barnish," said Cautley, as the sailor who carried the box containing the doubloons laid it at her feet.

We had now only to arrange with Mrs. Barnish, whom we found in the patio of the governor's house, reclining in a wicker chair and looking very charming.

"We have brought you something, Mrs. Barnish," said Cautley, as the sailor who carried the box containing the doubloons laid it at her feet. Then to the man, "You and the others wait outside till I come."

"Ay, ay, sir."

"You are very good, but what is it?" asked the lady.

"A payment on account of your claim—a thousand gold doubloons."

"And pray how much is that in sterling money, captain?"

"As nearly as possible six thousand pounds, madam."

"Six thousand pounds! Oh, what a relief! Thank Heaven! I was almost reduced to my last dollar. Now I am independent again. It is nearly half of what they owe me."

"The price of the brig and the cargo, and as the government are now in funds I have no doubt you will obtain a full and speedy settlement of your claim."

"But how was it managed? Whom have I to thank?"

The skipper hesitated, and, seeing that he was too bashful, or too much in love, to tell his tale properly, I told it for him.

Mrs. Barnish was deeply touched, her colour heightened, her eyes filled with tears.

"How good of you, Captain Cautley!" she exclaimed. "How noble! How can I show my gratitude?"

Then she paused, and the skipper whispered something in her ear, and perceiving that I was not wanted I betook myself to the garden and lighted a cigar. When I went back the widow's eyes were very bright and Cautley's face very red.

"We were talking about this money, Major Wyvenhoe," she said, as coolly as though she were speaking the truth. "What shall I do with it? I have neither a strong-box nor a strong-room."

"You might ask General Arismendez to take care of it for you, but the safest, perhaps the only safe place is the brig, and if it be taken there after dark, and the sun will set in half an hour, nobody will be the wiser; and, if I were you, Mrs. Barnish, I would be off as soon as possible to Port-of-Spain and lodge the money in a bank. It is only a day's sail, and there is a Trinidad schooner in the harbour that I daresay might be chartered on moderate terms." And noticing that the captain looked rather blank I added: "But even on the brig I would not insure the safety of your money for more than twenty-four hours. We may get the route at any moment, Admiral Brion's squadron is expected almost immediately, and there is talk of an expedition to the Main."

"I think you are quite right, Major; don't you, Captain Cautley?"

"I am sure he is. The sooner you and the doubloons are under the British flag the better," rejoined the skipper.

"Then will you kindly see the captain of the schooner and arrange with him?"

"This very night, madam."

"And I can give you a letter of introduction to the house at Port-of-Spain, on which I have a credit. They will arrange your business and give you a hospitable reception, and you might stay there until Cautley and I obtain a final settlement of your claim on the Republic," I remarked.

"That is just what I should like. I have no desire to go home just yet."

On this the skipper brightened up, and night having fallen, we took our leave and carried off the doubloons.

"That was a good idea of yours," said Cautley as we walked to the jetty. "You were thinking of your friend with the little black eyes and rake-like fingers, weren't you? I know I was."

"Yes, he knows we brought the money, but he won't know we have taken it back. But you have not told me how you got on with the lady."

"Well, it was this way. When she wanted to know how she could show her gratitude, I said by giving me her love, at which she seemed very much surprised, and said it was quite out of the question—at any rate so soon after her late husband's death. Then I talked to her a bit, and she said at last that if I really loved her I might speak to her again in a few months. But I presently prevailed on her to say, 'a little while.'"

"So you are virtually engaged. I congratulate you, my dear fellow," quoth I, though remembering Araminta and how likely he was to be jilted, it went against my conscience. If I had been perfectly sincere, I should rather have condoled with him.

"You are very kind and I am very happy," he said simply. "Also nervous. If any harm were to befall her I should never forgive myself. I shall board the schooner at once and if possible arrange for her to sail to-morrow."

In this he succeeded, and on the following evening the widow and her doubloons, accompanied by the second officer, whom Cautley wisely sent with her, set sail for Port-of-Spain.

Mrs. Barnish had a second protector in the person of Father Bartrum, who was heartily sick of Margarita and glad of a chance to get away.

A few hours previously the Libertad, a sloop-of-war (as she would be called in our service, though barque rigged), arrived from Angostura with dispatches, and the next morning (the troops having meanwhile received full rations and a modicum of pay) we had a parade of the entire force.

After the "fall out" I returned to my quarters to breakfast, and was half through with my matutinal cigar when Captain Clincher, of the Legion, and a sergeant's guard marched into the patio.

"I've come on a very unpleasant errand, Major," said the captain, who was a man of few words and fewer ideas.

"Indeed! What is it?" I asked.

"To arrest you, I am sorry to say."

"By whose order and on what charge?"

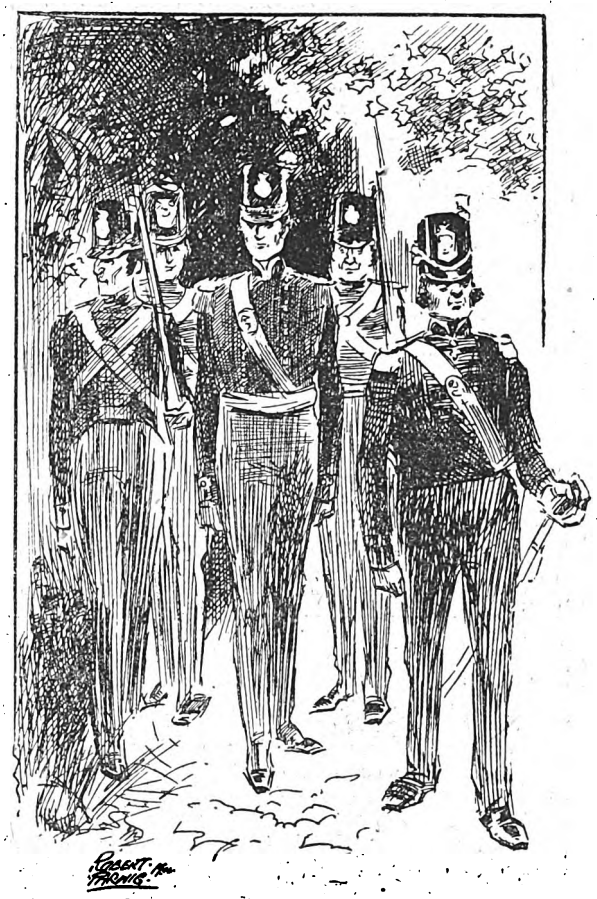
"The governor's. I know nothing about a charge—didn't ask."

"The governor's! Impossible!" I exclaimed.

"Excuse my contradicting you, major, but Colonel Rooke has the governor's written order to have you arrested and taken on board the Libertad. Very sorry, but duty is duty."

"I shall go with you, of course, though I am sure there is some mistake. I suppose my servant may follow with my kit?"

"Certainly. No orders against that."



I placed myself at the disposal of Clincher and the guard, and was conducted to the jetty.

On this I told Ready what to do, placed myself at the disposal of Clincher and the guard, and was conducted to the jetty, where a boat was awaiting us.

SHORT STORIES ABOUT VENTRILOQUISTS.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "Mystery of the 'Medea,'" by Alex. Vaughan, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. William Inglis, 24 Barrack Street, Perth. Attempts for this week's prize must deal with Stories about Landladies and Lodgers, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, August 20th. Post-cards only, please.

From the Lower Regions.

A FEW nights ago loud cries for help were heard proceeding from an open drain in a flourishing Scotch town.

The police arrived, obtained the assistance of some navvies, and dispatched them into the subterranean regions. But the more they explored the louder became the appeals for assistance, and soon the street was crammed with sympathising spectators, who had to be kept back from the mouth of the drain by a cordon of constables.

Cries of "Bunglers!" "Get him out!" "The man will die!" arose from the crowd, which assumed a threatening appearance, so much so that the police compelled it to disperse.

The cries for help now ceased; the ventriloquist who had caused all the commotion having also been compelled to disperse.

It Spoke Without Its Head.

A VENTRILOQUIST was entertaining an audience; the doll was singing "Mary had a little lamb," when its head dropped off and hung by the string.

The ventriloquist, not noticing the mishap, went on and finished the song.

On looking up, he perceived what had happened, and as quick as thought (speaking through the doll), he said: "See what I can do with my neck broken."

Next, Please!

IN the commercial room of a Bristol hotel the other night, the subject turned on ventriloquism.

One commercial remarked:

"I once knew a man who was a great ventriloquist. He was practising his favourite amusement in a crowded street one day, when he threw his voice so far away that he lost it, and it took him an hour and a half, with the aid of a policeman, to find it again."

"That's nothing," remarked a little man in the corner with a wink at the rest of the company, "I was at an amateur entertainment last winter when two ventriloquists were giving a performance. They had been throwing their voices to various parts of the room, and at the end it was found that the voices had returned to their wrong owners. When I left they were vainly endeavouring to throw their voices down each other's throats to persuade them to return to their rightful owners."

Sold!

M. ALEXANDRE, the famous ventriloquist, was on one occasion passing along the Strand, when a friend desired a specimen of his abilities.

At that instant a load of hay was passing along near Temple Bar, when Alexandre called attention to the suffocating cries of a man in the centre of the hay.

A crowd gathered round and stopped the astonished carter, and demanded why he was carrying a fellow-creature in his hay. The complaints and cries of the smothered man now became painful, and there was every reason to believe he was dying. The crowd, regardless of the stoppage to the traffic, instantly proceeded to unload the hay in the street. The smothered voice urged them to make haste, but the feelings of the people may be imagined when the cart was empty and nobody was found, while Alexandre and his friend walked off laughing at the unexpected result of their trick.

The Ventriloquist Scored.

RECENTLY a well-known ventriloquist, who was taking a journey, just managed to get into the train as it was leaving the station, and had no time to take out a dog ticket for his terrier.

When the cry, "All tickets ready!" was heard a few stations further on, the ventriloquist dropped the dog into a hamper, which was labelled in bold characters, "Professor Jones, Ventriloquist."

When the ticket inspector opened the carriage door the dog began to bark.

The man, noticing the label on the hamper, turned to the ventriloquist with a self-satisfied grin, and said:

"All right, mister, that's verra clever, but ye canna fool me. That trick's been played on me before."

Why He Fled.

A BASHFUL youth was sitting in a state of nervous terror, alongside a young and pretty girl, in an obscure corner of the hall leading to the ball-room.

A young man, who was a bit of a ventriloquist, observed them, however, and pitching his voice to make appear as if it proceeded from the bashful youth, he said:

"Ah—Miss Loveleigh—er—I do love you—er—my dear—will you marry me?"

With a scream of terror the bashful man fled, leaving his companion in grave doubts as to his mental condition.

How He Got a Front Seat.

At a concert once, all the seats were the same price, and there was a great rush to get front seats.

A certain gentleman (a ventriloquist) wanted to get a front seat, so when the manager appeared on the stage to announce that a certain song was to be sung, he threw his voice on the stage, and said:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I am sorry to say there will be no performance to-night"

The people went out disgusted, while the ventriloquist took a front seat.

The concert went on just the same afterwards.

G. B.

The Professor Ran.

The whole of the villagers seemed to have squeezed themselves into the diminutive public hall to witness the wonderful entertainment of Professor Vox, the marvellous ventriloquist.

For some time the Professor kept his audience alternately gaping with awe and vociferously applauding his clever performance.

"Now, ladies and gentlemen," said he, "I will imitate the voice of a man on the roof of this hall."

"Are you there?" he called in his natural voice.

"Yes, sir," replied an astonishingly natural voice coming apparently from the roof outside.

"Where are you?" shouted the Professor.

There was a sudden clatter on the slates, a dark body crashed through the skylight and fell into the midst of the audience.

"Here I am, sir," said the "voice."

Two seconds later the Professor was giving the villagers an exhibition of his wonderful sprinting powers.

W. J. O.

The Audience was "Sold."

A popular ventriloquist in the north was given a benefit some time ago, and announced that he would endeavour to surpass himself on the occasion.

On the eventful evening the building was crowded in every part, and when the beneficiaire's "turn" came it was seen that the number of his performing figures was considerably larger than usual, and were arranged on chairs in a semi-circle, after the manner of a minstrel troupe.

Going behind each figure in turn he so manipulated them that his audience was astounded.

Classical, humorous, and patriotic items were rendered in perfect taste and with marked ability; and the movements of each figure was so lifelike and natural that the "house" was completely carried away, and round after round of applause greeted the clever artiste.

At the close of his performance the applause was renewed; but as he bowed himself off the stage the audience was considerably astonished to see the figures rise, one by one, and walk off after him.

Then their applause gave way to roars of laughter, for it suddenly dawned upon them that they had been "sold."

And so it proved, for the "figures" were well-known concert artistes, each of whom had volunteered to act in that capacity on the occasion of their old friend's benefit.

Equal to the Occasion.

At one of the London halls a short time ago, Lieutenant Frank Travis, the ventriloquist, was amusing the audience with his merry family of dummies. Nearing the end of his performance, one of the dummies is supposed to ask the following question:

"If a child is born in England of German parents, what nationality is it?"

"English," shouted the ventriloquist.

"Wrong," was the supposed reply. And so the argument went on, until the ventriloquist said at last that he would leave it to the waiter to settle, and whatever he said should decide the supposed argument.

"Waiter!" shouted out the ventriloquist at the top of his voice. "Now, then, what's it to be, English or German?"

The old waiter, who had been busy all the evening, not knowing what was going on, looked up, and amidst roars of laughter shouted back:

"A drop of Scotch, please!" W. L.

Mr. Bowser Learning Ventriloquism.

"Mr. Bowser, what on earth are you doing?" asked Mrs. Bowser, as she rushed into the drawing-room, almost frightened out of her wits by the dreadful noise which had proceded from it.

Mr. Bowser had the cat on his knee, and was pinching that poor animal's tail, and, as it screamed with pain, he tried to imitate its voice.

"Mrs. Bowser," calmly remarked her lesser half, fairly mesmerising her with his glaring eyes, "I am developing my vocal organs. By the aid of this so-called dumb animal, I shall in a few moments, by practice, be able to imitate the mewing of a cat to perfect——" But at this moment the Bowser cat, in a fit of desperation, bit its master's hand, and that gentleman's voice put a complete legion of moonlight howlers in the shade.

When he had somewhat cooled down, he turned to Mrs. Bowser with an injured air, and said:

"Woman, all is over between us, by your interference my hand will have to be cut off. Leave this house at once, and take your ungrateful cat with you. Don't expostulate, madam, you and your infernal cat have ruined me, and I wash my hands of the pair of you," and Mr. Bowser slowly walked from the room.

The Last Straw.

A young man, in flannels and straw hat, was wheeling a perambulator backwards and forwards along the pavement in front of an imposing set of flats. The hot afternoon sun poured pitilessly down upon him, and he was angry as any man could be.

"My dear!" came a voice from an upper window.

"What's the matter?" he shrieked back. "Let me alone, can't you?"

And he went on wheeling.

An hour later the same voice came from the same window, in earnest, pleading tones:

"George, dear!"

"Well, what's the matter now?" he shouted. "Have the water-pipes burst?"

"No, George, dear," wailed the voice; "the water-pipes are all right, but you've been wheeling Lottie's doll all the afternoon. Hadn't you better let baby have a turn now?"

THE BROWN-CRESSWELL SCANDAL.

"It's a fact, I assure you," quoth little Mrs. Brown solemnly, glancing over the top of her spectacles at the circle of ladies plying their needles in the cause of the Geddesdon poor.

"You don't say so," gasped her neighbour, Mrs. Smith, stopping for a moment with her needle poised on high. "How intensely shocking!"

"To think of the serpent we have nourished in our midst," broke in another.

"It is really very sad that one's kindness should be betrayed in such a manner. What shall you do about the new district, dear Mrs. Spinks? Of course it is not possible that this—er—person should work amongst us any more."

Poor Mrs. Spinks, wife of the Rev. Spottiswood Spinks, Rector of Geddesdon, looked up with a little appeal in her soft, brown eyes. She was a kind-hearted little soul when left to herself, and it vexed her to hear these unkind remarks made about the stranger who had lately come into their circle.

"I do not think she can do any harm to the people she visits, Mrs. Hobbs," she answered gently. "She has already won the hearts of those she has been to see. Besides, what proof have we that these rumours have any truth in them?"

"What proof?" exclaimed Mrs. Brown indignantly. "Why, Mrs. Spinks, have I not already told you that it was my own brother, who knows the doctor, who lives three doors off them at Notting H ll who wrote and told me all about them a fortnight ago? And this morning I had another letter from him confirming all that he had said before—that their goings on were terrible, and that no decent-minded people would visit them. You can hardly expect me to doubt my brother's word, Mrs. Spinks," concluded Mrs. Brown with a decidedly aggressive, ill-meaning sniff, as she resumed her work, which in her excitement she had dropped for a moment.

"Of course not, of course not," hastily responded the Rector's wife. "Did you ask for buttons, Mrs. Jones? Here are some," and she tried to turn the discussion into another channel.

But it was of no use. Another worker, Miss Anne Bruce, had been absent from the town a week or two, and had missed the heart of the subject in hand.

"What is it that is rumoured against her?" she asked. "One hears all sorts of things but nothing definite. It would hardly be fair to ostracize a girl for the sake of an indefinite report."

Mrs. Brown bristled again.

"I tell you it is not indefinite, Miss Bruce," she said. "The story is—as you will have it, only don't accuse me of scandal-making after you have insisted on hearing it—that she is the daughter of a card-sharper, who has several times only just escaped detection. They say that she was the trap set to catch the poor young men. It is said," and she lowered her voice ominously, "that troops of young men used to flock there at all hours. Now you can see why this person is not a fit associate for us who are, however feebly, trying to do our duty. And I have my brother's word for it," she finished, closing her mouth with a little snap, as if that settled the whole matter beyond dispute.

Silence fell on the group of workers. Certainly to some of them, the working party that afternoon seemed to be more interesting than usual, and they were astonished when the clock struck five and the Rector came in to read a prayer before they went to have some tea. They were all extremely devout, joining in the Lord's Prayer with more earnestness and unanimity than usual.

Many events do not happen at Geddesdon-on-Sea. Most of its inhabitants are fisher-folk, there being only a slight sprinkling of better-class people. It was a picturesque town, particularly from the river, which formed a natural harbour, with the sand dunes on one side of it, and the homes of the fishermen, with their pretty roofs, on the other. Further back on the land, the town was struggling to become a fashionable sea-side resort, indeed, already on the southern cliff had sprung up a large and modern hotel, built in red brick, and run on all the latest lines by an enterprising, if inartistic, company.

Millicent Cresswell and her father had taken a tiny cottage on the cliff for six months, to restore the latter to health after a long and serious illness. He was now a great deal better after some weeks of the bracing East coast air, and his daughter felt free to avail herself of the kindness of her neighbour's invitations to call upon them.

She had joined the Rectory work-party, going to it whenever she thought her father was well enough to be left for a whole afternoon. She had been obliged to miss two Fridays lately, having been confined to the house with a cold, and one day her father was not so well.

Meanwhile slander had been busy with them both, and was doing her best to make up a nice little history which, if Millicent and her father could have heard, they would have laughed at, and gone their way untroubled.

But they heard nothing; consequently, about a fortnight later, Millicent presented herself at the Rectory door and was admitted to the drawing-room, all unconscious of the chilly atmosphere in which she would find herself.

The girl looked like a summer butterfly flown by mistake into a winter garden filled with everlastings. Her fair young freshness contrasted so strongly with these worthy townsfolk who considered themselves smirched if they should so much as touch the hem of her garment. For the weed of scandal had flourished like a green bay-tree, and Millicent Cresswell was now designated as "that dreadful girl."

Mrs. Spinks came forward to greet her as she entered. There was a certain nervousness in her manner, and her cheek were a little flushed as she led her to a seat in a far corner of the room by the window.

"You will get a better light there." she said as she glanced round in an appealing way at the rest of her workers.

There had been somewhat of a hot discussion before Millicent had come in.

"I will not be in the same room with her," asserted Mrs. Brown. "I consider that persons of her sort should be shown that respectable people cannot associate with them; that at any rate Geddesdon-on-Sea will not lower its standard," and she gave her usual sniff, jerking her thread so sharply as to break it.

However, Mrs. Spinks had held her own, having refused to give the maid any directions as to the non-admission of Miss Cresswell.

Now, the girl was here, in her drawing-room, and nearly half of her workers were packing up their garments, prepared to guard their morals and leave the Rector's wife in the lurch.

"It was her own fault," they said as they let themselves out at the hall door, whilst every nose showed in its own particular manner the excessive virtuosity of its owner.

The working party was now much reduced in numbers, but Millicent was quite unconscious that she was the cause of the sudden exodus. She and the rest enjoyed a very pleasant afternoon.

Somehow the atmosphere of the room seemed lighter and freer now that Mrs. Brown was not in it. Mrs. Spinks thought so at any rate; therefore, when her husband came in at five o'clock, he found a very happy party, and after prayers they had the merriest tea imaginable, though the rector, who of course knew all about it, was grieved to find that so many of his parishioners lacked the charity which thinketh no evil.

That evening, the Rev. Spottiswood and his wife put their heads together. It was a terrible scandal, which must either be recognised and the Cresswells given to understand that their society was no longer appreciated, or it must be stamped out.

"I do not believe that there is a word of truth in the whole story," said Mrs. Spinks indignantly. "Mrs. Brown is a born scandal-monger, and her brother is as bad, and all the other old women are cats, who follow their leader."

"Hush! hush! my dear," interposed the rector through a smile that belied his words. "Cats or not, they are my parishioners, and must be propitiated. Let us sleep over the matter. No doubt we shall come to a solution of the difficulty in the morning."

But woman-like, Mrs. Spinks could not leave the matter alone until she had hit upon some plan. She lay still, thinking hard for some hours, when with scant mercy she awoke her sleepy spouse.

"Spottiswood," she said, "Spottiswood, do wake up; I've got an idea."

With a groan her husband moved.

"Eh? What? An idea? Have you, my dear? Ah! alright," and soon he was once more snoring peacefully.

This was not sympathetic, as Mrs. Spinks felt, but with the satisfaction of a difficulty solved, she, too, turned over to enjoy the sleep of the just.

In the morning Mrs. Spinks rose rather early, got through her household duties, donned her medium best gown, and set out to visit Millicent at the cottage on the cliff. She was shown into the little drawing-room, sweet with the scent of narcissi and daffodils, and whilst waiting, took up an odd volume lying on the table.

Glancing through carelessly, she let fall an envelope, which had evidently been slipped in between the leaves. Thinking it might be a mark, she picked it up hastily and was just going to replace it when the address caught her eye:

"LADY MILLICENT CRESSWELL,
"THE TOWERS, CONSTON, LEICESTERSHIRE."

Mrs. Spinks' eyes opened wide as she read. What did this mean? Lady Millicent Cresswell!

Was it possible that the girl of whom such terrible things were being said, was none other than one of the Cresswells of the Towers, of whom everyone knew, and whose family had for ages done their work in England's glorious history!

The poor little woman was almost transfixed with horror.

What idiots these Geddesdon women had made of themselves! What a mercy that she had come up to see what she could find out!

She started as Millicent touched her on the arm.

"Oh, my dear," she said, "I beg your pardon, but is this you?" and she held the envelope out dramatically to the astonished girl in front of her.

"Why, yes, of course," she laughed. "So you have discovered our secret? Come and sit down, Mrs. Spinks; I will tell you all about it. You know papa has been very ill, and he thought he would like to come here as just 'Mr. Cresswell.' You see," she continued, "we know the Burtons and Oxtons and a good many others, so that if we had come as ourselves, we should have had no peace. However, we are so soon going home now it does not matter. I fear papa will have to give up his hobby of coaching young men at Notting Hill, for the doctor says he must not spend another winter in England."

"Used he to coach young men, Miss—Lady Millicent?" asked Mrs. Spinks somewhat diffidently.

"Yes, Mrs. Spinks. My father loves teaching, and has made it quite a hobby to teach young fellows who cou'd not afford a proper course."

The mystery was solved, and with a light heart Mrs. Spinks set off home. She had told Millicent the whole story, and together they concocted a small revenge on the ladies of Geddesdon-on-Sea.

Directly Mrs. Spinks had left Millicent sat down to write to the Burtons and Oxtons, saying that she and her father were spending a short time at Geddesdon, and that if they did not consider it too far to go, she hoped that they would meet at the Rectory garden-party, which she heard was to take place within the next fortnight.

It was the first Thursday after Easter, which was unusually late that year. Already the trees had clad themselves in their fresh young green. The sun, too, had the promise of summer warmth in it, and everything looked bright and glad in the balmy geniality of late spring.

The Rev. Spottiswood and Mrs. Spinks stood waiting for their guests. It was not quite three o'clock, but in Geddesdon people generally arrived about ten minutes before they were invited; it was one of the unalterable ways of the little town. Therefore there was a goodly gathering assembled before Millicent and her father made their appearance.

As they crossed the lawn it is a wonder that they did not sink beneath the glances of surprise and disapproval levied at them. But they passed on quite untroubled, and pretended to be oblivious of the curious amount of backs presented to them as they turned to greet their neighbours. For some minutes Mrs. Spinks' unprecedented behaviour formed the chief topic of conversation. How could her husband have allowed her to do such a thing? It was preposterous, inexcusable, and so on.

Soon however their attention was attracted by the names of the county people being announced. It was only on such occasions as the present that they had the felicity of criticising their country neighbours.

"There is actually old Lady Hancock," whispered Mrs. Brown to Mrs. Hobbs. "What would she say if she knew whose company she was in? There's her ugly daughter, too. Oh! my dear,"—and she clutched Mrs. Hobbs' arm—"just look! there is Lady Hancock going up to that dreadful girl! Can Mrs. Spinks have introduced her? Why—" and her voice rose a little—"she—she is positively kissing her! What an extraordinary thing! My dear Mrs. Hobbs, I ask you, look!"

Mrs. Brown was almost faint from surprise and chagrin, for Lady Hancock, who had not even so much as given her a glance, was walking down one of the primrose-covered paths with her arm affectionately tucked into that of Millicent Cresswell's.

Mrs. Hobbs said nothing, but looked at Mrs. Brown with something of misgiving and annoyance in her eyes.

"You had better come and sit down," she said, "you are looking very hot and uncomfortable."

"It is enough to upset one to see an old lady taken in by an impudent hussy like that," gasped Mrs. Brown, fanning herself vigorously.

"I think I should say no more about that, if I were you," said Mrs. Hobbs significantly. "I am going to talk it over with the others," and rising, regardless of Mrs. Brown's entreaties, she crossed the lawn to Mrs. Spinks. Drawing her aside, she asked boldly:

"Who is Millicent Cresswell?"

Mrs Spinks smiled.

"She is Lady Hancock's great-niece, dear Mrs Hobbs. Lord Conston and Lady Millicent have been staying here quietly as Mr. and Miss Cresswell, but now he is so much stronger, they are taking up their own position again, and it is as pleasant a surprise to their friends to find them here, as it is to us to have been the means of their meeting."

Mrs. Hobbs took a page out of her note-book, on which she scribbled a few words. She then gave it to an under-gardener whom she found busy in one of the gardens, with a request that he would find Mrs. Brown and deliver it to her.

What the words were I cannot tell you. All I do know is that Mrs. Brown's ample figure was seen disappearing out of the vicarage gate before tea had been announced, and no one made any effort to recall her. And somehow I do not fancy that since the Brown-Cresswell episode, scandals have been quite so rife in Geddesdon-on-Sea as before.

GRACE COMBE.

MRS. YOUNG WIFE: "You are sure there are five pounds of sugar in this package? It seems very light."

Grocer: "That, madam, is because it is entirely free from sand."

LIVERIED MENIAL: "Me lud, the carriage waits without."

Lord Fitz-Josher: "Without what?"

Liveried Menial: "Without horses, me lud; 'tis a motor-car."

THE other day a gentleman entered a restaurant, and ordered a chicken. The chicken was evidently tough, for, when the waiter came in, he beheld the gentleman with his coat off and in a great state of perspiration.

"Waiter," he said, "this chicken is very tough."

"Very sorry, sir; but, you see, that chicken always was a peculiar bird. Why, when we came to kill it we couldn't catch it, so at last we had to shoot it. It flew on the housetop, and——"

"Then you must have shot the weathercock by mistake."

MISS JOHNSON'S PLAN.

ONE of the most striking characteristics of woman is her cheerful perseverance is looking under the bed for a thief. No man in his senses ever looks under his bed for a burglar, but there are millions of women in this country who would find it quite impossible to sleep in any bed under which they had not previously searched for a concealed man.

Experience is lost upon them. The average unmarried woman, of forty years of age, has usually looked under the bed at least 7,500 times, without ever once finding the expected man; but she is not the least discouraged by so long a course of failure, and it would be easy to find women, eighty or ninety years old, who still nightly search for the man they have never found.

Miss Johnson will hereafter be famous as a woman whose long perseverance has been signally rewarded. It would be indelicate to inquire into her precise age; had she not described herself, in a recent affidavit, as having been born in the year 1848? And we may therefore take it for granted that she is at least fifty-two years old.

If we presume that she began to look under the bed at the age of fifteen, it follows that she has performed that ceremony more than 14,000 times.

Until the other Friday night, she never found the smallest fragment of a man under her bed; but on that eventful night her perseverance was rewarded, and the long-sought man greeted her astonished gaze.

Miss Johnson, being an unmarried lady, not wholly unconnected with the milliner's trade, and full of womanly independence, resides entirely alone, in a small house containing but three rooms—a kitchen, shop, and bedroom.

Dogs she despises, and cats she mistrusts; while, as for men, she regards them as poor creatures who may possibly have their uses in the time of hard frost, when water must be carted from the nearest stream, but who, as a rule, make more trouble about a house than their necks are worth.

Holding these views, it naturally follows that Miss Johnson lives alone, and the cool bravery with which she locks up her house at night, and seeks her solitary couch (no matter if a first-class thunderstorm is in progress) has for years been the admiration of the more timid of her sex.

It was about eleven o'clock on that Friday night when Miss Johnson stooped down and looked under the bed for a possible man, precisely as she had done on 14,000 previous nights.

Whether she was or was not astonished at perceiving a large-sized man lying under the bed, with the back of his head towards her, will never be known, but at any rate, she gave no sign of astonishment, and did not even inform the man that she saw him.

On the contrary, she resumed with great deliberation the nocturnal twisting of her back-hair, and even softly hummed "Come into the Garden, Maud," with as much distinctness as could be expected of a woman while holding a comb between her teeth.

Her back hair being finally finished, she opened her window, turned down the lamp until it gave forth a dim and modest light, and then stepped gracefully into bed, but not to sleep.

The sagacious woman was perfectly aware that the man under the bed, not suspecting that he had been discovered, would creep forth with a view to plunder so soon as he thought that she was asleep.

The bedstead stood in a corner of the room, and from the position of the man it was plain that he would creep out at the side of the bed. Miss Johnson, therefore, changed her usual manner of composing herself to rest, and lay, as she subsequently expressed it, "flat as a pancake," with her head projecting over the side of the bed at the precise locality where she expected the man to appear.

For at least half-an-hour she lay perfectly still, watching for the man with a stealthy vigilance that would have done credit to an astute and experienced cat.

Not a muscle or a hairpin on her frame moved, and her breathing was as slow and regular as that of a profound sleeper. At length the man, confident that she was asleep, softly began to worm himself from under the bed.

Little did he imagine that a pair of pitiless grey eyes were waiting for the appearance of his head, while a pair of lithe and nervous hands were ready to pounce upon his ears.

It was not many minutes, however, before each ear was suddenly caught in an inexorable grasp and his head began to oscillate with remarkable speed between the floor and the edge of the bedstead.

Von Moltke himself could not have surpassed Miss Johnson's tactics. She had the man completely at her mercy, and he was as helpless as though his head were in the stocks.

At first his captor maintained a grim silence, but after she had bumped him sufficiently to ease her mind she addressed him on the wickedness and folly of seeking to rob her.

In vain did the man protest that his motives were innocent, that he had mistaken the house, and had merely intended to take a quiet nap under his own bedstead where the flies could not find him out.

Miss Johnson sternly told him that he could not make her believe any such nonsense, and that she would "let him know," and would also "show him."

These threats were carried out by a renewal of the bumping process, until the man yelled for mercy so loudly that the neighbours were aroused, and rushed to Miss Johnson's house with the firm conviction that a gang of burglars had murdered that excellent woman and were quarrelling over the division of her spoils.

It was not until a strong force, armed with clubs and hatchets, had recklessly entered the room, that Miss Johnson surrendered her captive, with the remark that the sooner they took themselves off the better, and that if any other man would like to hide under the bed, she was quite ready to knock a little sense into him.

Thus the intrepid woman not only defended herself with the most signal success, but she pointed out the true way to deal with a man under the bed.

"GALLANTLY done!" said General Galway as the tail end of Captain Murchison's kilt disappeared over the hedge of the zareba.

Our troops had been exposed to a galling fire in approaching this troublesome redoubt, and when at last the word "Char-r-rge" sounded like thunder from the stentorian voice of the officer commanding, the men hesitated for a moment on account of their heavy casualties.

It was at this critical moment (for, paradoxical as the remark may appear, armies are something like women! —they who hesitate are lost) that Captain Murchison, brandishing his claymore high over his head shouted:

"No. 1 Company, Skeandhu Regiment—follow me."

The men were at once electrified by the voice of the charmer, for wherever Captain Murchison would lead, his men were sure to follow, even to the gates of the ill-reputed habitation whose pavements are not inlaid with jasper. But burdened by their rifles and ammunition, their beloved centurion was far away in front of the fastest of them, and jumping over the frowning barrier before a single bayonet could come up to his support.

"Heaven preserve the brave fellow," was the very natural remark of those of us on the staff who were witnesses of the scene, as we watched the daring-deed and thought of the almost certain death awaiting for Murchison inside.

But the Skeandhu Regiment was never wanting in dash or daring, and before the Dervishes could recover from their surprise at this flying woman flopping down so suddenly among them, as if from the blue, in all her glory of tartan petticoats, the men of No. 1 Company Skeandhu Regiment were tearing with their bare legs through cactus and thorn, as if they were as inocuous as weeping willows.

There are few people braver than the Dervishes of the desert, more especially at close quarters. Here, however, they had met their match. It was bayonet against spear.

But though the latter had much the advantage in both length and hurling power, the formidable "point" of the British weapon, with the furious "h-i-s-s" that drove it home, was a little too much for the Dervishes. And so, after stubbornly contesting the ground for a space, they broke precipitately, as if pursued by the feminine fiends of their own Gehenna, turned white for the purpose.

"Poor beggar," said the General, kindly, after the fight was over and we were making up the butcher's bill. "He's gone at last. I always feared that this would be the end of him; he was so altogether reckless in his courage."

"I'm not dead yet, sir," replied the corpse in a weak ghostly whisper that startled the General, brave though he was.

It was the voice of Captain Alastair Murchison, recovering from a dead faint, the result of gaping wounds and loss of blood.

"Heaven be praised, my boy," with deep emotion replied the warm hearted General. "It's a Victoria Cross for you, dead or alive, or any recommendation of mine is not worth much."

* * * * *

The scene was changed.

In a small provincial town not a hundred miles away from Charing Cross might be seen a soldierly figure, with a wooden leg and a cramped left forearm.

He lived in a small, self-contained villa whose outward appearance betokened respectability, but which was but scantily furnished within. It was the property of Mr. Abraham Grabb and the new home of poor Captain Murchison of the Soudan zareba.

"Never mind, my dear," he cheerily remarked to his wife, on first taking possession, "I was formerly in the habit of dallying with Literature for amusement, but I shall now woo the coy dame for the sake of her siller. Now don't be jealous, darling," he continued, "that's a good lassie," as he playfully patted his partner in life on the shoulder.

He glanced at his maimed members, though, with an air of sadness that was far from his natural disposition.

"See," he went on with a somewhat forced smile, "though I have lost a leg and lamed an arm, my head and my right hand are as dexterous as ever."

"Thank Heaven they are, darling," returned his wife with tears in her beautiful eyes, "and your heart also is as warm and true."

"Why not?" he rejoined; "fickle hearts are only made for fair weather."

Yet Captain Murchison's heart had not a little reason to feel sour and disappointed.

Having served his country for many years, and on several occasions distinguished himself by his gallantry, he had now been shelved with but little compensation, as of no further use.

Blessed with little or no private means of his own, like many others of his kind, he had received from the grandmotherly Goverment the miserable pittance of a half-pay Captain plus the mite of compassionate allowance on account of his irreparable wounds. And so, with this dole, he was allowed to sink or swim without any further consideration.

True, in addition to this, the Victoria Cross brought him the magnificent honorarium of £10 sterling a year. For I am now speaking of a period before the doughty Piper Findlater of Dargai fame conferred a real boon on his brother Croziers by opening the eyes of Whitehall to the very obvious fact that disabled heroes cannot like chameleons live on air, but must feed and fare like other folk.

He forced, in fact, the powers that be, to raise the yearly honorarium to the more substantial sum of £50, in order to save the said occult powers from the spectacle of witnessing their national heroes tramping the country in funny little groups as strolling players, with their vaunted decorations dangling on their breasts!

To make matters worse, Murchison commuted a great part of his pension, and with the small capital thereby obtained, ventured on business with the old incautious courage and—with the old and usual results.

The promoters of the Hubble-Bubble Company were far too 'cute for the chivalrous soldier. Moreover, like many other aspirants to literary wealth and fame, the labours of Captain Murchison were more earnest than lucrative, till he began to realize like the poet Gray, that:

> Too poor for a bribe and too proud to importune
> He had not the method of making a fortune.

Morning after morning he had the mortification of listening to the "flop, flop" of his typed manuscripts as the post passed them through the panel of the front door which was only, alas, too close to his very modest study.

And though all of them were "returned with thanks" from the very polite editors, it was but poor consolation for the struggling would-be author. Indeed, these flops on the floor became gradually to sound more like popguns to his ears, and to grate on his nerves more than the fusillade of his enemies used to do in more stirring times.

"Here they come—flop, flop—" he would say to his wife at the simple breakfast board, as the typical knock of the postman and the equally typical flop of the manuscripts almost reached their ears together. "But never say die; people will read me some day in spite of them."

He was a man of wide travel, varied adventure, rich fancy, and a dauntless determination that was not easily disheartened.

On a certain morning, as he was sipping his cocoa in the usual way, he picked something out of one of the familiar foolscap envelopes and threw it on the table before his wife.

"There, Grace," he said, with a perceptible tremor in his voice, "there, I told you so. Perseverance surmounts difficulties and the copy-book maxims are true after all."

It was the proof for correction of his very whimsical story of Venus and Bellerophon which had been rejected, with kindest thanks, of course, by at least half-a-dozen mediocre periodicals, but was at last accepted by none

A SLANDER ON FAT PEOPLE.

OBESITY IS NOT THE RESULT OF GLUTTONY.

CAN OBESITY BE REMOVED?

"It is high time that the old and false idea that excessive corpulency is a thing to be endured because it cannot be banished without danger to the general health should be got rid of once for all. Equally pernicious is the idea for which some of our comic poets and humourous painters are partially responsible, that too much rotundity of figure adds either to the dignity of the person or the cheerful aspect of its owner. . . . These very practical considerations are suggested by the perusal of an excellently written and most suggestive little volume, entitled 'Corpulency and the Cure.' The book is in its eighteenth edition, and the reason of this popularity is not far to seek. Its author, Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. (who will send a copy to any applicant who encloses 4d. in stamps), has devised a method of treatment which he clearly describes, giving, in fact, the actual formula of the remedy which he prescribes. A work of this sort is naturally being largely recommended by persons who have benefited by its treatment to others who are still sufferers from adiposity. Mr. Russell asks all who are experimenting with his remedy to weigh themselves carefully every day. For the results he appeals not to the fancied feelings of the patients, but to the hard testimony of scales and weights, which cannot be suspected of any prejudice in favour of Mr. Russell's system. Such tests show, as a matter of fact, the loss of from 1lb. to 2lb. per day, directly the remedy begins to be used. This is a perfectly harmless decoction, prepared from a few herbs which one can find in the rural lane."—South Wales Daily News, June 15th, 1900.

MARVELLOUS RESULTS IN CURING CORPULENCY BY THE "RUSSELL" TREATMENT.

"'Corpulency and the Cure.'—This is the title of an interesting volume (256 pages) which has been written by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, London, W.C., and it deals in a commonsense fashion with a subject which is of considerable moment to a large number of people. Mr Russell has devoted more study than perhaps any other medical expert to the question of obesity, and his unique experience in the treatment of the thousands of cases that have come under his care has conclusively shown him the falsity of the idea that excessive corpulence is a thing that must be endured because it cannot be banished without danger to the general health. He has proved that quite the contrary is the case, and the hundreds of testimonials which are given in the book constitute an unanswerable testimony to the efficacy of his remedy. Mr. Russell handles his subject with the skill of a master, but withal he uses such simple language that all may understand, and his book is full of useful information. He points out that in most of the so-called remedies for adiposity the administration of deleterious compounds is advocated, or that adherence to some more or less objectionable or stringent forms of dietary or abstinence is insisted upon. Having given the subject constant attention for many years, Mr Russell has succeeded in producing and perfecting a purely vegetable preparation which is guaranteed to be perfectly harmless, while he claims that it reduces superfluous fat in such an unerring manner that 2½ hours is usually a sufficient time to test its efficacy by stepping on a weighing machine. In short, the advantages of Mr Russell's method may thus be summed up: the compound is purely vegetable and perfectly harmless; it does not demand those semi-starvation dietary restrictions which are so weakening to the system; it is most efficacious in reducing fat without injury; and it aims at the radical cure of obesity, so that when persons under treatment have been reduced to their normal weight the incubus may not return. Moreover, the treatment is an exceedingly pleasant one. The medicine which is prescribed is an agreeble, refreshing, cooling, invigorating tonic, and allays thirst in a marvellous manner. It is purely vegetable, contains no poison, has no pernicious effect on the most delicate subject, is free from objection of any kind, and is neither aperient, constipating, weakening, nor sickly. It is sufficient that Mr Russell's book has reached its eighteenth edition, and is certainly well worth reading. It can be obtained by sending four penny stamps to the address as above. Amongst the numerous unsolicited letters which Mr. Russell is daily receiving, mention may be made of one from Mr. F. Upton, of Brazil, who says: 'I have over 100 persons here under your treatment, and, without one single exception, all with most satisfactory results.' This is testimony indeed."—Extract from The Bristol Mercury, June 16th, 1900.

other than the Hurry-up Magazine, the very tip-top of the whole caboodle.

His heart bounded with joy.

"Dada, dear," said a little boy beside him, "me get new boots now."

The appeal of his little son suddenly roused him to a sense of his downfall, and he was for a moment almost bursting into tears.

But recollecting himself, he caught his son passionately in his once powerful arms and nearly smothered him with kisses.

"Yes, Charlie, that you will, my boy, and at no distant date."

The date was more distant than he expected.

The greedy Mr. Grabb was clamouring for his rent, and the overdue taxes were also to pay. Moreover, the inimitable story of Venus and Bellerophon took an unconscionable long time to appear in the coveted columns of the great Hurry-up Magazine, and other contributions that were being tardily accepted by other periodicals seemed to share the same fate, till hope deferred was enough to make him feel sick at heart in earnest.

Little Charlie was still without his boots, and the rent was still to pay, though Mr. Grabb was getting more and more abusive.

"I 'ave 'ad hexperience o' the likes of yer before," the latter went on one fine morning, "gintlemans as 'ave plinty of pride and hempty pockets. But I'll manage yer, and out of this 'ere 'ouse ye'll trouse or my name ain't Mister Abraham Grabb."

Murchison once upon a time would probably have trounced if not "trousedˮ Mister Abraham Grabb on the spot for his insolence. Yet here was this ursurer, who would probably run into a hole if he were ever shown the muzzle of a musket—here, I say, he was feeding on the fat of the land, and actually at that moment more capable on his legs than the Victoria Cross hero, who had practically lost his all in the cause of his country.

Yes, the house of Mister Abraham Grabb, though jerry built withal, and not at all free from rats, was a little too luxurious for the very modest means at their disposal. They must go seek diggings somewhere else, and as the rent due to Mr. Grabb was still to pay, these same quarters must be of the humblest description.

It was indeed painful to watch the poor Captain, as jog, jog, went his noisy wooden leg when ascending the bare wooden staircase which led to the upper story, where they had been compelled to take refuge from the importunate Mr. Grabb.

For the first few days the disabled officer was occupied in setting his little curiosities in order. But no sooner was that done than he began again to crave for literature.

It was then that he first missed the sound of the dull thud of his returned contributions in the early mornings; and it struck him all of a heap that they were still undergoing the same process through the door of his late dwelling.

His appeal to the previous landlord was no use whatever, for the latter had already locked the premises, and was not likely to open them again for his late tenant.

"Fork out yer tin, yer loafer," was that gentleman's reply. "But fork or fork no, yer niver see the hinside of that 'ere 'ouse again."

What could be done?

Captain Murchison had no lien whatever on the house—quite the contrary; and no legal power could therefore compel the ruthless landlord to yield. Yet the thing must needs be done. On the principle, therefore, that "necessity knows no laws," Murchison for the first time in his knowledge deliberately broke the laws of his country, à la Bill Sykes.

And except for the gravity of the occasion, it would have been a truly ludicrous sight to watch him on a certain night creeping through the window, with his helpless wooden leg literally sticking out behind him!

There at the back of the door he found the floor strewn with returned manuscripts, accepted proofs, and, (oh, glorious sight!) a copy of the premier Hurry-up Magazine, with his wonderful tale of "Venus and Bellerophon" occupying the place of honour in its coveted pages.

The man that never trembled in real danger did so here from a curious amalgam of joy and—fear of the policeman!

It had been a drizzly night, however, and good Mr. Bobby of the Beat was at this particular time being gaily regaled in a neighbouring kitchen, and quite oblivious of the presence of the amateur burglar.

And most marvellous sight of all, as he opened a certain brown envelope, lo!——

"A cheque or I'm a Dutchman," he gasped, as he anxiously looked at it in the dim light of the candle he had brought with him. A reaction was his when on looking more minutely he discovered that like most of the other papers, the cheque had been so gnawed by the rats that it was—not negotiable.

In much trepidation (and fear of the policeman) he threw everything into his handbag, put out the candle, cautiously crept out through the window, and hurried home.

There was joy in that upper storey that night, for though the cheque was not negotiable in its present tatterdemalion state, it required only a little time to return it and get another in its place. The tale of "Venus and Bellerophon" became quite the rage of the silly season, and was the very making of the gallant Captain in his new sphere.

He got his innings at last, and so stuck to his stumps, that he is now as famous for his pen as he once was for his doughty claymore.

The Brain Gymnasium

In these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver plated pencil-cases or ten popular six shilling novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by first post on Monday, August 27th, 1900.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

CADBURY'S

COCOA

IS ABSOLUTELY PURE

And untampered with, and can be taken with the greatest benefit in Childhood, in Youth, or in Old Age.

THE BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL—Article on "Drugged Foods," June 4th, 1898—says:

"There is a general concensus of opinion that the addition of active drugs, belonging to the classes of nervine stimulants to beverages and articles of dietary in ordinary domestic use is not for the benefit of the community, and is likely in time to produce a deterioration of the public health. . . At the present moment we are beset by another danger arising from the addition of kola to certain articles of food. . . Kola has been found on analysis to contain 2·13 per cent. of caffeine. Caffeine is undoubtedly a useful drug when employed in suitable cases and in appropriate doses, but if taken habitually in large quantities it is capable of inducing an undesirable condition of over-stimulation of the nerve centres."

When asking for Cocoa, insist on having CADBURY'S—Sold only in Packets and Tins—as other Cocoas are sometimes substituted for the sake of extra profit.

SHORT STORIES

Week ending August 25th, 1900.

Baron Steiner's Great Discovery.

A NEW ZEALAND STORY.

ONE evening, in the summer of 1886, a number of tourists and visitors were sitting on the balcony of the Thermal Hotel, Rotorua, watching the rapidly changing beauty of the lake which lay spread out beneath them, whose waters were touched with the subdued and fleeting tints of the dying day. Beyond the lake the distant hill tops were bathed in the gorgeous effulgence of the setting sun. In the foreground, the little native village of Ohinemutu nestled amid innumerable tiny columns of steam which rose from a multitude of hot springs, charging the evening air with the pungent odour of sulphur.

To the majority of those on the balcony the scene was new and strange. Most of them had come from other lands; some in search of health, others again in quest of change and novelty.

The gentlemen were standing about in various attitudes, enjoying an after-dinner cigar or pipe; the ladies were clustered in little groups, discussing the day's programme and comparing notes of the places they had visited.

Through the open French windows of the drawing-room came the sound of music. A young girl was playing a Hungarian air on the piano, a low and tender melody whose plaintive cadence harmonised with the softness and witchery of the fading sunset.

"And you have not yet visited the Terraces," a stout and showily-dressed lady was saying to her companion, a thin, pale-faced little woman, evidently an invalid. "They are a dream. I have never seen anything more lovely, and Charles and I have been everywhere. They say it must have taken millions of years to form them. They are made with something that is in the water. Charles," she exclaimed, suddenly, raising her voice and addressing a portly, elderly gentleman who was standing at the end of the balcony in conversation with a short and foreign-looking tourist, "what do they call the stuff that the Terraces are made of?"

"Silica," replied the individual addressed.

"Yes, that's it, my dear," she went on, taking up the thread of her conversation, "silica; it's wonderful. Of course, you will see them?"

"I am not sure," answered the invalid, in a doubting tone. "I am still very weak, and the doctor tells me I must avoid all exertion."

"You poor sufferers," said the stout lady, compassionately; "how I pity you. It would kill me to be cooped up all the time in this evil-smelling place and unable to fly about and enjoy myself. I must be always on the go. We are off to-morrow to catch the 'Frisco boat."

"Health is a precious gift," remarked the invalid, "but I do not find it at all dull here. One is always seeing new faces, and new faces interest me."

"It is as well," said the stout lady, "that you can find some pleasure in watching others enjoying themselves, but if I were in your place I should feel utterly wretched and lonely."

"I suffer a good deal," said the invalid quietly, "but I am not wretched, and I am not lonely. My son comes up from town very often, and Theresa—Miss Steiner, you know—is like a daughter to me. We spend many afternoons together when all the others are absent."

"Charles tells me her father, the Baron, is a very learned man, but a little eccentric."

"He is a student," replied the invalid, "and his hobby is the study of Maori life and customs."

"Are they Germans?" asked the stout lady. "I heard him speaking to his daughter to-day in what sounded like German."

"No," answered the invalid, "they are Austrians, I believe—at least, they come from Austria, but they have resided in England for a long time."

"One never knows," said the stout lady, "what importance to attach to a foreign title. An English baron is, of course, a member of the aristocracy, but your French counts and German barons don't impress you in the same way, do they?"

"I believe," said the invalid, "that Baron Steiner belongs to a very ancient Austrian family, but that through political troubles he lost his estate and had to leave the country."

"How romantic!" exclaimed the stout lady. "It is like the sort of thing one reads of in novels or sees on the stage. But what a strange idea," she added, "for a foreigner to come out here to study the Maoris. I think them abominable. The men are lazy and dirty, and the women are fat and ugly."

At this moment the music within ceased, and the player, a young girl, dressed in white, came out on the balcony.

Though her face proclaimed that she was yet in her teens—she was, indeed, little more than eighteen—her tall and graceful figure gave her a womanly appearance. In her mass of dark hair she wore a red flower. Though her features were pleasing they were not strikingly beautiful, but if they lacked somewhat the classic curve and perfect line, there was a winsomeness about her open countenance, an attractiveness in her bright dark eyes, a sweetness about the parted lips that could not fail to excite admiration.

She approached the invalid.

"Do you not think, Mrs. Egerton, you ought to have your shawl? The evenings grow chilly."

"Thank you, my dear," said the invalid, as the young lady placed a wrap around her shoulders. "This, Theresa, is Mrs. Tomlinson, the lady whose husband your father was speaking about."

Theresa bowed.

"Mrs. Egerton has been telling me how good you have been to her," said the stout lady, who felt absurdly embarrassed in the presence of this young girl, she knew not why.

"Oh, not at all," said Theresa, with a smile; "it is a mere nothing. We are left together, that is all, and Mrs. Egerton is not well."

"The Baron," said the invalid, in explanation to the stout lady, "is often absent for days."

"Perhaps you don't care to go with him," suggested the stout lady, addressing Theresa.

Theresa laughed a merry little laugh.

"He will not have me," she said. "He says it is not suitable for a lady. He is, you must know, an enthusiast. He is studying the life of the Maoris, and goes to their villages. He thinks I am better here looking after Mrs. Egerton; and, indeed, I think so too."

The invalid gave her a look of gratitude.

"I do not know what I should do without you, Theresa," she said.

At the other end of the balcony, Mr. Tomlinson and the Baron were holding an animated conversation about the story of Hinemoa and Tutanekai.

"It is," observed the Baron, who spoke slowly and with a pronounced foreign accent, "the most beautiful legend in Maori history."

"But," remarked Mr. Tomlinson, "it is not true, of course."

"All legend," said the Baron, "is based on some particles of truth. And what is beautiful I prefer to believe true as well."

"You should hear my wife's opinion about Hinemoa," rejoined Tomlinson, with a laugh.

"Mrs. Tomlinson is a lady of correct tastes," said the Baron politely, "fashioned in conformity with the proprieties of our civilised conventionalism. But the customs of native races must not be judged by the canons in vogue to-day. No young lady would now dream of doing what Hinemoa did; but, after all, Mr. Tomlinson, can we be quite certain that our modern maidens are so far above Hinemoa. But, excuse me, I see I am wanted by my daughter. You are really going then, to-morrow? Well, I wish you bon voyage."

And the Baron shook hands with Mr. Tomlinson and joined his daughter.

Baron Steiner and his daughter had been in Rotorua for two months, and his short, round figure, was well known to most of the natives in the district.

He was a man of fifty or thereabouts, square-shouldered, with a thick crop of fair hair surmounting a high and broad forehead.

He wore a carefully-trimmed beard and pointed moustache. Behind his gold-rimmed pince nez beamed a pair of keen blue eyes, fringed with shaggy eyebrows. His complexion was pale, and there were hollows in his cheeks; his mouth and chin showed that he was a man of determination and will.

The Baron and his daughter had been long settled in England; indeed, Theresa had but a dim recollection of their Austrian home.

When she was still a child her mother died, and shortly afterwards her father quitted his native country and took her to London. They had lived there ever since.

When she sometimes questioned him about the past the Baron would reply:

"My child, there are reasons which prevent your father from returning to his own country. Perhaps some day we will go back and you shall know everything. But, until then, let us be happy here in free and beautiful England. We are alone in the world. I have but you; and you, my child, have but me."

And he would kiss her tenderly and betake himself to his books.

The Baron lived in the style of one who had a comfortable income. He must, therefore, have been a man of means. He was a student and dabbled in science. His time was passed in his library and laboratory. Theresa was passionately attached to her father, and was happy in ministering to his wants and looking after the affairs of the little household.

One day the Baron surprised her by announcing that he had resolved to visit New Zealand.

"The voyage," he said, "will do you good. You will see many strange things; it will be a change. Besides," he added, "there are certain phenomena, my child, in that country which I desire to study. It is there that the great problem may be solved."

"What problem, father?" Theresa asked.

"My child," he replied, "you would not understand. All nature is a problem."

And Theresa was content.

She was not a philosopher, and grand enigmas of science, which she knew possessed a fascination for her father, did not trouble her. To love her father and to make others happy, that was enough for Theresa.

At Rotorua, she had been left much to herself, for the Baron was sometimes absent for days, and in this way she had come to know Mrs. Egerton, a widow lady from Auckland, who had been recommended by her doctor to try a course of the baths.

A warm friendship had sprung up between these two. They spent the greater portion of each day together, sitting on the balcony of the hotel, reading, or sewing, or in the grounds of the Sanatorium.

Mrs. Egerton had an only son, who occupied a position of trust in one of the Auckland banks. Walter Egerton was a quiet but manly young fellow, who, though only twenty-three, looked somewhat older.

He had stayed a week with his mother at Rotorua, and had on several occasions taken the two ladies for a row on the lake.

Theresa, who had been thrown little into the company of young men, thought Walter Egerton a pleasant companion and devoted son. He had, too, a rich baritone voice, and in the evening would sing while Theresa played the accompaniment.

In a short time these three came to feel that they had known each other and been friends for years, and Walter's periodical visits, though only brief, were looked forward to both by his mother and Theresa with keen pleasure.

The Baron, too, was drawn to the young man.

One day he said to Theresa:

"My child, if God had given me a son, instead of a daughter, I should have wished that son to be like Walter Egerton."

"Father," said Theresa, "you are neglecting me for your Maori studies."

And Theresa blushed and turned her head away.

The Baron's wanderings in quest of information concerning the Maori seldom took him, it was noticed, to the native settlements in the immediate neighbourhood of Rotorua. Where he went no one knew.

On one occasion he was seen camped at the base of Maungakakaramea, at the entrance to the Waiotapu Valley. At another time he was at Kouratara, a Maori village high up on the lofty Paeroa range which forms the western flank of the valley.

There is a track which runs from this village over the range, past the alum springs on the other side. This is a region full of interest for the geologist.

The Baron was both a geologist and a chemist, and appeared to find so much to study here that he determined to pitch his tent near to the alum springs. He spent a fortnight in this out-of-the-way place, exploring the numerous caves and fissures, and closely examining the character of the country. He became absorbed in his work. A native, one day, saw him emerging from an opening in the side of the range.

"What you look for?" asked the Maori.

The Baron started as from a dream. His head was uncovered, his eyes gleamed with a strange light. His dress was torn and bedraggled. He looked like one demented.

The Maori repeated his question.

"My friend," said the Baron, as if speaking to himself, "I am in quest of the unknown."

The native did not understand.

He thought the Baron was crazy and went on his way.

In this manner the weeks slipped past and the summer was drawing to a close, but the Baron did not talk of leaving Rotorua. On his return from his wanderings he would shut himself up in his room and pore over his books and pieces of rock that he had brought back with him from his rambles.

The tourist season had come to an end; nearly all the visitors had left. The only ladies who still remained at the hotel were Mrs. Egerton and Theresa.

"I cannot leave you here, my dear, by yourself," Mrs. Egerton had said, "after all your kindness to me. I shall stay until your father desires to leave."

But May had nearly gone, and the Baron had still made no sign. He had become strangely reticent and abstracted.

"Father," said Theresa to him one day, "you are neglecting me for your Maori studies. Have you not finished, dear. Is it necessary that we should stay here longer? I am growing home-sick."

The Baron regarded his daughter with a tender look.

"My child," he said, "it will not be for long. You must have a little patience. I have an idea. Hochstetter had a glimmer of it; but he did not hit upon the secret."

"Secret," repeated Theresa, "what secret, father? Why all this mystification? What is it you are trying to find out?"

"Wait," said the Baron; "you shall know, my child, soon."

The next morning the Baron again departed. He had left his tent near the alum spring, where he had already spent so much time in exploring the numerous caves on the range.

For a week he prosecuted his search with undiminished zeal.

The idea that had taken possession of his mind, which had occurred to him first after reading Hochstetter's work on New Zealand, was that here in this deserted spot, somewhere in the bowels of this riddled range, where the volcanic fires had blazed and smouldered, and smouldered and blazed for thousands of years, the great mystery of the origin of gold was to be solved. It was this haunting dream that had brought him to New Zealand—that had led him to undertake his solitary wanderings, under the pretence of studying the Maori.

And curious enough, the indications that he had succeeded in finding, had strengthened his belief that he was about to wrest from Nature one of her most jealously-guarded secrets.

Beneath him lay a mass of molten gold.

He had discovered faint traces of gold on the walls of a cave, from the floor of which issued a thin jet of vapour. Beyond doubt, he said to himself, the gold was deposited by the vapour.

To find the source of the vapour was to find the source of the gold.

One day he stumbled by chance upon a new opening in the range. It was large enough to admit him without stooping, and looked like the mouth of a tunnel. He lit his lantern and entered without hesitation.

The walls were damp, and a peculiar odour filled the air. He felt a warm draught blow upon his face. He proceeded cautiously, for what hidden depths might not intercept his path.

Once before he had nearly stepped into a yawning fissure and been lost for ever. It was necessary, therefore to advance with care.

The passage which he was traversing had many windings, and he noticed that as he got further and further from the entrance it became narrower.

The sides were jagged and slimy. Strange and horrible things, shapeless creatures of darkness, dropped from the roof as if dazed and stunned by the light. Now and then a snake-like form would glide rapidly along the wall, and disappear in the inky blackness. Once a gigantic bat flew into his face. But the Baron heeded none of these.

On he went until at last he found he could proceed no further. The passage ended abruptly at a wall of rock. He examined it carefully, but found no opening. He was in a cul de sac.

Disappointed, he was about to turn, when he felt, standing here with his face to the rock, a warm current of air strike his face. Whence came it? There must be an opening somewhere.

Raising his lantern, he discovered what looked like a shallow opening between the top of the wall of rock and the roof of the passage. With some difficulty he raised himself, until he reached the spot. Yes, there was an opening, but so small that he could scarcely get his body into it, though lying flat on his face.

Should he attempt to venture into this narrow hole? He had left his lantern behind him, and was now in total darkness. The hot air which issued from the opening in which he lay nearly suffocated him.

For a moment he hesitated, but urged on by an irresistible impulse, he dragged himself a ong. He would, he said to himself, go just a little way. But the heat was becoming intolerable. His throat was parched. It was with difficulty he could breathe. Pungent fumes choked him, a faintness crept over him, and he felt he was losing consciousness.

By a supreme effort of will he threw off this feeling. He braced himself anew. He would, he resolved, go on or die. It is likely enough that the Baron's fate would have been sealed, and that he would have been heard of no more, had it not been that a few yards further in he found that the passage suddenly opened into a lofty and roomy cavity, where the air was less close and stifling.

Wiping his steaming forehead, he stood in the darkness collecting his scattered senses, and afraid to move lest he should lose his way and be unable to return. Striking a match he could make out that he was in a kind of chamber, the floor of which was covered with what looked like fine sand.

At last he determined to venture from where he stood and to slowly follow the wall of the cavern to the right. With one hand on the wall, and groping his way with the other, he advanced cautiously and timorously, making sure at each step of a footing.

Suddenly he felt that he had come to another opening in the wall, and at the same time he could discern a faint reflection at the end of this new passage.

He turned and slowly groped his way in the direction of the strange light. A peculiar noise also fell upon his ears. He listened. It seemed like the gurgling and splashing of a fountain.

After proceeding for some distance he could make out that the passage he was following led to the side of a wide and apparently deep pit, which was filled with a thin luminous vapour. As he approached the end of the passage he went down on his hands and knees, and carefully crawling to the edge, peered below.

The sight that met his gaze made his heart stand still and his brain grow dizzy. He felt as if he was fal ing through space. There beneath him, radiant with exquisite tints, lay a mass of molten gold, millions and millions of ounces of liquid gold, refined and purified in Nature's own mysterious retort. For some moments he could not believe his senses.

He had, he thought, become subject to a delusion. He rubbed his eyes. But they were not playing him a trick. There was still the gold. By the merest chance he had made a great discovery. He had stumbled into the very laboratory and workshop of Nature. He was gazing at a phenomenon that no mortal had ever looked upon before.

Then, as he thought of the enormous wealth that lay within his reach—wealth so stupendous, so incalculable that the millionaires of the world would be as paupers compared with him—his brain reeled.

He, yes he, Baron Steiner, the political refugee, the lonely exile, was the richest man in the whole universe. He laughed, he wept. He apostrophied the dancing dazzling lake of gold. He would leap into its fascinating glow and find a coffin and a tomb that ten thousand thousand Solomons in all their glory could not equal.

Then, as he grew calmer, he thought of Theresa. His child, his darling Theresa, who was so patient, who was becoming home-sick, she should have diamonds that queens and empresses could not purchase. She should live in Aladdin's Palace. Theresa, who was only happy when making others happy, would scatter joy and plenty all around her. She would banish poverty.

The poor would live in clean cottages, standing in sweet smelling gardens. There would be no more slums, no more misery. Privation and sorrow would be driven from thousands of homes. The hearts of the oppressed would rejoice. This untold wealth that God had given him must be used in the service of mankind.

And the Baron sat lost in dreams—glorious and magnificent dreams, lofty dreams which only come to great and good souls.

"Father, you have news for me?" said Theresa, when some days later the Baron returned to Rotorua.

His face was radiant with the light of a great joy.

"My child," he said, taking both her hands in his and kissing her lovingly, "you shall know now. I have succeeded at last. Look at me, my little Theresa; your father has been in Hades. I have burrowed like a mole in the bowels of the earth. But, my darling, I have discovered a great thing. I have seen a subterranean lake of liquid gold. You are, my child, the richest woman in the world."

Theresa drew back in amazement and fear. She regarded her father attentively. A terrible dread entered her soul and froze the blood in her veins.

Had his ardent studies, his long and solitary seeking for the solution of the problem he had so jealously guarded, turned his brain? Was her father losing his reason?

The Baron was quick to divine her suspicions.

"My child," he said, "listen. I am not mad. Look at me; I am quite calm. It is true, all that I have said."

Then he told her of his search; how, under the pretext of investigating the customs of the Maoris, he had all the time been seeking to discover the origin of gold, and how he had in so unexpected a manner come upon an enormous cauldron of the precious metal.

But Theresa did not receive the news with gladness. It did not elate her. On the contrary, it troubled her.

She felt a dull weight at her heart, a sense of impending evil.

"I wish, father," she said, "we had not come to New Zealand; we were happy in England. Let us go back; do not seek to gain possession of this gold. It will bring misery. It belongs to the Evil One."

The Baron laughed.

"My poor child, my little Theresa, you know not what you say. To-morrow, little one, we shall go together to my lake of gold. I shall bring you some of it out of the bowels of the earth. You shall see with your own eyes how beautiful it is."

That evening the Baron was in high spirits.

There were now only four guests in the hotel—Mrs. Egerton and her son, who had come up on the previous day, and the Baron and his daughter. They were seated in the drawing-room, where a bright fire burned, for the night was cold and wet. Theresa played and Walter sang. The Baron and Mrs. Egerton were engaged in a game of cribbage.

The evening passed quickly and pleasantly. They were a quiet and happy party. Before they separated for the night the Baron said to Mrs. Egerton:

"We are leaving here on Monday next. I have finished what I had in hand."

"We shall return to Auckland together," Mrs. Egerton replied. "I shall be glad to leave Rotorua. I feel the cold."

"Good-night, all," cried the Baron, gaily; then, as if seized with a sudden thought, he called Walter to him. "I want to ask you a question," he said. "Supposing someone were to leave you a large fortune, what would you do?"

"Do you want to know really?" he asked.

"Of course," said the Baron.

"I would ask you," replied Walter, in a low voice, "for the hand of your daughter."

Walter ran across the room and, drawing the curtains, looked out of the window.

"I thought as much," said the Baron. "Well, who knows? The age of fairies is not past yet. Good-night."

The Baron opened the window and went on to the balcony. The rain had ceased and the stars were shining, but a cold wind blew over the lake. No lights were visible in the native settlement. All was silent and peaceful. He returned to the drawing-room, closing the window behind him.

Theresa was standing in front of the fire waiting to receive her good-night kiss.

"It is freezing to-night," said the Baron, shivering; "run to bed, little one, and God bless you."

That was destined to be a memorable night in Rotorua. Soon after midnight everyone in the hotel was awakened by the violent shaking of the building, caused by an earthquake.

Theresa sprang out of bed and lit her candle. It was her first experience of an earthquake, and she thought the hotel was about to collapse, burying everyone beneath it. Slipping on her dressing-gown, she rushed to her father's room and rapped loudly at the door.

"Father?" she called, "Father?"

"My dear," answered the Baron calmly, "don't be alarmed. It is nothing. There is no danger. Go back to your room. Have no fear."

On the way back, somewhat reassured, Theresa met Mrs. Egerton, who was also nervous and anxious.

"Father," said Theresa, "says there is no danger."

The two women went to Theresa's bedroom.

A second shock again caused the windows to rattle, and the pictures on the walls to move. After this other but less violent shocks came in quick succession.

Clinging together in bed Mrs. Egerton and Theresa heard servants moving about, and the sound of Walter's voice at the door. He affected to treat the matter lightly.

"This is a pretty how-do-you-do," he called out to them cheerily. "How do you like being shaken by an earthquake, Miss Steiner?"

Theresa did not like it at all. However, the shocks became less frequent and less severe, and the terrified sleepers were beginning to hope that they were at last passing away, when one, more violent than any before, almost hurled them from their beds.

Then a roar, deep, prolonged and fearsome, startled the most courageous. Something unusual had occurred. Was the earth about to open and swallow them. There was now a general rush for the street.

Mrs. Egerton and Theresa, wrapping a blanket each around them, ran long the corridor, meeting the Baron and Walter, who were on their way to fetch them.

"I fear something dreadful has happened," said Walter, hurriedly. "It will be better for us to leave the building in case of danger."

The Baron did not speak. He appeared dazed and confused.

As they passed the drawing-room door a reflected light filled the room.

"Surely there must be a fire somewhere," remarked Mrs. Egerton, standing at the open door.

Walter ran across the room and, drawing the curtains aside, looked out of the window.

"Great heavens!" he exclaimed in a tone of awe. "Come here!"

They went to where he was standing staring, spell-bound. A magnificent but an appalling sight met their gaze. Far off, but apparently close, Mount Tarawera was shooting up balls of liquid fire into the black sky, where they burst into millions of brilliant stars; and out of the inky cloud of smoke and dust, which hung above the roaring mountains, flashed and darted in all directions ten thousand tongues of vivid lightning of all conceivable colours.

"Heavens!" exclaimed the Baron, "it is a volcanic eruption and I am lost."

The women shrieked in terror.

"Let us hasten from here," said Walter, taking his mother and Theresa by the arm and hurrying them from the hotel.

On getting outside they were swallowed in darkness. Fine dust was falling, and the atmosphere was filled with sulphurous fumes. They could hear the shouts of human voices. Everyone was fleeing, panic-stricken Europeans and natives, men, women, and children, most of them scantily dressed.

"Get on the Oxford Road," a man shouted to them, as he ran past. "Whakarewarewa will go next."

He carried a lantern and they followed him as well as they could, moving with the stream of panic-stricken fugitives, being jostled and knocked about by those wild with fear, who thought only of their own safety.

After they had gone a mile or so Mrs. Egerton stopped. She could, she said, proceed no further. She was exhausted, and her feet were cut and bleeding.

Theresa, too, was suffering great agony. There were little groups all around them—women in hysterics, and children crying and strong men chafing at their own helplessness.

Suddenly Theresa discovered that her father was not with them.

In the excitement and confusion of their hurried flight in the darkness and din which prevailed, the absence of the Baron had not been noticed before.

Theresa was inconsolable.

"I must go back," she said; "I must find him."

"That would be madness, Theresa," said Walter, unconsciously addressing her for the first time in his life by her christian name. "You must remain here until it is light."

The hours passed with agonising slowness, but at last the welcome dawn came, restoring courage to the huddled fugitives by the roadside. The air was full of smoke, but Rotorua had not been destroyed. All the buildings were still standing.

There was, however, no sign of the Baron, nor did they see anything of him on their way back to the hotel. Here dreadful news awaited them.

The Baron shortly before their arrival, had been picked up from beneath the balcony in an insensible condition. He must have lost his presence of mind, and, instead of following the others, had tried to effect his escape by means of the balcony, and had fallen on the concrete pathway below.

The sad news was broken gently to Theresa by Mrs. Egerton. Theresa insisted on being taken to her father at once.

The Baron was lying in his room. His face was covered with blood. He appeared to have fallen on his head.

"My poor dear father," cried Theresa, falling on her knees by his side; and burying her face in her hands she sobbed piteously.

They led her away, gently and sorrowfully, and on reaching her room she swooned in Mrs. Egerton's arms.

When the doctor arrived he pronounced the Baron's case hopeless. He had sustain a double fracture of the skull. The Baron did not regain consciousness. He lingered until noon, when he died.

Theresa received the news with preternatural calmness. She did not speak; she did not weep. She sat with fixed gaze and rigid face, every line of which expressed intense suffering and grief. Next morning she was delirious, and in a raging fever.

* * * * *

It was late in the Spring, and the weather was warm and beautiful. Already the flowers were bursting into bloom.

In a pleasant garden ovelooking the Waitemata, Theresa was sitting in an arm-chair, her head resting on a pillow. A rug was wrapped round her knees. She was looking pale and thin, and showed signs of recent suffering and illness. Mrs. Egerton occupied a seat beside her.

"Yes," Theresa was saying, "I have promised, and Walter has promised. He will not seek to find the gold poor father told me of. If it exists there is a curse upon it. It is a destroyer."

"That's the compact, mother," said Walter, who joined them as she finished speaking. "And yet Theresa might be the wealthiest woman in the world."

"I prefer," said Theresa in a low sweet voice, looking up into the manly face of her lover, "to be the happiest."

The Making of a Lady.

THE cabin was built of logs, time-stained and decaying, the moss of fifty years upon its roof. It lay back among the blue gums at the very foot of the mountain, where the river ran shallow through the gulch.

For half a century it had weathered the storms of winter and the heat of summer, for it was a "forty-niner," as was also Jacob Wainright, who had hewn the logs and built it with his own sturdy hands when the gold excitement was at its highest in Australia.

He had camped on the creek and slept on the ground when he first came to the gold regions. Camping had been good enough for the hardy young prospector. But when Margarita dawned upon the horizon of his life it became a different matter. The cabin had been built for Margarita.

Jacob Wainright had not been one of fortune's favourites, who awakened penniless and before sunset found himself a millionaire—at least not during the time when such instances were a frequent occurrence.

The fickle goddess had proved a laggard as far as he was concerned, and for several years refused to smile upon his efforts. But Margarita was as happy as the sunshine that drifted into the canyon and flooded the doorway. She sang as gaily as the mocking bird in the gums at the back of the cabin.

When the little Carlotta came she sang more joyously than ever. In Jacob Wainright's opinion her sweet voice far out-rivalled the birds. He made good wages out of the dirt he panned, if he did not gain wealth, and with health and happiness a man would have been an ingrate to worry.

"It will come some day," he used to tell Margarita. "It will come in plenty of time to make a lady of Carlotta."

For Jacob Wainright and his faithful young wife had but one ambition, and that was to make a lady of their little girl.

When, after a few happy years of life together, Margarita was laid to rest under the shade of the gum trees and her brief bright life was only a beautiful memory, Wainright had but Carlotta to think of and plan for. She was his one thought, his constant companion, his heart's idol. It was then that the thirst for riches took full possession of him.

Gold! Gold! He thought of it night and day; he saw it glittering and yellow in his dreams. He must have it. The mountains must yield their hidden treasures—all for Carlotta.

With her he tramped over the mountains on long prospecting tours, hoping that each day would bring him Carlotta's fortune. It was when he was not looking for it that his good luck came to him.

They were walking down the gulch one afternoon not far from Wainright's cabin, when he suddenly dropped Carlotta's hand and went down on his knees, digging in the ground with his hands where the rocks lay broken and crushed. He seemed like one who had lost his senses. Then he sprang to his feet, his eyes black with excitement. In his toil-hardened hand were several lumps of yellow ore.

"I've struck it, Carlotty!" he shouted. "I've struck it rich, honey! Hooray, little 'un; we'll make a lady of you now!"

Later, when Carlotta was old enough to be sent to school, he took her to Paramatta and placed her with the Sisters at Notre Dame. It was a great wrench to Wainright to give her up, but nothing should stand in the way of Carlotta's future.

Once a month he went to Paramatta to see her. His increasing wonder and delight over the advancement of the pretty little girl in fine frocks, with a manner that awed Wainright, was touching to witness. He seemed half afraid of the dainty little maid and would take her small hand in his and stroke it with his big roughened finger, or, lifting her cautiously to his knee, would pass his hand bashfully over her dark curls.

"Who'd a thought it?" he would say proudly. "A awkward, no 'count feller like me havin' a little gal like Carlotty! Ain't she a comin' on, though? Why, she'll be a lady in no time!"

Four years later she went to Sydney to one of the best schools, and when the time came for her to graduate, Wainright donned his best suit of clothes and went to see his little girl in all her glory. Afterward he watched her depart with a party of wealthy people from Sydney for Europe.

He stood on the wharf and waved his handkerchief as long as he could see the steamer. Carlotta returned his farewell by waving a dainty bit of lace and linen once or twice, but she was talking with the kid-gloved scion of a prominent Sydney family, and the commonplace, rugged-faced man, with "the decidedly Western look," as her friends had described her father, standing alone on the wharf in the great city full of strangers was soon forgotten.

Wainright had coughed a little over a lump that rose in his throat when he found his parting salute no longer returned. He ceased to wave his bandana and rubbed it hastily across his eyes.

"By gum!" he muttered. "I'm a low down sort of creature. I want to keep that little gal of mine from everybody. There's selfishness for you!"

Carlotta had remained abroad two years. When she returned to Australia she was a highly accomplished young lady. It had taken a small fortune to supply her needs while abroad, but Wainright never stinted her. Nothing was too good for his "little gal."

Immediately on her return to Sydney she was married to an immaculate person belonging to one of the most aristocratic families in the place. This was why she could not come home, she wrote. She sent her father the wedding cards and begged him to come and attend her wedding. But they did not arrive till after the date of the marriage.

Wainright grieved greatly that he should have missed the pleasure of his little girl's grand wedding. But he read it in the papers until, to use his own words, "he knew it by heart," and could repeat it word for word in the dark after he went to bed.

He went to see Carlotta once in the lovely house he had given her as a wedding present. But his visit was not a long one. He felt out of place in the elegant house. Carlotta's distinguished-looking, aristocratic husband was a being he could not come in touch with. Wainright stood in great awe of him, regarding him with an unmixed admiration at a distance. It is doubtful if the compliment were returned. Carlotta's husband was too well bred, however, to treat his wife's rich father with anything but courtesy. He explained to his friends that his father-in-law was immensely rich and a well-meaning man, but "distinctively Western."

Wainright made a short visit; somehow he couldn't breathe in the imposing Sydney home. He was anxious to get back to the backwoods.

With a promise from Carlotta to visit him in the old home the next year, he returned to the mine and his beloved mountains.

"It's the place for an old feller like me, I fancy," he said, soberly, and fell into thoughtful silence.

But Carlotta did not come the next year—nor the next. The years sped by and children came to her home, but there was always some reason why she could not visit the far West.

Her husband was not a financier, and Carlotta had many needs for money. As the children grew up the needs increased. Carlotta always had needed a great deal of money.

Wainright remembered. It was the joy of his life that he had it to give her. He sent it generously and never questioned what she did with it. And so the years passed and half a century had rolled over Jacob Wainright's head since he built the log house under the gum trees.

Recently a new mine had been developed near his old claim by an enterprising British company. The old man did a little placer mining to supply his simple wants for his fortune was almost gone, and he hoarded the remainder religiously for Carlotta.

When he was not at work he was generally to be found at the new mine. Several stamp mills had been put in and were already at work, and everything was life and stir. It was like the old days to the pioneer of '49. He spent hours at the mine talking to the men, telling yarns of the old days and about the time he made his pile. The boys all liked him and list ned good-naturedly to his glowing stories of his little girl Carlotta.

"The finest lady in Sydney, sir! Why, that gal of mine has trains a yard long to her gowns, and diamonds that 'ud dazzle a fellow blind, but they ain't too good for Carlotty."

Everybody in camp was glad when it was said that old Wainright's daughter had all her plans arranged and was at last coming to visit him. He had written her of his failing health and she had promised that nothing should hinder her coming.

At last Carlotta was coming! Wainright sat in front of the door, smoking and thinking it over. He was bent and feeble, his weather-beaten face seamed with wrinkles. He removed his pipe frequently to cough.

"Fifty year!" he said musingly. "Fifty year since I built this here house. Pretty near that long since I laid Margarita to rest back of the cabin there. Goodness! how pretty she looked a-layin' in her coffin with the posies in her little white hands!" He brushed his trembling hand across his dim old eyes. "I'm gettin' to be an old man—seventy-seven; that's gettin' along—and with this cough a-rippin' the inside of me it ain't likely I'll last over long.

"That's what I wrote Carlotty," he continued, after a few pulls at his pipe. "It seemed as if I just couldn't throw up the stakes without seein' my little gal once more. There's been a gnawin' pain in my breast for years—a heap wuss 'an this cough gives me—an' it's just this everlasting waitin' an' longin' to see Carlotty. I couldn't stand it much longer, no how—I ain't got the grit I used to have. Fact is, I'm too selfish where Carlotty is concerned—I always was."

He chuckled to himself over the last observation, as if the idea pleased him.

"Yes, yes," he murmured smilingly, "I always was a selfish old cuss. I could have fought that Sydney feller when he married my little gal. By gum! she married a swell, though—Carlotty did! They ain't a grander lady in Sydney than my little gal is. Don't seem as if she could be a woman of forty-six. Why, it seems only yist'day she was a-settin' on this here very stone, her black eyes shinin' like stars, a-holdin' out her little hands for the yaller stuff, whilst I was pannin' the dirt."

The old man filled his pipe again.

"Carlotty was born for gold. She took to it naturally it seemed as though she just loved the very glitter of it.

Digitized by Google

I knowed it was the yaller stuff that was to make a lady of my little gal—an' I didn't care fer nothin' but to git it fer her. Bein' a fine lady hain't spiled Carlotty. She's a-comin' all the way from Sydney just to see her old dad! Think of that—and me so selfish I haven't been to see her in all these years! But, bless the little girl she's a-comin' to see her old father an' make this here cabin bright as glory.

"Of course, she's a-comin'—I always knowed that she would as soon as she could. She hain't her own mistress like she was with the old man, an' then she has the children to look after. Nothin' ain't a-goin' to hinder her this time, because her poor old dad is ill—wearing out, that's all that ails him—but, for the love of heaven, you couldn't make Carlotty believe it!"

He took a letter from his pocket, and between fits of coughing read it again, his eyes dim with happy tears.

"To-morrow's the day," he murmured tremulously. "Carlotty is a-comin' to-morrow. I thought she'd want to come right here to her dear ma's home fust. She can stay over at the hotel at the Forks if she wants to, but she'll want to stay here for a time at first. She'll want to put flowers on her ma's grave, and sit by it with me, like we used to do, while I tell her how faithful and lovin' her pretty young ma was, an' how I loved my little Carlotty first. just because she was her ma's little gal."

That afternoon the old man tramped far up the trail and was gone until nearly night. When he returned he was loaded down with flowers and vines. He walked slowly, with uncertain step, and coughed incessantly, but he went patiently to work decorating the house for Carlotta's coming. His old hands shook and his steps lagged before he had finished the task, but he worked away resolutely until the last spray was arranged to his liking.

When he had finished his work he went outside and sat down on the doorstep. He wiped the perspiration off his forehead, and a smile of deep contentment stole into his weary face.

The sun had gone down and the shadows were gathering about him, but he did not heed them.

"I don't think I'll have any supper." He laughed softly. "What a silly fool I am—I'm just too happy to eat."

A horseman appeared on the road leading to the mines. The old man did not see him until he was at the very door.

"I got a letter for you over at the Forks," the rider said good-naturedly, as he handed it down. "Can't stay a minute. I expect that daughter of yours started by an earlier train. Good thing, too," he added to himself as he galloped away. "The old man won't last long."

"Yes, yes; that was it," said old Wainright, smiling. "How silly of my old heart to jump like that. Why, for a minute I was fairly scared—I actually was. Carlotty's a-comin' by an earlier train, an' wants her old dad to be at the station to meet her."

He tore the envelope open with trembling fingers, and in the fading light began to read aloud:

"Dear Father: I find that I cannot start at the time I wrote you I would. It seems this is going to be an unusually important season. There is a most eligible young Englishman here for the winter, who is paying marked attentions to Clarissa. I must make the most of an opportunity like this, I am sure your cough is not serious; you know you have often been frightened about it before this. If Clarissa's prospects continue as bright as at present it will hardly be possible for me to visit you this season——"

He read no further.

The shaking hand that held the letter fell nerveless at his side. An ashen grey had crept into his face. He spoke no word, but stared blankly into the gathering darkness.

* * * * *

The moonlight filtered through the swaying branches of the gum trees at the back of the cabin. It fell upon the bent figure of an old man kneeling by the side of a lonely grave. He was a very old man, and he trembled as if with ague.

The night wind blew his white hair about his drawn face, and he stretched his shaking arms across the empty silence. Then his head dropped forward on his breast and he slipped gently to the moist earth.

It was thus that they found him in the morning, a crumpled letter, bearing a Sydney postmark, in his stiffened hand.

Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XX.—HE DOES A LITTLE INVESTIGATION AT HIS COUNTRY PLACE.

When Mr. Bowser had seen the coat-tails of Dusty Bill disappear around a bend in the road and had watched the rising sun until assured it could take care of itself, he went in to breakfast. He found Mrs. Bowser looking very homesick, and the cook had her chin in the air and a frown on her face.

"Are—are we going home to-day?" hesitatingly queried Mrs. Bowser after a bit.

"Yes, that's what I want to know," added the cook.

"Going home?" repeated Mr. Bowser in tones of astonishment. "Of course we are not going home to-day. We have got this place for three months. We only arrived here yesterday evening. You women must be losing your senses!"

"But this awful, awful place!" protested Mrs. Bowser as the tears came to her eyes.

"There's nothing awful about it. It's a farm. There are a few weeds and thistles about, but every farm has 'em. We came out for the pure air, the peace and quietness. We were disturbed last night by a tramp, a dog and an owl, but it won't happen again. We'll have provisions here to-day, and I'll cut down the weeds round the house, and before another twenty-four hours you'll be thankful that I brought you out. Ah! but do you get the scent of the new-mown hay coming through the windows?"

"It's the water in the cellar you smell," said Mrs. Bowser.

"And there's rats down there as big as a barrel," added the cook.

Mr. Bowser had finished his breakfast of sandwiches and pickles. He pushed his chair back, and standing before Mrs. Bowser, he said:

"Woman, I want no more howling. If you want to go back to the city and burn, and roast, and shrivel, and become a mummy, I have no objections, and you can take the cook with you; but, as for me, I stay. I have already gained five pounds. For the first time in ten years I can breathe through my nose. In a week longer, with these gorgeous sunrises and sunsets and sweet-scented zephyrs, I shall be as fat as a pig and on my way to live a hundred years. I am now going forth to inspect our domain."

There was no more to be said. Mr. Bowser had put his foot in it, and would have given a good deal to have been able to back out of the affair and save his pride and dignity; but as there was no chance to do so, he must go ahead.

He clapped his hat on and started out for a walk. It was a farm which was under mortgage instead of under cultivation. The fences were down, the outbuildings in ruin, and the fields were overgrown.

"I ought to be kicked for coming out here," he admitted to himself as he stood and gazed over the landscape, "but I'll try and hang on for three or four days more at the least. By George, but that's a singular insect! That must be what they call a bumble-bee. It's either a bumble-bee or a humming bird."

It was a bumble-bee. He was large and solid of frame, and the pure air of the country had given him a feeling of independence. He went sailing about as if he had all the week to get there and back, and Mr.

Lowering its head, it dashed for Farmer Bowser.

Digitized by Google

"Murder! Thieves! Police!" shouted Mr. Bowser, as he danced about.

Bowser followed and tried to knock him down with his hat. The chase led to an old meadow, and with a drone of defiance the bee disappeared in a big bunch of grass.

"Where there's bees there's honey," mused Mr. Bowser as he stood and gazed at the spot. "I don't remember whether Brown said there was any honey on the farm or not, but if I come across a pailful so much the better."

He had started to investigate when his attention was attracted to the bovine they had seen in a field the previous night. He had told Mrs. Bowser it was probably a new milk cow, but now he discovered that it was an ancient-looking one-horned bullock. The animal was hardly more than a living skeleton, and had evidently been turned out to shift for itself, but it had more curiosity than flesh. Seeing Mr. Bowser in the field, it came shambling along to make a closer acquaintance.

He picked up a stick to drive it away, but the bullock seemed to be without fear. Lowering its head and uttering a loud bellow it dashed for Farmer Bowser, and he turned and fled for an old strawstack not far away. He reached it far enough ahead to climb to the apex and escape the horn, but for two long hours the bullock stood guard below and kept him up there. The two hours might have been four had not a tramp, who was looking for a turnip patch, entered the field and driven the creature away.

"What're you doin' out here in the country?" he asked, as Mr. Bowser came down.

"Taking a holiday," was the reply.

"Hired the farm?"

"Yes."

"Got the fam'ly out?"

"Yes."

"Well, old chap, I've long wanted to meet the biggest fool in the world, and I fancy I'm lookin' at him now. A man who'll come out to a place like this for a holiday has either got sawdust in his head or is hidin' from the cops. That bullock must have took you for a cabbage head."

"You will keep your opinions to yourself, sir!" stiffly replied Mr. Bowser, "but here's sixpence for driving that brute off and releasing me."

"Thanks, old chap. Don't you want to hire a man by the month?"

"What for?"

"To help you enjoy the landscape and keep the butterflies from stealin' your hat!"

When the tramp had gone, Mr. Bowser busied himself for half-an-hour in throwing stones at the one-horned bullock, which had retired to a distance, and seemed to be plunged into meditation. He could hit him every time, but the stones gave forth a hollow sound, and were totally disregarded, and the sport was abandoned after a time for a closer investigation of that bumble-bee's nest. The only way to find a nest in the grass is to look for it.

Mr. Bowser advanced as bold as a lion, and began to paw at the grass. He presently heard a sound like a child's rattle, but gave it no attention until about two hundred overgrown and aggressive bumble-bees suddenly flew up out of the grass and sailed into him. He did not believe they were in earnest until he felt a red hot darning needle enter the calf of his left leg. Before he could open his mouth to yell, the right leg was served the same way.

"Murder! Thieves! Police!" shouted Mr. Bowser as he danced about, and the bees continued to make him jump, and it was not until he got a sting on the chin that he started for the house.

The bees followed him. A bumble bee never lets go of a good thing. They had a good thing in Mr. Bowser. His yells were heard at the house, and long before he got there he saw Mrs. Bowser at the door, and the cook looking over her shoulder. As he came up on the gallop, his ears working and his eyes bulging, Mrs. Bowser cried out for an explanation. He didn't pause to give it, however. He made a half circuit of the house and plunged into an acre of docks and thistles and other weeds, and there the bees left him. He was lying on his back and panting for breath when Mrs. Bowser appeared and exclaimed:

"For heaven's sake, but what is the matter with you? What was all this running about?"

Then she caught a sight of Mr. Bowser's face. There was a lump on his chin, a second under his left eye, two on his neck, and one on his forehead, and about forty more which she couldn't see, but which felt as big as washtubs to him.

"Now you'll start for home, won't you?" she asked as he tried to sit up and groaned like a dying horse.

"Never, woman—never on the face of this earth!" he shouted as he fell back among the weeds.

The Dream of Arnold Blythe.

The Argonaut.
7th Nov., '99

"The Editor presents his compliments to Mr. Arnold Blythe and returns the inclosed with his best thanks."

ON a seat in the Embankment Gardens, Arnold Blythe literary man of no repute, sits, clutching in his hand the fateful paper inscribed as above. He is as near starving as can be, while he feels himself to be a victim to a lack of system as hollow as it is idiotic.

He has hitherto blindly followed such professional finger-posts as "peg away," "never say die," "try something else," thus ever searching for the right Editor as Japhet searched for his father.

And the result has left him penniless, well-nigh shoeless, and utterly exhausted. He knows that he has the article some editor must require, but thanks to an orderless system the editor in question is invariably invisible.

The cold wind comes sweeping up from the river, it searches his thin garments, chills his foodless frame.

He murmurs a name.

"Mami—Mami! God bless my little Mami!"

In sheer inertia his head droops; the stereotyped slip falls from his fingers, and, oblivious of all things, he sleeps.

* * * * *

A busy street in the great city of the burning pavement, much affected by publishers, newspaper and magazine offices, in fact, a mighty literary and journalistic centre. The doors of the various palatial buildings stand wide open as if inviting entry. Some, there are light-hearted, of gay plumage, and on good terms with the world, themselves, and the presiding genii of the temples of knowledge. These pass in and outwith a smile upon their lips, and laughter in their eyes.

But Arnold Blyth, the mocking echo of the words "declined with thanks," ringing in his ears, unwanted, empty of hope and faith, turns in the direction of his home.

Before leaving the magic thoroughfare he is suddenly brought to a standstill in front of an unpretentious-looking house. He could have sworn that as he had passed and re-passed the spot both on this day and previous days without number, no such house existed. Part of the ground floor is a shop, the lower half of the window of which is filled with a wire blind, upon which, in gold letters, is the legend:

"LITERARY BUREAU AND REGISTRY OFFICE.
Sec.,—
The Hon. Aldwyn Merton."

The man wholly in doubt, despairing doubt before, in his wanderings up and down the street does not hesitate now. Tremblingly opening the modest door he finds himself in a spacious room separated by half-drawn curtains and a counter of polished mahogany from its larger part.

"Your pleasure, sir," said a voice at his elbow, and he turned to see a tall, kindly-looking, honest-eyed man, who evidently had followed immediately upon his own entrance.

For the life of him he could not answer the interrogator who giving his hat to an attendant gently indicated precedence to his visitor in the direction of the inner sanctum.

"Take a chair, Mr.——er—?"

"Blythe," stammered the other.

"Well, Mr. Blythe, my name is Merton, and I need hardly say that I shall be very glad to be of service to you, should you need such service at my hands. What's the trouble?"

The Secretary's whole manner was so delightfully confidence-inspiring; so sympathetic in every way that poor Arnold incontinently surrendered himself to the novel influence.

"Before you speak Mr. Blythe, let me briefly explain the objects of this Institution for I can see you are a stranger to them."

Evidently a keen observer, as well as a large-hearted philanthropist.

"The great need of the day," he continued, "is, as we believe, the promotion of more intimate relations between Author and Editor, whereby both may get exactly that which they want by means of Registers and Lists kept by us of mutual requirements, open to be consulted by either party. This we have found so far to be successful, and it is to help the struggling poorer literary toiler that we mainly address our energies. Now what can I do for you?"

In reply Arnold Blythe simply handed to the other a M.S. Glancing at it Mr. Merton touched an electric bell.

"Bring me A. B. C. lists."

Taking up one of the three the Secretary rapidly ran his finger down the columns, and stopped.

"Now, Mr. Blythe, if you will be good enough to look at this entry you will find that there is an article on the subject treated of by you required by the editor of the 'Metropolitan.'"

"Wonderful," gasped Arnold. "Who thought of it, who perfected the idea?"

"Well, I suppose I may claim the parentage," said Mr Merton, smiling, "but that is a mere detail, the main point is that the results are, so far, satisfactory and encouraging."

"What have I to do now?"

"Simply take this letter which I shall write to the editor of the 'Metropolitan,' and he will, if not already suited, which I do not think he is, be only too glad to come to terms with you. Excuse me a moment while I write the note."

Passing over a current copy of the journal in question to Blythe he proceeded to write the letter.

"There! You'll find Sampson a pleasant fellow, and all I ask of you in return for this is that you register with me every MS. you may henceforth write, while the Editorial lists will be open for your inspection at all times during office hours. Fee! my dear fellow, no! When you are a great man, and have big bankers' balances we'll talk of fees; till then au revoir, and my best wishes for success."

The hand-shake between the two men was electric, at least for Blythe, and with "Mami" echoing in his heart and new life pulsating through every vein he sped eastward to his destination.

* * * * *

"Mr. Sampson in?"

"Yes, sir."

"Be good enough to give him this letter from Mr. Merton. I'll wait."

"Walk this way, sir, if you please."

"Glad to see you Mr. Blythe. My friend Merton says that you have something I am desperately in need of."

"For what it is worth," said Arnold, "here it is," handing the Editor the MS.

The latter took it and quickly but deliberately read it from start to finish.

"Good! very good! this will suit me admirably. Now I am sure you will understand when I say that I'm horribly busy, so if I may trouble you to take this pay-note to the cashier downstairs," rapidly filling up a printed form as he spoke, "it will no doubt convenience you as it does me. I don't want to drive you away, as I should really like a chat with you but an Editor's time is not made to be trifled with, I assure you, and as you very well know I daresay. Good-bye, and come and see me again, I'll send proofs on to you."

The pay-note duly honoured to an extent Arnold had never dreamed of, and with a speed utterly alien to his sad experience of monthly and even quarterly settlements, he is out in the street again.

How he reached his home he could not say, but there was Mami, with her soft, round little arms to twine about his neck, and to whisper loving nothings into his ready ear. As she lay upon the sofa, looking, in the fading summer twilight, the image of his dead wife, he knelt down by her and as he poured the little streams of gold and silver into her baby lap he prayed, "Oh! God! bless my Mami! Yea, and she shall be blessed."

* * * * *

The wind still blows keenly in the Embankment Gardens and every now and then in marrow-piercing squalls.

Slowly the man wakes out of his fitful sleep, to find the ideal merged in the real; for is there not still in his hand the paper, the words of which burn themselves into his brain.

By-and-by a gardener passing the seat is struck with the strange stillness of the occupant.

Calling a comrade, they raise his head.

In the great awakening only will he meet with Mami.

RALPH ENDERBY.

A THREE-CORNERED SWINDLE.

It wasn't what a conservative old lawyer would call a straight case. I had been sent to London to look up a sharper and make him disgorge for the benefit of the heirs of another sharper.

The wife of one John Saunders, an Englishman who had died abroad several years previously, had put her claims in the hands of a Dublin lawyer. This Saunders had been mixed up in a big swindle before leaving England.

Something like £20,000 had been reaped from it, but his partner in the transaction had gobbled up most of it and had also managed to pull his neck out of the noose, while Saunders had been hunted out of the country. It was the claim of one swindler against another—no more, no less.

The evidence we had, consisted of a number of papers to which both names were attached. The name of the living partner was Smallwood, and it was understood that he had set up as a money-lender. These papers criminated Smallwood in a sense, but in case he was defiant we could not push the case against him.

After some little trouble I found Smallwood and his den. He was a burly, big man, with a loud voice and a domineering way. In assisting to penetrate that swindle he had had a narrow escape, and he realised that in a way he was still under the surveillance of the police, but I put him down as a man not to be easily frightened. I found I was right in this. When I had stated my errand, he laughed in my face and called me a fool. Between ourselves he did not deny the swindle. On the contrary, he boasted of the neat way in which it had been worked. He had furnished the brains, and John Saunders was the catspaw.

He had secured £19,000 of the money and escaped the law, while his partner had fled to a foreign land with the remnant and died among strangers.

"My dear sir," he said, as he smiled and rocked to and fro, "you were a fool to come on any such errand. You have papers, but I would not give you the price of a dinner for them. I am solid, and you can't disturb me. Go to Scotland Yard, go to the lawyer, do what you will, and I shall only laugh at you."

Neither Scotland Yard nor the lawyers could help me in the case. While it couldn't be called blackmail, it was an attempt to squeeze money out of a swindler.

The one interview satisfied me that my mission was a failure, and I bade Mr. Smallwood good-day with as much courtesy as I could assume. It was about lunch-time when I left his office and I dropped into a modest restaurant for a light meal.

I had scarcely got seated when a stranger who had a seedy-genteel look about him asked permission to take the opposite side of the table, saying that he had some information to give me. When we had begun on our meal, he said:

"I saw you leave old Smallwood's office and followed you. Has he done you a bad turn?"

I did not give my case away in replying, but gave him to understand that he had refused to do the square thing by me.

"He's a cur, a cheat, a swindler, and all that's mean and contemptible!" continued the stranger, with a good deal of feeling. "He has cheated and wronged me, and I can get no satisfaction. To-day, however, I learnt of an incident in his past life that will give me a good hold on him. I must go to Liverpool to complete my information. If you will go along and become responsible for expenses, I will share the information with you."

For awhile I was chary of the man, thinking he might be in the pay of Smallwood, but I finally decided that I could lose nothing by tr sting him.

Smallwood had once lived in Liverpool under another name and had been guilty of a crime for which he had to flee to Brazil and remain there for several years. This man, who gave the name of Duff, proposed to go down and look up the matter and put the police on the scent. He was going to do this out of revenge, but in my case I had no revenge to gratify. I thought it might be a good thing to hold over Smallwood as a bluff, however, and I promised to reward Duff if anything came of it.

In the course of a couple of hours I returned to the money-lender's office. He greeted me affably and laughingly said:

"I have heard that you Irish are a persistent race, but in this case you are simply wasting your shoe leather. I suppose you have come to make a new offer?"

"I have come about that Liverpool affair," I replied, and I went on and stated the nature of his crime and the name he used to sail under.

The shot told. The man grew nervous and pale-faced, and when I had concluded he said:

"How you secured your information I do not know, but I will frankly admit that it is partly correct. I have little fear that the police would meddle with me at this late date, but I do not care to have the affair stirred up. I am willing to make a fair financial arrangement with Saunders' widow."

That was a matter to be talked over at another meeting. I was a bit surprised that Smallwood should give in so quickly, but concluded that the Liverpool affair was rather serious and that like a man of sense he preferred to part with a couple of thousand sooner than have it resurrected.

He had rooms over his office, and I was to dine with him on the next evening but one at eight o'clock, and the matter of restitution would be arranged. I went to the place appointed by Duff to meet him, but he was not there. I had given him my address, but he did not call on me. As a matter of fact, I never saw him again. After he had played his part he vanished.

When I made my third call on Smallwood, I was cordially received, and while waiting for supper to be served we came to an understanding. He was to give me two thousand pounds for Saunders' widow, and I was to give him a receipt in full.

He grew sociable and jolly as the affair was concluded, and my glass was no sooner empty than he pressed me to drink again. Of a sudden things began to whirl, and then came a blank. When I recovered consciousness, it was morning, and I was lying on a bed in a strange room.

My head buzzed and ached, my throat was as dry as paper, and as I rolled out of bed and attempted to stand my knees gave way and let me down. A strange man came to me and talked, and I was given something to drink, but it was late in the afternoon before my brain was clear enough to understand things.

As I sat up on the edge of the bed and wondered what had happened and where I was, a quiet spoken man who had the look of a doctor entered and sat down beside me and felt my pulse and said:

"You will do now if you keep quiet. Let me say for your encouragement that cases just as bad as yours have been cured in three months. The great point is to avoid excitement."

"In the first place, where am I?" I asked.

"In Dr. Colwell's private lunatic asylum," he replied.

"Who brought me here?"

"Your friends. The loss of your money in that Peruvian speculation unbalanced your mind. You will be well car d for here, and if you aid me as you should. your detention will not last over three months."

"I see how it is," I said as I looked him straight in the eye. "I am indebted to Smallwood for this. He drugged me and had me brought here that he might have t me to fix up his affairs and get away. I demand my liberty this instant!"

"Come, come," he replied in a coaxing way as he patted me on the shoulder. "I know no one named Smallwood. Your friends in Beacon Street brought you here, and Dr. Henry made out the papers. All was perfectly regular. Let us have no excitement. Dinner will be ready in half-an-hour. Meanwhile think it over."

In that half hour I thought it out. Smallwood had drugged and abducted me. It might or might not be a private lunatic asylum, but the man had surely been bribed to keep me for a time. If I made a fuss, it would be the worse for me. If I remained passive, I would be set at liberty as soon as the money-lender left the country.

I decided to make the best of things, and when the doctor returned I was very quiet. The two of us ate supper together in a small room and were waited upon by an old woman. He called me Mr. Perrine, and, according to his talk, I was a member of a mercantile firm in London. Next morning I was taken to walk in a narrow garden surrounded by high walls. I got sight of no other person, nor could I make out what sort of place I was in.

During the day I had the use of a sitting-room off my bedroom. It looked out on the back yard, and the windows were barred. I was given plenty of reading matter, and the doctor played chess with me, and taken altogether the time did not pass unpleasantly. In the three weeks I was in the house I saw only the doctor and the old woman.

At nine o'clock one evening I was told that my cure was complete and ten minutes later was being driven away from the building in a closed carriage. After an hour's ri le I was set down in a street in Whitechapel, and had I been backed up by all the police in London, I could not have found the house where I had been held captive.

Smallwood had been gone a week—gone no one knew where. While I do not believe there was any truth in the Liverpool story told me by Duff, the money-lender was more afraid of me than he need have been and had played me a pretty little trick to give himself time to settle up his affairs and move on.

I did not go to the police officially, but I did tell the story to a detective on the quiet. How they would have regarded it at Scotland Yard may be judged from what the officer said to me. At the end of the story he winked and grinned and observed:

"What born liars some men are!"

SUMMARY.

Major Wyvenhoe leaves England on the Campanella with a detachment of troops, raised by Major Barnish, to help the Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty. Major Barnish is accompanied on the vessel by his wife. At Cork a detachment of Irishmen is taken on board, together with General Molyneux, who is connected with the Venezuelan Army, his secretary and chaplain. When the vessel has been out a few days Major Barnish meets with a fatal accident, and on that same day a mutiny breaks out among the troops, but it is speedily quelled.

Shortly after this Venezuela is reached, and as Captain Cautley does not know the coast well a pilot has to be obtained, and it is found that Couroy, one of the chief mutineers, is able to act as such, and the course of the ship is intrusted to him.

On arrival at Pampatar Major Wyvenhoe and Captain Cautley are received by the Governor, General Arismendez, and his second in command, General Urdenetta.

After staying for some time idle at Pampatar, Cautley goes off in the Campanella reconnoitring, and on his voyage he captures a large Spanish vessel, on which he finds twenty thousand doubloons. This money he divides, giving Mrs. Barnish a thousand doubloons in part settlement of her claim against the Venezuelan Government for equipping the expedition. The remainder, after paying the wages of officers and men, he hands over to the Governor in trust for the Government, and gets a joint receipt for it from him and Urdenetta.

The next day, after a parade of the forces, Major Wyvenhoe, to his very great surprise, is arrested by order of the Governor, and proceeds to the jetty for the purpose of boarding the Libertad, a sloop of war which had just arrived from Angostura with dispatches, as a prisoner.

CHAPTER IX.

Major Wyvenhoe Arrested—The Reason of the Arrest.

Arrested by the governor's order, after all that had passed between us, and the money I had spent and the services I had rendered! Impossible, I said to myself for the twentieth time. Yet there I was in custody of a military guard of my countrymen commanded by a brother officer, a circumstance which added to my mortification and disgust.

"You are sure there is no mistake, Clincher?" I asked him again as we were being rowed to the Libertad.

"I never make mistakes, major, for a very good reason. I always obey orders and ask no questions, and the order given me under the colonel's hand was to arrest Major Wyvenhoe, take him on board the sloop and leave him there in charge of Sergeant Molloy and the guard. You will be free of the ship, but if you attempt to escape they are to shoot. Now you know as much as I do myself. Very sorry, but duty is duty."

It was clear that no solution of the mystery could be got out of poor Clincher. He had no more intelligence than an automaton nor an idea beyond doing as he was told.

The commander of the sloop, an Englishman of the name of Davis, gave me a courteous reception and a comfortable cabin.

"When are you bringing the other prisoners?" he asked Clincher who could, however, afford no information on the subject.

There were other prisoners, then!

"How many do you expect?" I inquired.

"Three, and you are the first," said Davis.

"Who are they?"

"That is more than I can tell you, but I have an idea that they are people of consequence."

"I am going ashore to make my report. Very sorry, and all that, but duty is duty, you know. I have told the sergeant to treat you with every respect. Very unpleasant, but hope you will come out all right. Good-day to you both," said Clincher, and then, after saluting, went over the side.

The plot thickened. There were three of us in it—or, rather, three victims. Who the others might be I was unable to guess, for though I ran over in my mind everybody I knew, I could spot none who seemed likely. Likelihood, however, was nothing to go by. After the governor's treachery anything was possible. Never in my life had I been so deceived in any man; or, except in Araminta, in any woman. But she at least had a motive which was not far to seek. Arismendez, so far as I could see, had none, unless it were pure malice.

Had somebody been poisoning his ear—Urdenetta, for instance? But no, Urdenetta was his enemy, the last man in the world to whom he was likely to listen, and though Arismendez was cruel and vindictive, I had always found him straightforward and above board. Moreover, from the very beginning of our acquaintance, he had treated me as a friend.

I gave it up and tried to think about something else, with so little success that I thought about nothing else.

Presently Ready came with my kit.

"What news, John?" I asked eagerly.

"None that amounts to much, sir. I went to the governor's house, thinking I might hear something. But it was surrounded by troops and they would not let me pass. All I heard was that there is some sort of difficulty between the governor and General Urdenetta."

On this it occurred to me that one of the other prisoners might be Urdenetta, though why I should be put in the same boat as a fellow whom I detested and with whom, as Arismendez well knew, I had nothing in common, was a riddle I was utterly unable to read. The only explanation I could think of was that he had had a sunstroke and gone mad.

I sat under an awning on the poop, looking shoreward and trying to calm my feelings by making many cigars. At length something happened.

A boat, filled with red coats put off from the jetty.

"The gentlemen in the stern sheets are the prisoners, I suppose! Do you know them?" quoth Davis, handing me his glass.

"No sir, one of the gentlemen in the stern sheets is Major Hart, of Colonel Rooke's regiment, the other is the governor of Margarita."

"Oh, the governor. Where are the prisoners then?"

"That I don't know, nor much care, but I am glad the governor is coming on board, as I presume he is. I shall insist on knowing what offence is imputed to me, and why I was arrested without a word of explanation and marched through the town under escort like a dangerous criminal or a common deserter."

The boat ran alongside and General Arismendez came on deck, where the guard received him with military honours.

"You here, Major Wyvenhoe!" exclaimed the governor as I stepped forward to greet him.

"I am, your Excellency, and much against my will, as you must well know," I answered indignantly.

"What do you mean, sir?" demanded Arismendez haughtily.

"What do I mean? That is a question I should rather ask you. I mean that I was arrested three hours ago by your order, and brought on board this ship under escort, and I shall feel obliged if you will be good enough to say what you have against me."

"You are labouring under some mistake. I have nothing against you, neither did I order you to be arrested."

"I was right then. I felt sure there must be some mistake. But how did it arise? Captain Clincher, who arrested me, said that he did so in pursuance of a written order under the governor's hand, and you are the governor."

"Unquestionably; but there is another who claims to be governor. It was perhaps he who gave the order."

"Urdenetta?"

"Yes, he is the man; and we are brothers in misfortune, major. I also am under arrest."

"Well, 'pon my word! This beats everything. But how could anybody—who would dare?"

"Urdenetta again. The Libertad brought dispatches; one was from Bolivar, superseding me as governor in Urdenetta's favour. But as I was appointed by Congress I refused to be deprived of my office by an inferior authority, and so told Urdenetta. We had hot words. I ought to have had him shot, but thinking it might scandalise you English, and knowing it would embroil me with the Supreme Chief I held back. For all that it was a mistake, and against my better judgment. Take an old soldier's advice, major, if you should ever hesitate about destroying an enemy, give yourself the benefit of the doubt. You will repent it if you don't. If I had killed the hound, or let Ramon kill him, I should have rid the Republic of an incompetent general and myself of a dangerous enemy. For the moment he has succeeded. He went to General English who, I am afraid, is a fool."

"I don't think he is very wise, and he knows nothing of war. He was never more than a commissary general in our service, and for several years has been in trade, I believe."

"Anyhow, he acted like a fool. Urdenetta showed him Bolivar's dispatch, said I had been inciting the native troops to mutiny and persuaded General English to arrest me and send me to Angostura for trial. My house was surrounded by troops, I was unable either to resist or to escape, and here I am."

"What a treacherous scoundrel. I am sorry you did not have him shot. He is the mutineer. But why should he arrest me?"

"Because by telling General English the truth and enlightening him as to Urdenetta's character you might have put a spoke in his wheel, and getting you and me out of the way gives him entire control of the doubloons."

"But you surely don't think he will make free with them?"

"Well, he will perhaps send a thousand or so to Bolivar, and another thousand for distribution among a few office holders at Angostura, and keep the balance on the pretext of providing for the troops, but the troops will get no more pay, and when they have consumed the salt beef and pork taken out of the prize, no more rations, except sugar-cane."

"So Urdenetta has a double motive for arresting us. But Captain Davis spoke of a third prisoner. Who is he?"

"The boat in which I came is alongside the Campanella," said Arismendez, drily.

"Cautley?"

"Yes, like you, he might spoil Urdenetta's game, who moreover owes him a grudge for retaining those doubloons."

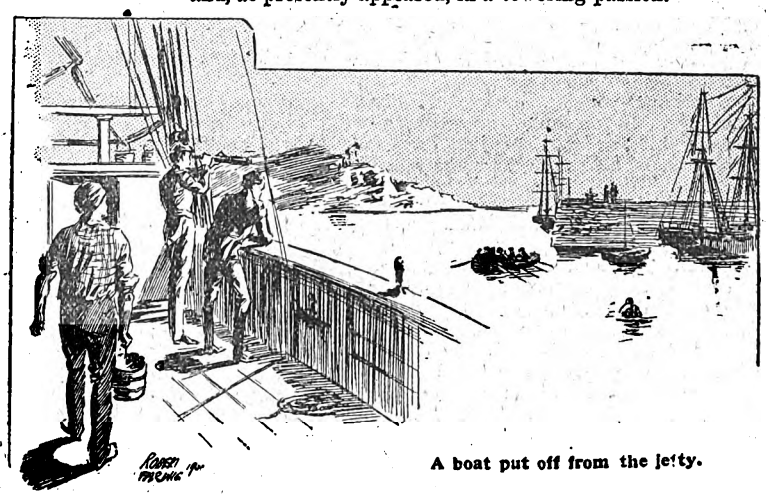
"I wish he had taken more."

"So do I. He might have demanded half, to which, rather than lose the whole, Urdenetta would have agreed, and I should not have objected."

"Cautley was too honest for that. He only demanded what he thought strictly just."

"Honesty does not pay in a South American republic, my friend, and there would have been no dishonesty in El Capitan taking a payment on account of his prize money, of which he will never receive a peso, and insisting on Mrs. Barnish being paid all that is rightly her due. Now she may whistle for it."

While the general was talking I had been keeping my eye on the boat which presently ran under the sloop's counter, and the skipper came on board looking very angry, and, as presently appeared, in a towering passion.



A boat put off from the jetty.

"So you are here!" he exclaimed, on seeing Arismendez. "The very man I most want to see. I have been arrested on my own quarter-deck by these soldiers and, as I am told, by your orders. This is my reward for saving the corvette and capturing a treasure-ship laden with grub. By heaven, sir, I wish that your dirty republic were at the bottom of the sea, and if you were not old enough to be my father I would demand instant satisfaction for the insult you have put on me. Arrested on my own quarter-deck by redcoats. And for what? Can you tell me, Wyvenhoe?"

This tirade being delivered in very broken Spanish, interlarded with English, was fortunately not fully understood by the general, who merely smiled one of his strange smiles. I laughed outright.

"You seem to find it amusing. Well, I don't," added Cautley, "and if you and I were not good friends, Wyvenhoe, I should have something to say which you might not like to hear. If you had been arrested on your own quarter-deck—in your own house, I mean—and bundled into a boat by a lot of red-coated ragamuffins, and never a reason given, do you think I would laugh at you? No, by heaven, and if you will excuse me for saying so, it is most ungentlemanly behaviour to make merry over a friend's misfortunes."

Tore the paper in pieces and threw it overboard.

On this I laughed again, and Arismendez, grasping the situation, though he had not understood a word, joined in, to Cautley's utter bewilderment and disgust.

"What does it all mean? Am I the victim of a practical joke?" he demanded fiercely. "If so, let me tell you——"

"We are all victims, captain, but of a villain, not of a practical joker. I, too, have been arrested in my own house if not on my own quarter-deck, and bundled into a boat by redcoats, so has the governor."

"And that's where the fun comes in, I suppose. But tell me now, was the governor arrested by his own order?"

"No; by order of Urdenetta, who has usurped his place, and having got General English on his side can do as he likes."

"Just like them both; the one is a rogue, the other a fool. How was it managed?"

"So we are going to Angostura!" quoth the skipper when I had explained matters. "What will happen to us when we get there? Are we going to be shot or merely strung up?"

"Neither," answered the General smiling. "I am no great admirer of Bolivar, but he is no fool, and very much alive to his own interests, and though he favours Urdenetta he knows that dealing harshly with me would be to his own detriment and the detriment of the cause. He would lose Margarita, for the islanders amongst whom I have lived all my life, and who regard me as their chief, would secede from the Republic and probably take up arms against us. No, señores, the Supreme Chief knows better than to shoot me or even keep me under arrest. While, as for you, there is nothing against you except some cock-and-bull story that Urdenetta may have invented as a pretext for getting you out of the way."

"But how about those doubloons I gave Mrs. Barnish, and took for the crew and myself?" asked Cautley. "It was rather a strong measure, you know. Might not I be court-martialled for it?"

"Possibly. Though I think you were quite justified. But the receipt we gave you is a complete defence. I hope you did not leave it in your cabin; it is sure to be searched."

"No, it is here in my pocket."

"Good! So long as that can be produced in evidence, Urdenetta, though he may gasconade, cannot hurt you, the more especially as Bolivar is just now very friendly disposed towards the English, whose help he needs. But we must find a safer place for the document than your pocket. Urdenetta is quite capable of having your person searched as well as your room."

"I will give it you then, or to the major."

"That won't do, he may have us searched also, and if he gets possession of the paper and destroys it, as he certainly would, he could give you trouble; for instance, accuse you and the major of having abstracted twice as many doubloons as were actually taken, which would be a sufficient reason for putting you under arrest and enable him to account for less money than he actually received."

"So the receipt must be forthcoming when it is required, and to that end hidden where Urdenetta's emissaries won't find it. The captain of this ship being an Englishman ought to be trustworthy."

"Ought to be, certainly, but until we know him better it would scarcely be wise to trust him with the paper, especially as there is a better way," quoth I.

"What is that?"

"Give it to my servant. I don't think they will search him, and and if they do I'll lay my life they won't find what they want."

"The very thing, where is he?"

"Below. I'll call him."

When John came on deck we walked aft and leant over the rail.

"Take this paper" (slipping it into his hand) "and put it where it cannot be found, even though you are searched," said the skipper.

"All right, sir, I'll put it where it won't be found, even if I am skinned," answered Ready.

"Now we have nothing to fear, and if Urdenetta sends anybody to search you, Señor Capitan, let me advise you to submit with a good grace."

"I always cave in when I cannot help myself, Señor General, and so graciously that you would think I enjoyed it."

The governor's apprehensions were not long in being realised. Within an hour the sloop was boarded by three Custom House officers and Urdenetta's private secretary.

He gave us all courteous greeting to which we courteously responded, and Arismendez inquired what we could do to oblige him.

"I thank you, Señor General, but my duty is with this gentleman," replied the secretary addressing the skipper, "I am deputed by the governor to request you to hand me the paper which three days ago you obtained from his Excellency and the Señor General. I hope you will not, by refusing, put me to the painful necessity of searching you and taking it by force."

"Really my dear sir, you ask so nicely that I could not refuse you anything. But just one moment, please," said Cautley, and with that he took a paper from his pocket, ran to the taffrail tore the paper in pieces and threw them overboard, and as the wind carried the fragments away there was no possibility of recovering them.

It was done so quickly that the last fragment had floated into the sea before the astonished secretary found his tongue, and then the mask of politeness was dropped; he swore like a trooper, and abused "El Capitan" in the choicest Spanish at his command—and it was very choice.

Cautley merely smiled,

"Was it the paper his Excellency wants?" asked the secretary when he had done swearing.

"What paper?"

"The paper you have just torn up and thrown overboard."

"How should I know?"

"Don't trifle with me, sir, or I'll have you locked up in the carcel and loaded with chains. You know quite well."

"Well, if it is the paper his Excellency wants he ought to be quite satisfied, for he wants it only to destroy it, and it is destroyed."

"But is it, I ask you again?"

"You must find that out for yourself, Mr. Secretary."

"Caramba! I believe you are fooling me. I believe the paper I want is on your person all the time. Why should you tear it up rather than give it up? You shall be searched."

"Con mucho gusto."

"Jose, Perez, search the gentleman, and do it thoroughly."

Which they did, stripping the skipper to his shirt, and searching his clothes inside and out, of course without result. Whereupon the secretary tried the oiled feather again.

"Come now, Señor Capitan," he said, coaxingly, "do me the favour to say whether the paper was the paper."

"Undoubtedly, Señor Secretario."

"Ah, I thought so. You mean of course the paper of which his Excellency demands the surrender."

"Not at all. I merely mean that the paper was the paper."

The secretary swore again, and seeing that he could make nothing of Cautley, turned to me and Arismendez, asking if either of us had the paper, and if not, whether we knew where it was. To both of which questions we responded with an emphatic "no," and as a consequence were overhauled, albeit less thoroughly than Cautley had been.

Then the Secretary, after another bout of swearing and threatening us with Urdenetta's vengeance, went away as empty as he had come.

I felt rather concerned, fearing further unpleasantness, but the general laughed, saying we should be troubled no more.

"The secretary won't dare to tell Urdenetta that he has been befooled and knows not whether the paper El Capitan threw overboard was the receipt. He will make up a story—perhaps say that having read it before El Capitan tore it up, he can swear that it was the receipt, and

"You three gentlemen will be good enough to understand that you are prisoners, not passengers," Diaz said, insolently.

Urdenetta, believing that it has perished, will be satisfied."

This was not my view. The secretary would no doubt make the best of it and try to extenuate his failure by telling as many lies as might occur to him. But Urdenetta was both jealous and suspicious and quite sharp enough to see he had been foiled and that the document was still in being. Moreover, the skipper's prank might set Urdenetta still more against us and whet his appetite for revenge. Nevertheless, Arismendez was right in one respect; we saw no more of the secretary and heard no more of the paper.

Captain Davis had been an interested spectator of the secretary's proceedings, and when the search party was gone, I told him frankly all that had happened, and he took our part heartily, saying that Urdenetta was a brute, and that we had been badly used.

"You are supposed to be prisoners," he said. "But I shall treat you as friends, and do my best to make your voyage pleasant. Only if you try to escape, I am afraid it will be my duty to prevent you. My orders are imperative."

"No fear of that," I answered. "Cautley and I have had more than enough of Margarita, and it is only by going to Angostura that the general can get even with Urdenetta."

"Well, I hope we shall get there, though it is about even betting that we do not. There are a good many of the enemy's cruisers knocking about, mostly off the Bocas and in the Gulf of Sadness. I was chased three times on the voyage here—once by a brigantine and a sloop, and had a very narrow squeak of it. However, I have made up my mind to blow the sloop up rather than strike my flag. It will be an easier way out of the world than being hacked to pieces by those Spanish devils."

"But you would make a fight for it?" put in Cautley.

"So long as the ship holds together, and I have some good fighting material, the majority of my crew are Zambos, and I have got them into pretty good order too, considering what unruly ruffians they are. They like being commanded by Englishmen, probably because, though we insist on obedience, we treat them like human beings; and they are fiends in action."

"You are right. We have seen them at it. What is your armament?"

"Twelve eighteen-pound carronades, two long sixes; and we have an abundance of small arms and ammunition. As I carry dispatches my orders are to avoid fighting. All the same, I would not run away from a single Spanish ship much larger than mine. So we may see some sport before we get to Angostura."

But we were not destined to see sport under this brave captain's command, for on the following morning General Urdenetta's aide-de-camp came on board with a new captain and an order for Davis to take command of the Campanella. Which did not please any of us since though it was in some sense a promotion for him, the brig being the bigger ship, he was as sorry to leave the Libertad as we were to lose him. The Zambos showed more feeling than I had given them credit for possessing. They insisted on shaking hands with him, and as he went over the side the entire ship's company gave their late captain a hearty cheer.

Captain Diaz, the new captain, was a short, broad-shouldered man, with a swarthy skin, heavy jaws, a big hooked nose, and deep set black eyes rather out of focus.

After reading his commission, signed, of course, by Urdenetta, and making a speech to the crew, he made one to us.

"You three gentlemen will be good enough to understand that you are prisoners, not passengers," he said insolently. "So long as you conduct yourselves to my satisfaction you may come on deck when it pleases you, but if you attempt to interfere with the working of the ship, converse with the officers, or speak to any of the crew, I will have you put in irons."

None of us answered, but Arismendez smiled in a fashion which evidently did not please the new captain, who responded with a scowl and turned on his heel.

"He will put us in irons, will he? Por Dios, if he makes any more insulting speeches to me I shall kill him," quoth the general in a fierce sotto voce.

"And yet you were advising me only a little while ago to submit with a good grace," said Cautley smiling.

"Ah, well, precept is always easier than practice, and to be threatened with irons by a rascally renegade like Diaz is almost more than I can bear."

"Renegade! He is a Spaniard then?"

"Yes, for which he is none the worse, there are many Spaniards on our side. But Diaz is a deserter from the royal navy, and deserters are generally either dastards or traitors, sometimes both. Bolivar gave him a post but he did not exactly distinguish himself, and I doubt whether he is much of a sailor. Even with a commander like El Capitan or Señor Davis, it would be difficult to run the gauntlet of the enemy's cruisers, but now, Heaven help us! I anticipate the worst, señores."

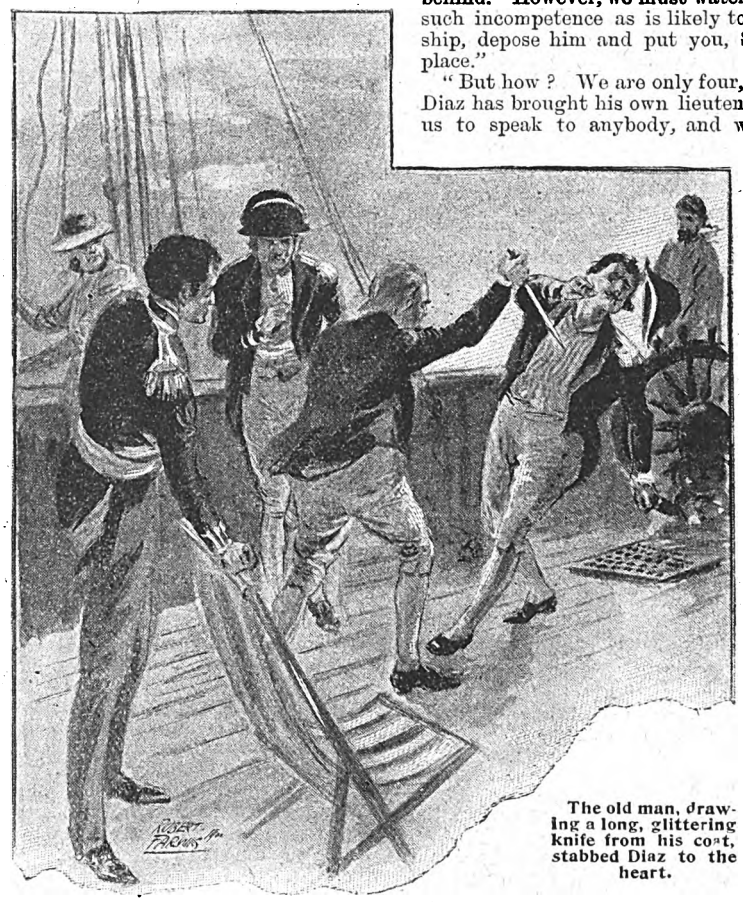
"Which is having our throats cut by the Dons, as Urdenetta probably foresaw when he gave Diaz his commission."

"I have not a doubt of it, and there may be worse behind. However, we must watch Diaz, and if he shows such incompetence as is likely to lead to the loss of the ship, depose him and put you, Señor Capitan, in his place."

"But how? We are only four, including John Ready. Diaz has brought his own lieutenants, he has forbidden us to speak to anybody, and will, you may be sure, watch us as closely as we can watch him."

"An opportunity may occur when the need arises; if not, we must make one. Your servant will be less under observation than we shall, Señor Wyvenhoe; let him, if possible, obtain three or four pistols and some ammunition. They can easily be hidden, and may be useful."

"I have not the least doubt as to his getting them, Señor General," I said. "There are two in my kit, so with two more we shall have one apiece, though twice the number would be better."



The old man, drawing a long, glittering knife from his coat, stabbed Diaz to the heart.

At dawn on the following day, the sloop weighed and stood out to sea, but the wind being both light and contrary there was a good deal of tacking, and it was three days before we were in a position to bear up for the Bocas, literally "mouths," a group of rocky islets between the north-east end of Venezuela and south-west end of Trinidad, which marks off the Caribbean Sea from the Gulf of Paria, or, as the Spaniards called it, the Gulf of Sadness.

Cautley averred that Diaz handled the sloop badly, so badly as to suggest a suspicion that he was getting as little speed out of her as he might, instead of all he could, and another suspicious sign, he kept the Independent flag flying at the mast-head. "It looks as if he wanted to proclaim our character to every vessel we may meet, Spanish cruisers included," I remarked to Arismendez, "though as he will have to die with the rest of us if we are taken I don't see what he can expect to gain by it."

"If he can show the royalists that he is playing into their hands he will get a pleasanter recompense than death. He may have an understanding with them already, once a traitor, always a traitor; and Diaz is leagued with a worse traitor than himself. The wonder to me is that we have not fallen in with one of the enemy's cruisers before this."

"Maybe we are going to do now, there's a sail on the weather bow," said Cautley. "By Jove, there are two" (looking through his glass). Then, after a few minutes, he added, "A brigantine and a corvette on the larboard tack, and as we are on the starboard tack they will be within shooting distance in less than an hour."

"They may be Spanish cruisers?"

"Undoubtedly, and, what is more, I think they are. Davis spoke of having been chased by a brigantine and a corvette, each of them bigger than the Libertad."

Diaz and his first-lieutenant had also sighted the two ships. They were surveying them through their glasses, yet nothing was done, no change made in the Libertad's course; no additional sails were set, and the Venezuelan ensign still flew at the peak. This was all the more ominous, as the Spaniards had altered their course, with the evident intention of getting between us and the Bocas.

"What would you do if you were in command, Señor Capitan?" asked Arismendez.

"Show the Dons a clean pair of heels. Wet the sails, set the studding sails, put the brig before the wind, her best point of sailing. A stern chase is a long chase, and as night is nigh I am pretty sure I could give them the slip. I should also clear for action and mount a carronade on the poop."

"And if they overhauled us after all?"

"Do as Davis said he would do; fight to the last and blow the ship up rather than strike my flag."

The general was sitting in a deck chair, we were near him, leaning against the bulwark. Diaz, standing by the wheel, now and then exchanging a word with one of his officers. Most of the crew were in the waist and on the forecastle, the heat below being unbearable.

"Oblige me by fetching your pistols, and sending Ready here, also armed, but return separately," said Arismendez, abruptly.

Guessing that he had a plan, though we had not the least idea what it could be, we obeyed without questioning, and presently returned with the pistols, of course, concealed.

Arismendez rose from his chair, and putting his right hand inside his undress uniform coat, and bidding us follow him, but not too near, went up to the captain.

"Traitor, renegade, spy!" hissed the old man between his set teeth, and drawing a long glittering knife from his coat stabbed Diaz to the heart.

THERE is a young man in Leeds so careful that, in calling on his girl, he always knocks, for fear if he came with a ring she might consider it a proposal.

LAVINIA: "Yes, James and I are to become partners for life."

Mabel: "And you will be the senior partner! How sweet!"

"A SMALL physique at times is a great disadvantage to a man," he said. "Recently I was grossly insulted by a big duffer, and I could only pocket the insult."

"In what way did he insult you?"

"He offered me a bribe."

MISS SWANSDOWN (at the ball): "What did you do with my shawl, Mr. Peterkin? I gave it to you to keep half an hour ago."

Peterkin (producing a slip of paper): "Good gracious, what have I done! In a fit of absent-mindedness I took it out and pawned it."

JUDGE: "Your age?"

Lady: "Thirty years."

Judge (incredulously): "You will have some difficulty in proving that."

Lady (excitedly): "You'll find it hard to prove to the contrary, as the church register which contained the entry of my birth was burned in the year 1845."

A FRENCH journal says that a man who had a passion for shooting called one morning to his servant:

"There's a rabbit in the garden, Jacques! Hand me a gun."

"But, sir, it is five o'clock in the morning; everybody is asleep."

"No matter. I'll fire on tiptoe."

BROADWOOD: "Some of the new houses up our way are so narrow that a piano cannot be put in."

Bans (excitedly): "You don't know the rent of the houses next door to them, do you?"

FOND MOTHER: "Children, you mustn't fight."

Willie: "We're playing jeweller, mamma, and Tommy's a clock out of order and keeps on strikin' while I'm trying to twist his face off."

HIGHWAYMAN: "Throw up your hands and give us your money."

Cumso: "How can I do that, you idiot? Do you imagine that I am a contortionist, and can get my nose into my pocket?"

A FARCE was produced in Bannister's time, under the title of Fire and Water

"I predict its fate," said he.

"What fate?" said the anxious author at his side.

"What fate!" said Bannister; "why, what can fire and water produce but a hiss?"

"WHAT is an anecdote, Johnny?" asked the teacher

"A short, funny tale," answered the little fellow.

"That's right," said the teacher.

"Now, Johnny, write a sentence on the blackboard containing the word."

Johnny hesitated a moment, and then wrote:

"A rabbit has four legs and one anecdote."

"MY dear," said a sentimental maiden to her lover, "of what do these autumnal tints, this glowing baldric of the skies, this blazing garniture of the dying year, remind you?"

"Pancakes," he promptly replied.

And than she realised for the first time that their two hearts did not beat as one.

Wanted to Eat the Cat.

He came down to breakfast and nothing was ready. So he rang the bell.

"Mrs. Perkins," he said when the boarding-house keeper appeared, "what is the meaning of this? Why is breakfast not ready?"

"Well, sir," replied Mrs. Perkins, "I got a nice bit of fish for you, but I'm sorry to say, sir, the cat——"

"Confound the cat! then let me have the cold chicken."

"I regret to say, sir, the cat——"

"Well, then, some eggs."

"There are no eggs, sir. The cat——"

"Hang it all, then, cook the cat and we'll have it all at once!"

Old and Tough.

"Pretty healthy place this, isn't it, Mrs. Doem?"

"Oh, yes, sir."

"The sea-breezes are considered wholesome, I suppose?"

"They are indeed, sir."

"The place to live in to a ripe old age, eh?"

"You're right, sir."

"Yes, I gathered as much by this spring chicken. I should be glad if you'd take its ancient carcase to the steam saw-mill and ask them kindly to dissect it for me."

E. C.

The Reason Why.

Being a family that is generally going away for a fortnight summer holidays, we went this year to a pleasant little seaside town on the coast of Kent, and we obtained good lodgings there during our first week's stay. We had beautiful weather, but towards the beginning of the second week it turned out very wet and we were compelled to stay indoors. Seeking for anything to pass the time we determined to get a little music and singing.

A piano being in our room we commenced our little concert. The first tune we struck up was that popular chorus, "Home Sweet Home." You know how the words go: "There's no place like home, etc."

We kept singing this chorus over and over again until we got tired of it. Well, when we saw our landlord next he was in a terrible rage.

The reason for this became quite evident to us all after a time.

Caught.

A lancashire man who was staying at a boarding-house in Blackpool, suspected his landlady's "cat" had been tampering with his whisky.

As a test he called his landlady and said to her: "Don't let your cat touch this bottle labelled whisky; it contains a deadly poison, mixed with whisky, which I keep for cleaning purposes."

On hearing this, his landlady exclaimed: "Oh, send for the doctor, I'm dying."

Bowser at Brighton.

Mr. Bowser (across the seaside boarding-house table): "Will you pass the tin-opener, Mrs. Skinnem."

Mrs. Skinnem (severely): "Do I understand you rightly, Mr. Bowser, the tin-opener?"

Bowser (suavely): "You do, madam; I wish to open this fruit pie."

How the Tea Went.

Mr. W., a well-known solicitor, in his bachelor days went to lodge with a person whom we will call Mrs. Brown. As an inducement to take the rooms, he was told that he could have a lock-up cupboard to keep his food in, where it would be safe from the depredations of the cat.

However, Mr. W. soon discovered that his favourite pekoe disappeared with alarming rapidity. Having no particular reason for suspecting the domestic tabby, he came to the conclusion that Mrs. Brown must, like himself, possess a liking for that fragrant bohea.

To make assurance doubly sure, he purchased two pounds of tea next time instead of one, and putting one pound as usual in the tea-caddy in the cupboard (which he determined not to touch at all himself), gave out his daily supply from the other pound, which he kept concealed from Mrs. Brown. But, alas! the pound in the caddy kept getting small and beautifully less, until it was all gone!

Then came Mr. W.'s innings. Ringing for Mrs. Brown, he handed her his usual supply of tea in a cup, and producing the empty caddy from the cupboard, he jocularly remarked:

"I see you've finished your pound of tea before I have mine, Mrs. Brown."

The poor woman's face, when it dawned upon her that the vanishing tea trick had been discovered, was a study.

Votaries of Mrs. Grundy.

Two old maids were once inspecting some seaside lodgings, which stood back a considerable distance from the sea. Being difficult to please, they raised all sorts of objections to the rooms. At last one of them said they couldn't possibly live in such a house on account of the bathers. The landlady pleaded the distance from the offensive sight, which was half a mile or more.

With one accord, both old maids raised their hands in pious indignation, with the remark:

"True, true, the distance is great, but we could see them distinctly with a telescope!"

W. B. H.

Rather High.

I HAD only been at my seaside apartments one day when I received a telegram to return home immediately. I at once informed my landlady, and asked that my bill should be made out. A few moments later it was put before me, and the following is a copy:

To Mr. Holdsworth, from Bradford,
July 17

Bedroom...	3s.
Attendance	1s.
1 Dinner	2s.
Drinks, etc.	2s.
	25s.

"Good gracious, landlady!" I exclaimed. "whatever is this. Twenty-five shillings for one day?"

"Oh! I beg your pardon," she replied, smiling, oh, so innocently; "I have added in the date by mistake."

E. H.

Burnt Out.

LAST summer we went to a northern seaside resort. Necessity compelled us to take moderate apartments. The landlady was genial, and soon prepared tea. A young girl (a niece) came to clear away.

As she passed my chair she dropped a plate of cake, and, as I stooped to help her pick it up, she put a piece of paper in my hand.

Motioning me to keep silent, she withdrew from the room.

The paper read:

"Do not stay in this house to-night; you will be sorry if you do. There are many other places."

We came to the conclusion that the girl had quarrelled with her aunt, and had done this for spite. Being comfortable, we did not feel inclined to move.

About eleven o'clock she brought us our candles, and shaking her head, looked at me meaningly. I felt somewhat nervous, and sat at the window for some time. At last I went to sleep.

I woke up fighting for breath. The room was full of smoke. I tried to wake my wife, but could not. I got to the door and opened it.

The smoke poured in, and the stairs were enveloped in flames.

I was dragged through a window. I struggled to get to my wife, but 'twas impossible.

Poor Minnie was lost. The people of the house were safe.

The girl afterwards confessed that they set the house on fire to obtain the heavy insurance.

A. G. C.

Then They Laughed.

IT was my first day at dinner at my seaside apartments, and I was placed opposite a roast goose. The lady of the house was sitting by my side. Seeing the goose, I remarked:

"Shall I sit so close to the goose?"

But, thinking my words a trifle equivocal, I turned to the lady and said, in a most inoffensive tone:

"Excuse me, madam, I meant the roast one."

Somehow, my landlady and I didn't get on very well together after that.

The Literary Landlady.

A REPORTER was in the habit of using his cuffs on which to make professional notes. His landlady, who undertook, in addition to boarding him, to do his washing, was much puzzled with the hieroglyphics she found inscribed on her lodger's linen, and she after a while managed to make out their meaning. One day she astonished the newspaper man by saying:

"Your last washing was quite interesting, sir, only you don't give me enough sporting news."

Evidently that landlady liked to have "a little bit on," as they say in racing circles.

A Chilly Sort of Bed.

SOME years ago the National Eisteddfod was held at a popular Welsh watering-place. The festival attracted large crowds, and the town was terribly overcrowded. The only sleeping accommodation I and three friends could obtain was a bath-room. When retiring I found that my bed was a mattress placed over the bath. At least it had been so arranged by the landlady, but my villainous "friends" had removed the bath cover and mattress, and filling the bath with water, had cunningly spread the sheets over the watery trap.

When I leaped on them I fell into eighty gallons of cold water. I splashed, gasped, and struggled, the sheet became wound round my arms and legs, and I was in real danger of drowning, when my companions rescued me.

The Scotch Calendar.

AN anecdote is told of a certain Highland hotel-keeper.

He was one day bickering with an Englishman in the lobby of the inn regarding the bill.

The stranger said it was a gross imposition, he could live cheaper in the best hotel in London, to which the landlord with nonchalance replied:

"Oh, nae doot, sir, nae doot; but do ye no ken the reason?"

"No, not a bit of it," said the stranger, hastily.

"Weel, then," replied the host, "as ye seem to be a sensible callant, I'll tell ye: there's 365 days in the Lunnon hotel-keeper's calendar, but we have only three months in ours!

"Do ye understand me noo, frien'? We maun mak' hay in the Hielans when the sun shines, for it's unco seldom she dis't!"

Little Mrs. Hope.

THERE were twenty of us making up the party at a country house for the shooting season, and it so happened that while all were of course well-known to host and hostess seven or eight were strangers to each other until introduced at the house.

I do not think there were over three or four who even knew little Mrs. Hope by name, or could tell anything of her past. Nor did a great deal leak out about her father after she had been generally introduced and had come to be a favourite with both men and women.

She was petite and fair. She had a baby-face and big blue eyes, and your first impression of her was that she was a child and a very innocent child at that.

In the billiard room it was whispered that she was a distant relative of Colonel Saunders, our host, and hat she had married a scamp and had been so ill-used that a separation had been sought for.

It was generally agreed that it must have all been the husband's fault and that the man who would ill-treat such a light-hearted, baby-faced wife deserved something beyond contempt.

She was by long odds the best looking woman among the eight or ten, but as she was not given to flirtation and as she looked pretty without artificial means she was forgiven for her handsome face and became a general favourite.

The man who leaves business for a week or two for a holiday seldom takes along jewellery or money of any account, but nine women out of ten must carry their diamonds wherever they go.

There was a good display of gems at Rose Hill with all except little Mrs. Hope. She had two or three rings and a bracelet or two and made a poor show compared with the rest.

This was corroborative evidence that she was none too well off, financially, but she did not display the slightest feeling of envy, and no hints were thrown out to hurt her feelings.

A country house, full of wealthy guests, is a paradise for a thief, and the colonel warned the ladies from the beginning to be careful of their jewellery. All of them agreed to act upon the advice and then, womanlike, left every ornament lying about.

On the fourth day of the party a lady named White missed three valuable rings which had been left lying on a table in her room. They had been taken in broad daylight while the ladies were on the lawn and while the maid was temporarily absent from the room.

It was impossible that any outsider could have got into the house, and it seemed impossible to trace the thief to any particular servant.

Counting maids, valets and the household, there were about twenty people in the house apart from the guests. Mrs. White's loss was kept a secret for several days from all but the host and hostess, but the colonel's quiet detective work brought no reward.

The second loss was more serious. A Mrs. Willmere left her jewellery lying about after dinner and at bedtime discovered that she had been robbed of every single article.

The value was at least £3,000, and as she and her husband were both excitable people the loss could not be kept quiet.

Between the finish of dinner and bedtime we were scattered about the house and lawn, with the servants moving to and fro, and no stranger could have entered the house without being seen.

The bedroom window was open but no ladder had been used.

It seemed to be plain enough that some servant had secured the jewellery, and one by one the entire lot were summoned before the colonel's court of inquiry and interrogated.

There wasn't one without a good character, nor could suspicion justly attach to any single one. It was long after midnight before we got through and next morning the sergeant from the police station was summoned. He couldn't suspect one of the guests, and he could find no grounds for suspecting one of the servants, and he got out of it by looking wise and saying that Mrs. Willmere had probably mislaid her ornaments. Unfortunately for her she was rather absent-minded, and we presently came to accept the theory, though she searched her rooms over and over again without discovery.

The losses did not break up the party as might have been the case. The colonel and Mrs. Willmere came to a mutual understanding. I think the detective advised them to call it a "mislay," and thereby put the thief off his guard.

Colonel Saunders insisted that every jewel of value should be locked up in the family safe, and when this had been done every guest became a Sherlock Holmes.

There were twenty guests and twenty theories. Everything from an owl to the stable-boy was under suspicion.

The detective's theory, as he gave it to the colonel privately, was that a smart thief disguised as a lady's maid or upper servant had entered the house and committed both robberies. Of all the theories this was the most absurd, but of course the man felt bound to make a move of some sort.

The jewellery had been locked up for four days, and things had quieted down, when the colonel started to produce it in honour of a government official who was to arrive that evening.

I say he started to, because he no sooner attempted to unlock the safe than he discovered that the bolts had been shot. As he pulled the door open he uttered a groan, and the sight of his haggard face was evident enough that something was wrong. The safe had been opened by means of a key, but had not been locked again. Every article of jewellery was gone, and the value of the lot was not a penny under £10,000.

In seeking to render his guests safe the colonel had helped to despoil them. It was impossible to say at what date the robbery had happened, and the only thing to do was to telegraph up to London for a detective.

While waiting his arrival no servant was allowed off the grounds, and of course no guest could well leave while under fire. It was a painful position for every one, and the detective rather added to it when he got to work. So soon as he was in possession of all the facts he said to the colonel:

"These robberies were committed by one of yonr guests. They must all assemble in the drawing-room and submit to have their rooms searched."

Rather than subject them to such an indignity the colonel offered to pay the full loss out of his own pocket, but this no one would hear of. All were willing for the search to go on, and host, hostess and detective made it.

Nothing was found. The detective clung to his theory, however, and took another look at the rooms and was given the names of their occupants. There were three rooms which communicated, and those three were occupied by the colonel, his wife and little Mrs. Hope.

The door between the rooms of the colonel and Mrs. Hope was bolted on her side and had been for years.

This door caught the eye of the detective, and after an examination of the bolt, he said:

"This bolt has been worked within three or four days, as any locksmith will tell you, and this door has also been opened."

"Do you know what you are saying?" sternly demanded the colonel.

"I do, sir. You carry the key of the safe in your pocket. To get that key someone has entered your room by this door at night."

"But Mrs. Hope's effects have been searched along with the rest."

"Her effects—yes. She has the jewellery on her person. Let your wife search her."

The colonel was furious and his wife indignant. They would answer for little Mrs. Hope as for themselves.

"I can do no more," answered the detective. "One of your guests is the robber, and it is the guest occupying this room. If you will call her up here, I believe I can break her down in ten minutes."

After long hesitation little Mrs. Hope was called up.

She came smilingly, and no pair of eyes ever revealed greater innocence. A layman would have sooner suspected a toddling babe.

"Now then," began the detective, "you are the robber. You took Mrs. White's jewellery, and you robbed the colonel's safe. You got the key from his trousers by opening this door. You have the jewellery on your person."

For the space of thirty seconds the baby-faced woman regarded him with wonder, indignation, fear, and anguish.

Then she gasped for breath and sank down on the ground.

"Search her," said the detective as he left the room.

Ten minutes later he was called in. The little woman lay weeping on the sofa, and the missing jewellery was spread out on the table.

"Heaven help us!" said the colonel as he looked from the officer to the recovered treasure and back.

"We must help ourselves," replied the man as he looked at the woman with pity in his eyes. "Mrs. Saunders, your maid must go. You must settle the price with her. She must get away as soon as possible, and the plunder must be found in her room later on. She will get safe away."

Three hours later the jewellery was "found" in the maid's room, and everybody else was cleared of suspicion and made happy. The maid had been gone two hours, and the detective doubted whether she could be found in big London, though of course he would use every effort. Little Mrs. Hope was ill for a day or two under the nervous excitement and so had a good excuse for leaving Rose Hill.

So far as I know not one of the guests suspected her. Indeed as the maid had left a written confession before she bolted how could anyone else be suspected? This being the case, you may wonder how I got hold of the inside facts in the case. Well, that's a matter of no concern so long as I have given you the full particulars. Perhaps the colonel trusted me farther than he did the others.

As for little Mrs. Hope, it was want of money, probably, that induced her to turn robber, but I have always tried to make myself believe that she couldn't have realised what she was doing.

VANITY AND - - - - VERSAILLES.

ROSE LEPEL was a pretty grisette who lived in the Rue Montmartre in Paris and worked all the week at a confectioner's manufactory. She sugared the mirabelles and the violets sent up by thousands from the South of France and arranged them in pretty little boxes with stamped paper and tissue ornaments, with the taste that seems to grow in Paris.

Sunday was her great fête day; then all thoughts of work were put aside and in her pretty grey muslin dress and neat shoes, Rose felt herself the gayest of the gay and the neatest among the many neat and pretty grisettes of Paris.

She had a friend, who was always at her disposal on these holidays, one Henri Marul, a brave soldier in the 4th. Zouaves de la Ligne. Henri had never yet had a chance of proving his bravery, and so it was an unknown quantity, but in France all soldiers are "brave soldiers" as soon as they are adorned by the loose red trousers of the Zouaves, and they march about looking intensely fierce, carrying pain and pleasure and admiration to the hearts of the Parisian grisettes.

This fine morning in June Henri had arranged to call for Rose early in order that they might spend the whole day at Versailles, in the gardens and park. When he called for her in the Rue Montmartre Rose was ready and waiting, with a charming little basket on her arm, containing their déjeuner to be eaten at twelve o'clock.

"But what have you there, my angel?" cried Henri, trying to examine the contents of the basket.

"Wait! and you will see at Versailles," said Rose, "it is something of the most ravishing, I assure you. How the sun shines and how the sky is blue. Henri, I long to be in the gardens, by the little lake at Versailles."

"Come, then," said Henri, and they walked fast through the busy, bright streets that had an air of festivity, even so early, to the Place de la Concorde, where on the further side by the big bridge, the steamers stopped. Here they took tickets for Sèvres, the nearest point on the Seine to Versailles.

"It is fortunate," said Rose, "that we have started early. On such a fine day all the world will go to Versailles, especially when the great fountains play as they will this afternoon."

They started in a few minutes and the river steamer went puffing up the river between the long lines of exhibition buildings on either side. Very frail and insecure these looked, many as yet unfinished, but giving an appearance of brightness and gay colouring, grouped near the towering height of the Eiffel Tower and stretching along in lines of whiteness and gilding and quaint, fantastic shapes. The steamer passed through all this and passed Passy and St. Cloud, out to the fields and gardens beyond the city limits.

At last they stopped at the Bridge of Sèvres and got off the steamer at the pretty country landing place. Many other passengers did so too, among them a lady smartly-dressed and with wonderful curly golden hair. This lady had already absorbed much of Henri's attention on the boat; this was the worst of this gay Zouave, though faithful in his heart to Rose, whom he intended to marry as soon as his term of military service was ended, yet he was continually admiring other people and causing Rose's neat little bodice to flutter anxiously with jealousy.

"Must not everyone admire also the manly graces of her brave Zouave? Ah, in this life no pleasure is without its thorn!"

The lady, however, was at present engaged with friends of her own; with much talking and laughing they all went up the steep incline from the landing place to the road above, where the steam tramway from Paris passed on its way to Versailles. Henri and Rose climbed up on the outside of the tramway, it was cheaper and pleasanter than the inside; the lady with golden hair went inside, so for the time, temptation was removed from the neighbourhood of our gay Zouave.

The tramway stopped in the Place d'Armes at Versailles, by the great stables of the Palace; everybody got out and streamed across the great, open, glaring Place to a side door, the entrance to the picture galleries on the right and straight through to the fountains and gardens.

Oh, shades of ill-fated Marie Antoinette and her frivolous Court, how must you feel to see the crowd you despised so much, troop over the parterres and terraces sacred to Royalty, to see little booths for refreshments put up even on the great terrace, and a merry-go-round in the Lime Tree Avenue!

Henri and Rose thought little of kings and queens, to-day was sufficient for them; they hurried down across the terraces to the wood by the lake and they ate their déjeuner there, in the cool shade of the forest trees.

Digitized by Google

Rose produced a delightful paté from her basket and a bottle of Médoc. Henri bought cakes and fruit from a stall in the gardens and they had a nice little meal.

"All that there is of most charming," said Rose, and they laughed and talked while the shadows of the great limes fell as unconcernedly on this little bourgeois lunch as on the great ladies of the French court long ago.

"At half past four the fountains begin," said Henri, "and before that, the band plays in the wood; let us go there, it is more gay. I see already many people among the trees."

So they went, Rose with rather a heavy heart, for the golden-haired lady would be sure to be where the crowd met. Her fears were justified; there she was, much finer and more fashionable than poor little Rose.

Henri twisted his moustache in a fine manner and put on his most soldierly air; the lady looked for a chair, and he darted forward to supply one, receiving in thanks a bow and smile that constituted an acquaintance.

Poor Rose was quite in the shade henceforth; certainly she had also a chair paid for by Henri, but she sat on it alone and neglected, and all the world knows it is not gay to sit alone in a crowd. Henri had forgotten her—the sky was black, not blue; what a most detestable place to spend a holiday in!—was this much talked-of Versailles?

At last Henri and the lady left their chairs and went down towards the lake, she having expressed a desire for a little "promenade" on the water. Rose followed them and remained on the bank, the faithless Henri merely saying the boat was too small for three.

Below the fountains there is a long, wide artificial canal, with a round pond at either end. At one end there is a boat-house where canoes and boats can be hired for one franc fifty centimes the hour.

The specimens of rowing one sees are not very good; some oars fly wildly up without touching the water—others are forced in with severe determination till it seems as if they would never come up again. Then again there are many collisions and clashings of oars, but the water is shallow and the master boatman looks on with serene unconcern. Should a boat upset, he will go to the rescue, but for nothing less can his superior mind be disturbed.

Henri was one of the worst rowers, and the golden-haired lady was evidently not at ease; in starting, he bashed up against a small pier to which boats were moored and the shock jerked one oar out of his hand. The lady screamed, the people on the bank laughed, which made her furious. However, Henri recovered his oar and, rather red in the face, proceeded out to the centre of the lake. Here all went well.

Henri paddled about and even got so experienced as to make a feeble attempt to feather his oars. He and the lady were evidently on the very best of terms, and as Rose watched them from the bank and heard their laughter, her heart sank within her and she walked away sadly under the trees.

Hark! what was that? A shriek from the lake. Ah, yes, indeed! she turned quickly, and saw Henri's boat in collision with another just in the centre of the round pond.

All would have gone well even then, but the golden-haired lady would not keep still—she stood up in the boat and called loudly for the master boatman. What happened was easily foreseen—a sudden lurch, and over she went into the lake—down, down, to the depth of seven or eight feet: then she rose again, gasping wildly.

The boat, fortunately, with Henri in it, was close by; he leaned over and clutched her by the closest place handy—her mass of golden hair. But what was this? It came off! All the ravishing curls, the entire head-dress with flower-toque attached was left in his hand, leaving a round head covered with very short red hair like a brush. At the same moment, fortunately, the lady seized the edge of the boat, so she was in no danger of drowning. Henri remained paralysed, the golden hair in his hand. Not so the inhabitants of the other boat, who screamed with laughter—so did the spectators on the bank. The lady could do nothing but hold on and gasp out "Canaille!" to her tormentors at intervals.

The master boatman soon arrived on the scene in a wide punt, into which he hauled her with scant politeness. Henri restored to her, her golden curls and the episode was ended. So was also Henri's admiration. Alas for fickle Zouaves! he turned his attention to his Rose well-loved, now smiling on the bank, he took her on board his boat and they spent the rest of the day in undisturbed happiness and good-fellowship.

He explained away the episode of the lady with the art of a diplomatist. "All is well that ends well," For Rose it ended well, so she thought it better to forgive and to forget.

As to the lady and the golden hair, she put it on her head again in the welcome seclusion of a little refreshment hut at the park gate, near the boat house, and reappeared charming as ever, only she avoided the neighbourhood both of our friend Henri and the Lake.

"PLEASANT, isn't it?"

Mrs. Roger Brice looked at her husband, her eyes twinkling with mischievous amusement. She was a woman who had learned to take life as it came to her, and did not worry over what she could not alter.

Perhaps that was the reason why her cheeks were still so round and rosy, and the lines about her eyes and mouth were soft instead of hard.

It was inconvenient to have to wait at this tiny junction of the branch road for four hours, but obviously it could not be helped. Already they had explored the single street of the little settlement twice; but the heat was intolerable, and they had returned to the station, resigned to the inevitable. At least, Mrs. Brice. Her husband's frame of mind was better unexpressed.

Roger Brice was one of those methodical, practical men, who have their whole day's action mapped out beforehand, like a military campaign. No spare moments, no idle musings for him! Not that he did not cultivate leisure to a proper degree.

He took his vacation of two weeks (upon which they were just starting) each year with the same precision with which he read his daily paper, and kissed his wife good-bye before starting for his office in the morning; in short, his whole mature life had been one of monotonous routine. Hence when the complexities of outside existence disturbed his own, as in the present case, he was helpless in his well-bred, well-controlled vexation.

"If Roger only would lose his temper sometimes he wouldn't be so exasperating," his wife had often thought; "but, then, he's kept it bottled up so many years that it would be something awful."

His love for her she never doubted, yet deep in her soul was the longing that something sometime might rouse it to a more fervent expression. Still, their life was so happy, so tranquil, if colourless, that she could not really desire any change—she only thought of it.

Mr. Brice smiled unwillingly at her question, and did not answer. He was hot, uncomfortable, bored. In that state a man who has been married fifteen years does not think it necessary to be conversational. Mrs. Brice recognised the mood, and tactfully responded to it.

"I'm going to talk to the ticket agent, or whatever he is," she announced, rising. "Perhaps he can tell me something interesting about the people who live in those houses. Just imagine it! Being shut up here all the year round. I wonder what they think about? But probably they don't think. Good-bye."

Her husband followed the trim figure and easy gait with his glance, critically but not caustically. Then he lighted a fresh cigar and resigned himself more composedly to the discomforts of the situation. In an hour his mood would be almost cheerful, so beneficent are the effects of tobacco and solitude at the right time. Most women realise the potency of the first; but, alas! fail to discover that the second is still more powerful.

How long he sat there Mr. Brice never knew; but he must have fallen asleep, for he was roused suddenly by his wife's voice.

"Roger, Roger," she called, as she hurried down the platform towards him, "I've just had a long talk with the man in there, and who do you think he says lives here? Mrs. Page, Edna Larkin, of all people! Her husband is superintendent of the granite quarry two miles from here, and they live in that house with all the flowers growing round it—the white one. I thought you'd like to go to see her. There's plenty of time, unless you think it's too hot," she added stooping to retie her shoe-lace.

Her husband looked at her in bewilderment. Edna Larkin! He had not heard her name for fifteen—twenty years; had not thought of her voluntarily for ten; but the same old thrill, faint and tremulous, went over him. How unreal it seemed! Yet there stood Carrie before him awaiting his decision.

"Of course," he answered simply, rising. "I should like to see her very much. How strange that we should run across her here! I haven't thought of her since—since——"

"I knew some nice woman must live in that house," interrupted his wife briskly, helping him over the difficult pause.

"Now we must walk slowly. Isn't it hot?" And she smiled apologetically, as she tucked a tiny handkerchief around the collar of her shirt-waist. "It's almost gone, and I want to be respectable when we get there," she explained, as they walked along.

The half-mile between the little shed that served as station and Mrs. Page's pleasant cottage was traversed largely in silence. It was too hot to talk, Mrs. Brice said, and her husband was trying to simplify his confused thoughts.

Edna Larkin! How he had loved that girl! As a lad in the country town where they were both born he had dreamed of nothing better, nothing greater than a life with her. It had been a boy and girl love affair that had grown as they grew, and when chance threw in his way the opportunity to enlarge his life and successes, his one hesitation had been that he must leave her behind.

"Only for a time," he had told himself and her; and she had promised to wait for him with all a girl's rapture over her first sweetheart.

The sequel had been ordinary enough. She had tired of waiting, perhaps had never really cared for him, and married another man.

In spite of himself, Roger Brice smiled as he recalled his misery at this crisis. Not because it had not been real, but because it had been so strong, so vehement. Looking back at it now, it seemed to him incredible that any event could have so wrought upon him.

Then had come the slow but sure rearrangement of his plans; his growing devotion to business; his gradual change from impulsive, ardent youth, to conventional middle age. When the wound had healed he had married, in the same deliberate way that he now did everything; telling the woman of his choice his little story, as something due to her. He remembered his very words:

"I cannot offer you the first, fresh affection of a young heart, dear. But what I do give you—what you will always have, whether you take it or leave it—is the deeper love of one who has suffered and overcome suffering."

And she had said that was all she deserved or wished.

Certainly, Carrie had made him happy. As he stole a look at her, he thought how few of his friends had such cheerful, helpful comrades.

Oddly enough, there flashed across his mind, the memory of one night three years past when she had been very ill, and his forlorn anxiety. What was that early, passionate love, for years almost forgotten, to these long years of calm affection and fellowship? It was a mere bagatelle—a boy's dream. Yet—

"Here we are," said Mrs. Brice, as she turned up the neat path between two flower beds, gay with sweet peas and nasturtiums. "Won't she be surprised to see you, after all these years?" she continued, after ringing the bell.

The door opened promptly, and a tall slender girl, evidently about sixteen, stood on the threshold.

"Is Mrs. Page at home?" asked Mrs. Brice, after waiting a moment for her husband to speak.

Evidently he preferred that she should take the lead.

"Yes'm. Won't you walk in?" answered the girl, opening the door into a long, low parlour, and ushering them to two large plush armchairs.

Not a window was open, and although the blinds were closed, the room was stifling.

"I'll go right and tell her you're here," she continued, disappearing after she had learned their name and errand.

Mr. and Mrs. Brice looked at each other, and the room, tentatively. She was the first to speak.

"What a pretty girl! Her complexion is like a wild rose; and her eyes and hair make such a striking contrast. Does she look like her mother? Oh, how hot it is!" and she picked up a photograph from the centre-table, using it as a fan.

"Yes; very like. Isn't she lovely?" answered her husband slowly.

He was still trying to readjust himself to the conditions before him.

Doubtless some of these brave fellows will never return to the old home. Perhaps you have a photograph of your husband, or your brother, or your son, which you want to preserve for years to come, and yet you have not the means to pay two or three guineas to have this done in the ordinary way. We, therefore, shall make a reduction of a shilling on every photograph of a Soldier or Sailor sent to us.

You will certainly get a genuine bargain by availing yourself of this offer. The enlargements can be made from any photograph, large or small, tin-types, or any kind of glass picture, provided the print is legible. All the enlargements are of the head and shoulders only.

"Why, Roger Brice, I declare! Who would 'a thought of seeing you?" said a shrill voice behind him, and he turned abruptly to see Mrs. Page standing on the threshold.

Could that be Edna Larkin? he asked himself while he shook hands with the newcomer, and murmured the conventional responses.

"I thought it was you when I saw you coming up the walk," continued the hostess turning towards Mrs. Brice, who had also risen, and nervously clasping the brooch at her throat. "And this is Mrs. Brice? I'm happy to make your acquaintance, ma'am. I used to go to school with your husband. Isn't it a dreadful hot day? Won't you have a fan, and a glass of water? Edna," to her daughter, who had re-entered bashfully, "can't you get the lady a glass of water? Yes, this is my daughter Edna. Mr. Page would name her after me. We've never had any other children. How did you ever happen to come to Belmont Junction? And how did you know I lived here?"

Mr. Brice found himself answering in an absent-minded way, but intelligently.

"Poor fellow! I suppose he thought she'd look just as she did twenty-five years ago," thought his wife compassionately, as she fanned herself. She even smiled as she remembered his description of Mrs. Page's beauty as a girl. Then she sighed a little. Mrs. Brice's first lover had given up his life at Gettysburg, "What changes time does make in all of us!" she thought, as she came to her husband's rescue.

How the time passed during that call Mr. Brice could never have told distinctly. His part in the conversation was decidedly passive, yet he talked just enough to banish constraint. Of this, however, he was only dimly aware. What he realised, was intensely conscious of, was the presence of the woman who had been his early sweetheart—the woman he had unwittingly idealized in memory. His ideal!

Not one detail of her present personality, from her awkward figure, red dimpled hands, thin straggling hair, faded eyes, and her kindly but barren talk, escaped him. Still more keenly did he realise the narrowness of her mind, partly due to circumstances, no doubt; but—

When she spoke of sending Edna away "to get an education," he started, and gazed fixedly at the girl; but his wife quietly suggested several schools, encouraged the idea, and finally brought the call to a close. Mother and daughter accompanied their visitors to the gate, and with kindly generosity filled Mrs. Brice's hands with the flowers she had admired. At length the final good-byes were said.

"What a pretty girl the daughter is!" ventured Mrs. Brice breaking the silence on their walk back to the station.

"So quiet and ladylike. I hope she will be able to study, I'm sure; she seemed so anxious to be a teacher,"

She paused, hesitatingly. Her inmost thought was, "I wonder what Roger thought about the mother," but sure of her own position, she was too good-natured to ask.

Mr. Brice walked on without replying. He was still busy trying to harmonise present circumstances with past. This is a difficult task always; but to a man of his unimaginative temperament it is well-nigh impossible, mentally.

Just before they reached the station he turned and looked at his wife long and eagerly; looked at her so intently that she felt his gaze, and smiled up at him encouragingly. Mrs. Brice had never been a beauty, never even a pretty woman; but there was a charm about her that no one who met her failed to recognise. This charm grew on acquaintance.

"Well?" she asked.

Mr. Brice did not answer for a moment. Then, as if the expression of his state of mind was wrung from him involuntarily, he made his only comment upon their call.

"To think that Edna Larkin could ever be so fat!" he said slowly, and relapsed into silence. "Here's the train, dear," he added ten minutes later.

Mrs. Brice smiled at him affectionately. She understood the significance of that "dear."

The Brain Gymnasium

In these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver plated pencil-cases or ten popular six shilling novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by first post on Monday, September 3rd, 1900.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

ACROSS THE BORDER

A Tale of the Present War.

"MARY!"

The voice came from the tall grass which clad the sloping sides of one of two hills laying mid-way between Zeerust and the Bechuanaland frontier.

The one addressed was a beautiful girl of about twenty, clad in the becoming, and useful, dress—half-riding-habit, half-walking costume—affected by most of the women whose fate it is to live in semi-civilised countries.

As the well-known voice fell upon her ears she turned pale, and, after casting one searching glance upon the level stretch of veld at her feet, moved in the direction from which it had come, saying:

"Oh, Dick, why have you ventured here again. You know Stephanus Reicht has sworn to have you shot as a spy if he catches you in his district again."

The immediate answer was a hand stretched forth to draw her into the grass, and the next moment Lieutenant Richard Oram, of Colonel Baden-Powell's Irregular Horse had his sweetheart in his arms.

But only for a moment, it had not needed Mary Trevor's words to tell Oram of his danger and, as he released her, he said:

"I know all about Mr. Reicht, dear, more perhaps than he would like. It is partially to put you on your guard against him that I have crossed the border, and have ridden into hostile territory."

"Hostile territory, Dick? Surely war has not been declared?" asked the girl anxiously.

"To all intents and purposes it has. Kruger has gone dotty in his old age, and has ordered all British troops to be moved from the Transvaal borders," was the reply which brought forth from the young lady a laugh:

"What impertinence! Even the Kaffirs seem to have a truer knowledge of England's greatness than the Boers."

"But it is true nevertheless, and I hope your father will see the wisdom of crossing to Mafeking at once," returned Oram, "but it was not that which brought me here. Our Kaffir spies tell me that Reicht has been collecting the scum of the black population on either side of the border. The spies have talked with them, and they say they are hired to attack the outlying British farms when war commences. Now Kruger dare not do such a thing as that, for, if we retaliated by letting loose the Zulus, Swazis, and Basutos upon them, there would not be a Boer left in the country in a month. No, Reicht is doing it on his own responsibility. He has for some time had a suspicion that your father is something else besides a mere farmer, and perhaps has jumped at the truth."

"You don't think he knows anything about the mine?" asked Mary, turning pale to her very lips.

"That is just what I do think. If he brought a force of Boers against you he would have to share whatever he found with them, if he did not have to give it all up to his government, whilst he can employ the Kaffirs to kill you, then seize the gold for himself."

Ere the girl could reply a Cape Boy who had been on the look-out on the top of the hill rushed towards them crying:

"Four Boers coming, gallop, quick, from Zeerust, Missie."

"Warn the Baas, Tchina," she cried, addressing the Kaffir. Then turning to her lover she added hastily: "Go at once, Dick. After what you have told me I am certain my father will not think of remaining here longer than to-night. At the latest you may look for us in Mafeking to-morrow evening."

"I will not be easy until you are safely there. Good bye, darling, Heaven shield you," cried the young man, pressing her to his heart ere disappearing amongst the tall grass which obtains round Zeerust to make his way towards where he had left his horse fastened to the gnarled roots of a thorny bush.

The girl stood where her lover had left her until she saw him in the distance galloping over the veld, then assured of his safety, she made her way down the hill towards a house built on a bluff which jutted into a narrow stream flowing between the two hills before mentioned.

The house was called a farm, and registered in the Field-Cornet's books as a farm. In fact the thousand acres, which Mr. Trevor had bought twelve months before, fed some three hundred head of cattle, but the grass was too tall and rank for profitable cattle-raising, and the house with its stone walls and corrugated iron roof, seemed rather built as a fort in case of need than for comfort.

And such was the case, for the house was literally built on gold.

Some eighteen months previous by Mr. Trevor and his four sons had left Mafeking prospecting for gold. To his experienced eye the bluff on which he had afterwards built his house, showed signs of gold.

A few experimental borings showed him his supposition was correct as far as the bluff itself went, although the hills and surrounding country did not seem to have a grain of gold in them. Most probably the gold-bearing reef had been detached centuries before from the rich Malamani Goldfields by a volcanic eruption.

To make his find known was to have it wrested from him by the grasping, unscrupulous Boers. He therefore gave out that he was a settler from Cape Colony, and, after some bit of higgling, bought the two hills and the surrounding land for farming purposes. The wily Boer who sold it chuckling at the folly of the "fool Englander," who gave away good money for bad land.

His first care had been to build a house he could defend in case of need, then he trekked with his whole household from Mafeking, to take possession of his new purchase.

Mr. Trevor had taken every precaution to conceal the existence of his great find. Yet, somehow, at the commencement of our story it came to be whispered about that the Englander, Trevor, was working an illicit mine. However, the reports did not trouble him greatly. The mine had proved rich beyond his most sanguine dreams, and he was quite ready to move into British territory, and from thence make his find known at any moment.

Having watched Lieutenant Oram until he was nearly out of sight, Mary hastened from the hill to the farm buildings.

As she entered the barn she found her father arranging the last bags of mealies over the windlass, and washing pans, which were their sole appliances for obtaining the gold, whilst nearly half the barn was occupied with earth from the mine, so covered with hay as to be completely hidden from view.

Assured of the mine's safety, Mary hastened into the house; reappearing at the door just as four Boers, armed with rifles, rode into the open space between the house and the barn.

"Here, take a drink of this," he added, handing his flask to the Kaffir.

"Come, father, dinner is ready," she cried, pretending not to see the clumsy salute with which the foremost Boer greeted her.

"Hullo, Reicht, just in time to have something to eat with us," cried Trevor, hospitably. "Come in, come in."

Nothing loth, the Boers dismounted, and the four brothers joining them at that moment, they all entered the house together.

Reicht was a tall, evil-looking fellow, with heavy features, blood-shot eyes, full thick nose, and sensual lips—in fact, a typical Boer.

At the meal which followed he was more than once in danger of finding himself thrown neck and crop from the house by one or the other of Mary's stout brothers, for the coarse fulsome compliments he paid her, but the laws of hospitality prevailed, and the meal passed off without unpleasantnesses except so far as the Boers' manners are always unpleasant, closely resembling that of the animal whose name but for one letter is similar to his own.

"Are you travelling further, or is your visit to myself?" asked Trevor, when the meal was finished.

"My business is with you, friend," said Reicht as he drew an official-looking paper from his pocket. "You have not taken out naturalization papers, but that doesn't matter, we're going to drive you Britishers into the sea, and you must help to do it. I have here the order to commandeer you, and your sons; but some must be left to look after your farm, I, Field-Cornet, will be content with three of them."

Reicht had spoken with the air of one having authority, and he flushed angrily when Mary, her father, and brothers, received his proposition with roars of laughter.

"Surely you are not serious, Herr Reicht?" asked Trevor. "Why, man, if your little one horse country tries conclusions with Britain, you'll be just giving your country to us."

"You beastly English pigs will never do it. You will run as you did at Majuba, and as for your silly old Queen—" began Reicht.

"Silence, you hound! You may say what you like about our country, for that I know is ignorance. But if you dare to say a word against our beloved Queen, I'll whip you from here to Zeerust." thundered Trevor, red with anger, as he laid a heavy hand on Reicht's shoulder.

Pale as death went the valiant Boer, and pale as death went his gallant companions.

"Don't hit me. Don't hit me," he whined too terrified to do more than look appealingly at his escort, but they were gazing in terror at Trevor's stalwart sons who had placed themselves between their guests and their rifles.

"Hit you, you coward? I have a good mind to thrash you as you deserve for daring to come here on such a fool's errand. Off with you, and if I catch you within five miles of my farm again, you will think a cyclone has struck you," cried Trevor, and the Boers glad to escape so easily mounted their horses and fled.

"Look out you pig Englander, I'll be even with you for this," shouted Reicht, when at a safe distance from the Briton, checking his horse for the moment and shaking his fist at the laughing Englishmen.

"When you wish, Herr Reicht, I will always be glad to see you in any guise but that of a friend," shouted back the miner. "Now, lads, we must get out the gold and make tracks for Mafeking, that brute means mischief," he added, turning to his sons.

Unfortunately for the Trevors' rich "pocket of gold," lying deep in the quartz, had delayed them longer than they expected, and, although they had got it all to the surface, it was not ready for transportation.

But first, as the Trevors had no idea of making the Boers a present of their household furniture, they loaded it on to a big ox-waggon, and some two hours before dark sent it off in charge of the youngest son and the two least trustworthy Cape boys. Old Tchina and another Cape boy went with the waggon to the frontier, after which they were ordered to return and fire the shed, Trevor hoping that, seeing the place destroyed, the Boers would not take the trouble to search it very closely, and would thus miss the mine which he hoped to work, or to dispose of after the war, which seemed inevitable, was over.

As we have said, the Trevors' mining venture had been more than usually successful. Three months before, the old man had taken some ten thousand ounces of gold done up in various sacks and bags, to a trusted agent in Capetown, five thousand ounces had gone with the waggon, hidden away amongst their household effects, but there was still nearly thirty thousand ounces to be carried away, in itself a considerable fortune.

This they placed into strong canvas bags and filled up with mealies, to disguise what they contained, ere being flung over the backs of pack-horses.

The last bag had been placed in position, the pack-horses strung together, and Mary Trevor was looking with a saddened heart at the place in which she had spent so many happy months, when an ejaculation of alarm burst from her lips as Tchina, wounded, bleeding, and breathless, approached them.

"Good Heavens, Tchina! What has happened? Where is Master Charles?" asked Trevor, anxiously, as the old Kaffir hastened towards him.

"Waggon all right over border. Massa Charlie all right, too. Bad black men, creeping like snakes through the grass. Panja dead! Tchina soon join him," replied the faithful old fellow in a weak voice.

"To horse, lads, to horse. We have not a moment to lose. Throw the gold off that horse and mount him, Tchina. Here take a drink of this," he added, extending his flask to the Kaffir who seemed about to fall.

"Too late, Baas, too late," declared the Kaffir. "Black rascals all round farm, no escape, not none."

Even as the faithful Cape boy spoke a shot rang out from the grass and a bullet flattened itself on the wall behind the old miner.

"That's a Boer rifle, I'll swear," ejaculated Trevor angrily. "Into the house, boys, we must give the villains a drubbing, it will never do to start through that grass until we have driven them off."

"Come back, Mary, where are you going?" he asked the next moment as his daughter turned her horse's head towards the open.

"One can get past them, perhaps, where more would fail. I am going for assistance," returned the brave girl. "Good-bye, father, Heaven preserve you," she added, as her horse sprang forward and she was lost to sight in a clump of trees to the east of the farm.

For a moment the miner seemed almost inclined to dash after his daughter, but a moment's reflection showed him that she had chosen a course no more dangerous than his own, and probably less so.

Another bullet which sent his hat flying yards warned him that his position was too exposed, and he rejoined his sons and the remaining three Kaffirs, who, having driven the horses into a large paddock, protected by the house on one side, and by the face of the bluff on the other three, offered them freedom from capture, were already putting the house into a state of defence, by closing the loop-holed shutters, and strengthening them with bags of mealies.

Barely had Mr. Trevor and his three sons, Tom, Harry and Claude and three Kaffirs, one of whom, Tchina, was badly wounded, got ready, then, with blood-curdling yells, some two hundred dark figures dashed from out the long grass and rushed towards the house.

"Don't throw a shot away. Fire!" cried Trevor.

In response the four Lee-Metfords of the white men, and the Sniders of the Kaffirs, flashed fire in the rapidly darkening air, each bullet finding its mark in the closely packed ranks of their foes, who, maddened by the drink Reicht had given them, surged to the very walls of the house, ere, unable to stand the pitiless hail of lead which struck them down at every moment, they turned and fled to the cover of the long grass, from whence the defenders could hear a voice which they recognised as Reicht's, urging them to charge again.

"Do you hear that black-hearted villain. Let us pour a volley into the grass, perhaps a bullet may reach his foul carcase," whispered Trevor to his sons.

No sooner said than done and the four Lee-Metfords all speaking at once, sent their nickel-coated missiles hurtling through the grass, bringing forth a yell of pain which told that they had not fired in vain, although the sufferer was evidently not the man they wanted to kill, but a native.

There is little or no twilight in the Transvaal, and night came upon them like a dark curtain, shutting out the view around, and rendering the task of the defenders trebly hard.

But ere the last rays of the grey light struck the earth, Reicht's band of Kaffirs sprung forward, and, for five minutes, it seemed as though they would break down the door, which alone kept them from their prey, by sheer weight of numbers. Just as darkness finally settled on the scene, the Britons drove them off once more, but not until one of the Cape boys lay dead on the floor with an assegai, which had been hurled through the loop-hole from which he was firing, quivering in his chest, and Claude Trevor had been wounded by a spent bullet in the fleshy part of his arm.

Slowly the hours of darkness dragged their weary lengths away. Death, in its most unnerving form, was constantly threatening them, for in the darkness a native would creep up to the very loop-holes, and the first thing that was known of his presence would be his broad-bladed assegai hurtling into the room.

More than one attempt had been made to burn down the door, but it had been covered with sheet tin and would not burn, and as one of the windows projected so as to cover it, the attackers soon found that the slightest spark only led to a quick report, and certain death, and accordingly it was abandoned.

About one o'clock the moon rose, and with a sigh of relief the defenders saw by her pale beams a score or so of dark bodies which littered the front of the house.

One final rush, and the natives, changing their tactics, kept well under cover, and maintained a constant fusillade upon the house to which the little garrison could make but a faint reply, for their ammunition was already failing them, and, unless help came, the end could not be postponed long.

Just as the first beams of the welcome sun tinged the top of the two hills between which the farmhouse was situated, a cry of:

"The English soldiers! Look out! The soldiers are coming! Run! run!" broke from the ranks of the attackers and the swaying of the tall grass told that they were fleeing towards the East, the direction opposite that from which the rescue party from Mafeking would naturally come.

"Hurrah, lads, we are saved!" cried the old miner, throwing down the mealie bags which blocked the door. "Give them a cheer, boys. It will show Mary, bless her, if she is with them, that her old dad is safe. Hip, hip, hurrah!" he added, rushing out, waving his hat.

But no answering British cheer responded. Instead, a wild, fierce, triumphant yell from their blood-thirsty foes told them that they had been the dupe of a cunning stratagem to draw them from the shelter of the house.

The disappointment was crushing. But not for a moment did the little band of heroes hesitate. It was too late to retreat, and, standing back to back, they faced the oncoming mass of savages, undaunted to the last.

In the meantime Mary Trevor having cleared the wood into which we saw her disappear, found herself in a narrow belt of tall, semi-tropical grass, beyond which lay a wide expanse of short "sweet veld" or "sugar-bush" grass.

So far neither shout, nor shot had followed her, to show that her escape had been noticed, and she was about to congratulate herself on being out of danger, when, from the grass at her feet, a hideous savage, in all the bravery of feathers and furs, sprang up, and seized her horse's bridle.

A home-bred girl might well have lost her nerve, and her life, at the same time. Mary Trevor did neither. Ready for any emergency, she carried in her hand an elegant little pearl-handled revolver, a present from her father. Without a moment's hesitation she aimed at the brawny savage, and fired.

The tiny bullet struck him squarely in the forehead, and, almost without a moan, the raised spear fell from his hands, and he dropped back amongst the long grass dead.

A shudder shook the brave girl from head to foot, and for the moment, she reeled in her saddle, but the next, as an assegai clipped one of the feathers from her hat, in its flight over her head, telling her that other foes were about, she shook her rein, and her well-trained steed darted forward, as a second burly black charged forward to avenge his comrade's death.

Once more the little pistol spoke, and the random shot, for it was little more, struck the shaft of the savage's assegai, cracking it in halves, and undoubtedly saving her life, for a Kaffir seldom misses an easy shot twice.

On she dashed, fearing to meet fresh foes at every stride her charger made, until, at last, the belt of tall grass was cleared, and she was speeding over the open veld.

Turning to the North, and then to the West, she encircled the farm, and, eager to make as much of the little daylight left as possible, urged her horse on to its utmost, the heavy firing from the farm telling her how great the danger was which threatened her father and brothers.

Presently, just as the sun sank to rest, on topping a long ridge running East and West, she came to an abrupt halt, and, for the first time, her brave heart failed her.

Riding slowly over the veld in the direction of Mafeking, from whence alone help could come, was a large force of, as far as she could estimate, quite a thousand Boers.

Had they been European soldiers, although they were marching against her own countrymen, she would have ridden boldly up to them, and begged them to have sent assistance to save white men from savages, but she knew the Boer character too well to hope anything from them. On the contrary, well she knew that he would be met with insult and detentions, if not death.

prairies may have mercy on a foe, if that foe is a woman, but a Boer never.

There was no help for it. She must make a long detour, and get ahead of the commando. Perhaps now, not only the saf ty of her own people, but the safety of the entire garri-on at Mafeking depended upon h r reaching that place before them.

With an impatient sigh she turned her horse's head once more in a northerly direction, and recommenced her ride at an easy hand-gallop.

For nearly an hour she pressed onwards in a darkness so thick that she was unable to see a yard before her horse's head. More than once she narrowly escaped being precipitated into a donga, or over some of the many ant-hills which dotted the plains.

At last, fearing lest she should ride headlong into a Boer encampment, she reluctantly halted. Dismounting, she knee-haltered her horse, and flung herself on the ground to snatch, if possible, a few minutes' sleep.

But every time she closed her eyes the contracted face of the negro she had killed rose before her, and she sprang to her feet trembling in every limb, and praying for light.

At last the moon rose, and she looked around her in dismay. By travelling in the inky darkness she had broken one of the ru'es of veld-life, except when there is a well defined road, and suffered for it accordingly. She was on a wide, ant-hill dotted plain, without a single landmark to guide her.

A rattling of hoofs told her that the Boers were in swift pursuit.

However, unless she had passed over it in the dark, she knew that, by travelling with her back to the moon, she must strike the railroad, which, starting from Cape Town, is destined to traverse Africa to Cairo, and by following that would be certain to reach Mafeking. How she prayed that she might be in time to put Colonel Baden-Powell on his guard.

Her conclusions were correct. About an hour later she struck the railway and was cantering steadily southwards when she stumbled into the midst of an encampment of about thirty Boers, who were evidently on the look-out for a train going, or coming, to Mafeking.

To retreat was impossible, to obey the guttural shouts of the Boers and halt meant the death of her father and brothers, and probably the destruction of the defenders of Mafeking, so bending over her horse's withers she struck him smartly with her riding whip and bounded forward.

A few shots were fired after her, then a rattling of hoofs told her that the Boers were in swift pursuit.

On they came, every moment drawing nearer and nearer, for Mary's pony was small and weighted with the gold she was carrying.

Presently, when the Boers were barely twenty yards behind her, through a cutting between some low hills came a dark fire-belching, unshapely monster, which caused her horse to sw rve aside, almost unseating her.

As it did so the report of a single rifle rung out in the night air and the foremost Boer tumbled from his saddle. The rifle was followed by a "zip-zip-zip" once heard never forgotten, a constant stream of flame seemed to pour from the front of the dark mass, and the remorseless fire of a maxim struck the remaining Boers, sweeping them down as though they had been blasted by supernatural agency.

Then she knew that it was one of the armoured trains which had saved her, and rode fearlessly up to an opening near the engine, in the cent e of the train from which a man alighted, who, with a cry of joy, she recognised as Lieutenant Oram.

"M ry, you here? Where are your father and brothers?" he cried, hastening to her side.

He looked very grave as Mary Trevor told him all that had occurred. When she had finished he said:

"Ride back to Mafeking, darling, and give notice of the Boer advance. I ha e a dozen troopers behind those hills, and will start off for the farm at once. Heaven grant we may be in time."

"Can't I come with you, Dick?" pleaded Mary.

"Impo sible, dear. Besides I cannot spare a trooper, and so you will be doing an actual service if you will go," replied Dick, who knew that appeals for her personal safety woul l have had no effect on the brave girl, and had invented this excuse fo sending her into the town.

As to the advance of the Boers, Colonel Baden Powell's scouts had informed him of that long ago.

One hasty kiss and D ck having seen his sweetheart speeding towards Mafeking, blew a blast on his whistle. Immediately twelve troopers, one of whom led his officer's horse, cantered through the cutting.

"Now, my lads, four Englishmen and a few Cape boys are being attacked in a farm just over the border by some Kaffirs led by a white scoundrel, whom I need not say is a Boer. We have been ordered not to cross the frontier, but there is no time to communicate with the Colonel. I will not ask you to disobey commands, but I am going, let who will stay behind."

As he spoke Dick swung himself on to his horse, and, without looking round, galloped eastwards, but his practised ear told him that his gallant little troop had answered his appeal to a man.

On they swept over the veld, keeping well to the North, for Dick wished to take the foe in the rear, from whence no attack could be expected. An hour's quick gallop brought them to the rear of the hills just as the sun rose above the horizon.

Little guessing how close Nemesis was on him, Stephanus Reicht was watching his mob of half-drunken blacks as they surged round Mr. Trevor and his gallant little party.

Reicht was an arrant coward at heart, and had gladly availed himself of the excuse that he did not want to be seen by the Britishers, to keep out of harm's way.

Now and again the Kaffirs seemed to be swamping the little group of determined Britons, then they would reel back, beaten and discomfited, but only to gather for another rush.

"Bother these English, how they die," muttered Reicht with involuntary admiration, as he saw his paid assassins recoil once more before their foes. "On, my brothers, on. One more charge and your assegais will drink their heart's blood," he yelled.

"But yours shall pay the penalty first," shouted a hoarse voice in his ear, and, turning, he found himself face to face with Dick Oram and his twelve stern-faced troopers.

"Mercy, mercy. I——" began the wretched man, but ere he could throw himself on his knees before his avenger, as he intended doing, the cold beams of the moon shone for a moment on Dick's sword, and the next the blade entered his cowardly heart.

"Now, lads, one volley into the black devils, then charge," he added, withdrawing his sword, and stepping contemptuously over the writhing corpse.

Twelve loud reports, ringing out as one, a stirring British cheer, and the Kaffirs, not daring to meet Dick's gallant troopers, broke and fled.

"Thank heaven you have come. Their next charge must have destroyed us. We have only one cartridge left!" cried Mr. Trevor as he pressed his rescuer's hand.

"Had we been too late you would have died like heroes," cried Dick admiringly, pointing to about forty or fifty dead Kaffirs which lay around where the little band had stood.

But although they were saved so far, all danger was not yet over. Not one of the party had escaped unwounded, although all except the eldest son were yet upon their feet, but they were bleeding from numberless wounds and would not be much good if they had to fight their way through the Boers to Mafeking.

It took the troopers, experts in wounds though they were, half-an-hour to see to the injuries the little party had sustained, then driving the pack horses before them, for Dick would not hear of the gold being abandoned to the Boers, they set off on their return journey.

Until they struck the railway they were unmolested, but as they neared the cutting where Mary had met the armoured train, they were attacked by at least two hundred Boers and were in imminent danger of being captured, when the train once more steamed on to the scene, and sent the Boers flying in all directions before the fire of its maxim.

Shortly afterwards the little party reached Mafeking in safety. The next day, when the armoured train under Lieutenant Nesbit departed on its journey to Vryburg, from which it was fated never to return, Mary and her elder brother, who had been too seriously injured to fight again, were carried by it to that town and to safety.

Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXI.—HE SPENDS HIS LAST NIGHT IN THE COUNTRY.

MRS. BOWSER and the cook worked over Mr. Bowser for two hours after his adventure with the bumblebees, and he spent the whole day sitting about with his head and hands in poultices. During the morning before his pains had abated, no questions were asked him, but after dinner, when his interest in life seemed to have revived a little, Mrs. Bowser said:

"I can't make out how it happened. Did you walk into a nest of bumblebees?"

"Woman, do you take me for an idiot? I saw through the whole thing in a minute. I was out here for my health. I was beginning to find the pure air and the seclusion doing me good. You wanted to go home, and played a trick on me."

"But how did I know about the bumblebees?" she protested.

"Never mind how you knew. It was a deep laid plot to bring about my death, your sixteenth attempt to assassinate me, but it failed. But for your bloodthirstiness I might have consented to return home when my weight had increased ten or fifteen pounds, but now I'll be hanged if I don't stay here till I weigh a ton!"

It was no use to argue further. The day passed slowly and quietly by, and night came. Mr. Bowser grew better natured, and as he sat at the door he melted enough to say:

"By George, but what an evening! At this hour in the city there's noise enough to rouse the dead, while here there's a soothness and stillness positively entrancing. No wonder that farmers live to be two hundred years old."

"I hope the whole night will be quiet," ventured Mrs. Bowser as she thought of Dusty Bill and the other interruptions.

"We shall sleep like tops and awake with the rising sun. I am glad to see you and the cook more reasonable about things. In a day or two all will be ship-shape, and you'll both thank me for this move."

The crickets sang, the blackbirds chattered, and the sparrows called to each other in the ivy. By and by it was bedtime, and the house became quiet.

The first interruption came from the owl of the night before. He wasn't satisfied with his previous effort, though he had done fairly well. He came to beat the record, and the sound of his voice rolled Mr. Bowser out of bed and set the women screaming.

"Shut up your noise!" he shouted as he fumbled about and struck a light. "It's nothing but that owl come back again; but, by the bones of my grandfather, I'll show him that his hooting isn't appreciated!"

The bird flew away at the sight of the light, and Mr. Bowser was standing in the open door surveying the night when a voice out of the darkness remarked:

"I see your light, old pal, and thought I'd drop in and hev a drink with you."

It was Dusty Bill again.

As Mr Bowser gazed at him in astonishment he came forward and continued:

"And perhaps you can be prevailed upon to show me that trick you practised on me last night. By George, what's the matter with your face?"

"You scoundrel!" gasped Mr. Bowser. "But what are you doing down here again tonight?"

"Haven't I been telling you? Where's the drink?"

"I'll give you drinks, you loafer, you! Out of this before I mop the earth with you!"

"But the dr——"

He was standing at the open door surveying the night.

Mr. Bowser tackled him, the women screamed, the owl hooted from a distant tree, and for five minutes there was a lively time in that end of the country. Then the tramp broke away and made off, and as the panting Mr.

Bowser sat down on the doorstep to recover his wind Mrs. Bowser tearfully exclaimed:

"Your ear is bitten, your nose is scratched, and he's torn the shirt off your back! How can you call this a holiday? Oh, if you'd only agree to go home in the morning!"

"Never!" he shouted as he got breath enough. "I've hired this place for three months, and all the tramps in the country shan't drive me away. Go back to bed and let the crickets sing you to sleep. I'll sit about for a while and see if anything more is going to happen. If the tramp comes back, I'll kill and bury him."

Mrs. Bowser and the cook went back to their rooms, and for the next hour all was peace. Mr. Bowser was sick of the whole job and fishing for a way to throw it up and get back to town, but he couldn't see his way clearly. Right or wrong, he always stuck to his word.

He was plunged in reflection when the owl came flying round, but he managed to drive it off without raising an alarm. He had just taken his seat again when he heard the tramp of feet, and the next moment Dusty Bill and two other tramps stood before him.

"Excuse me, old pal," said Dusty, with a scrape and a bow, "but I thought you might like to meet me intimate friends, Railway Jim and Towpath Tom. I told 'em that you had some drinks ready for us."

"I want the gang of you to clear off this place at once!" sternly replied Mr. Bowser as he heard the two women getting out of bed.

"Speak softly, my boy," said Railway Jim as he pressed forward. "We is gentlemen talking to a gentleman. There ain't no call for any hard words between us."

"And on the part of this gang of gentlemen," added Towpath Tom, as he moved up, "I'd like to ask the stranger what he is doin' in our house."

"Your house!" replied Mr. Bowser. "I've hired this house for three months, sir, and you can't get off the place any too quick to please me!"

"Gents, you see how it is," said Dusty as he turned to his companions. "This yere chap has gone and formed a trust to drive us out of our home, and the only way we can git our rights is to bust the combination."

Mr. Bowser realized that he had a fight in prospect, with odds of three to one, but he did not falter. As they moved towards him he was ready, and when Mrs. Bowser reached the door the four men were fighting in a heap on the grass.

There were screams and shouts and bad words, the tramps encouraged each other by shouting warcries, but at the end of ten minutes they gave up the fight and fled. Mr. Bowser had fairly licked the trio, but he had not come off unscathed. They had kicked and bitten and pinched him until he was a sight to see.

Mrs. Bowser was weeping and the cook wailing as he got up and shook himself to see what was missing. Without heeding them he marched into the house and the kitchen. After washing off the blood he took down his coat from a hook, buttoned it round him and put on his hat.

"You are not going to follow them?" sobbed Mrs. Bowser.

"If we are left alone here, we'll be murdered!" wailed the cook.

"Get ready and come on," replied the victor of the fight.

"But where to?"

"Follow me."

And they put on their hats, locked the door behind them and followed him down to the gate and down the road to the station. He walked in advance and spoke no word.

They had only five minutes to wait for the midnight train, and he waved them into a compartment and came after.

"It must be that we are going home," said Mrs. Bowser as the train started.

"If we are, then I'll work for you for a year without wages," said the thankful cook.

Mr. Bowser heard them, but he gave no sign. He had spent a day and two nights in the country, and he was trying to calculate how many years it would take him to recover from his holiday.

Only once did he seem to take any interest in what was going on round him. That was as the train stopped at a station for a minute and a familiar voice on the platform was heard saying:

"Yes, gentlemen, he's fat and bald-headed and crooked in the legs, but you have the word of Dusty Bill that if he'd train for the ring none of the fellers of to-day would be in it."

The Palomino Stallion.

We drank our coffee, saddled up and rode away from the ranch house into the chill death of night that comes before the dawn, Tom and Jack and I.

For the first hour the three of us had but little to say as our cow ponies scuffled quickly ahead through the dark, beyond a word at the passing of a light and some disjointed talk of the chances for finding the "Wolf's Pond Bunch," a wild outlying drove of brood-mares and younger horses. There is always the risk, with such a drove, of their joining the mustangs, and we decided to take out their leader, the shy Palomino stallion, and break him to ride, putting in his place a gentler horse; one who would keep his family nearer home.

Clearing the thicker growth of the main valley we rode up an open draw that heads away towards the high levels of the bare divide. It was a night of stars; and obscuro deeper than the black void beneath a clouded sky. The creak and chafing of the saddle gear, and the quick crunching of the horses' feet, went strangely through the silence.

Beside me rode so much of Jack as was not lost in reverie, swinging easily along, with a certain care in the nursing of his cigarette and an absent tapping of his quirt against the horse's quarter. I could catch at times the soft gleam of the starlight in his eye, and my thoughts strayed vaguely on the trail of his, wandering with the sweethearts and the worldful of brothers the dear fellow lived for.

On my other hand rode Tom—a riddle not to be read by such key as the occasional emphatic slap of his quirt against his leathern chappareros. A sturdy figure, a careful seat in the saddle and a something in the strong face that little children loved.

As we rode steadily through the star-gloom, suddenly, from out a thicket, far off on the low swell of hill that outlines the gentle valley, there came, clear as a bugler's reveille, the morning song of a mocking-bird. Of all the sounds that haunt the night and cheer the dawn, there is none that moves one as does the surprising readiness of the mocking-bird's first call.

As the song ended, with the sharp finish of a challenge, Tom raised his sombrero and cried out to the bird the morning salutation of the Mexicans—a benediction, as it comes from the lips of the humblest peon, even as our Good-bye was meant to be; and Jack broke out with the plaintive, barbaric air and the queer, inconsequential phrasing of "Manana."

And then, as our ponies climbed from the head of the valley to the higher level, the great sigh and rustle of the wakening earth filled the air.

And so, while yet the prairie forms beside showed dimly, the night had lightened, till the long range of sight seemed the limit of eye power, and the chant of the matins of the wilderness rose all about us. The full choir of the song birds, the plaintive solo of the quail, the drum-like challenge of a distant gobbler, the mellow boom of calling cattle.

Presently there fell, in that strange light, a sudden hush; and we drew rein, rolling our cigarettes with heads bowed in absent reverence, and ere we had them glowing, the great world was all alight! The chorus of the dawn broke out again, a wave of crimson swelled across the east, and with that sudden change from night to day which is ever strange to him of northern breeding, the great, red sun swung slowly into the cloudless blue of the dry-country sky.

A couple of hours later we found the Palomino stallion and his harem, as they trailed out from watering at Wolf's Pond.

Queer cattle, these half-tamed range horses.

At first the mares and youngsters huddled wildly together as we rode up to within a hundred yards of them. The stallion trotted bravely out to meet us, the sunlight glinting in the bright cream of his coat and in the rare, silvery dappling for which the Mexicans named him. Soon they were all following us with a shy curiosity, but when we turned and commenced to drive them, the whole crew stampeded, and a pretty chase they led us for the first five miles.

The stallion weaving back and forth in the rear to touch up stragglers, kept the mad pace with scarce a break in the long, free swing of his trot.

By the time we neared the ranch we had them well in hand, however, and heading them in between the wide-spread wings of the horse corral, went tearing down that narrowing lane with long whips cracking, and each man in full cry and crowding them in through the open gap with a rush, we swung the high gate behind them.

After dinner Jack lassoed the stallion, casting with the underhand throw as the string of horses whirled swiftly about the circular fence. The loop fell open before the horse, and both his forefeet struck the ground inside it. Jack drew the loop tight, with a swing and a light pull, and, as the Monarch of Wolf's Pond range rose to the next leap, threw his weight upon the lasso and jerked both forelegs from under him, bringing him down broadside. Before the poor beggar could catch his breath Tom and I were upon him. I gripped him by the ear and by the under jaw, with thumb stuck through behind the nippers, and forced his head back upon his shoulder while Tom quickly slipped the lasso over the hind feet and stretched it taut to the snubbing-post. So he lay at our mercy while we carefully adjusted the close-fi ting "jaquima" halter and be t a forty-foot lead rope into the loop of it. To bit a bronco is a useless cruelty. Loosing the rope from off his feet we played him for an hour, a« one plays a fighting salmon, then staked him out on an open bit of sod to run the length of his rope, as, indeed, is the way of many folk, and to throw himself with the certainty of fate.

Next morning, after an hour's careful work, we had the Palomino saddled, ready for me to mount.

The beautiful brute stood blindfolded, his black mane and tail and waving foretop streaming in the breeze and every muscle tense and quivering with the raging fear that filled him. We had lashed a short stick, snugly rolled in a blanket, across the saddle, back of the pommel, to brace my thighs; shortened the stirrup leathers and tied a thong from one stirrup to the other to prevent their swinging.

Jack, on the off-side, held the stallion, dumbly crowded against his own horse. Tom sat his mount beside me. Coiling the lead rope in my left hand, I grasped, along with it, the reins of the "jaquima." With the right hand upon the pommel I swayed the saddle back and forth for a moment and then, with two fingers of the left hand in the check-piece of the halter, I put my toe in the stirrup and gently swung into the saddle. Settling myself carefully, I nodded to Jack to slip the blindfold. As he did so, Tom and he moved their horses forward.

The bronco stumbled awkwardly along with them, in the sudden daze of the sunlight, while I was filled with a most unheroic hope that he would run. But n a moment he caught sight of all the indignity that had been put upon him, and at that the war was on.

The wild swing of the straight, high leap, the racking wrench of t e buck, the dizzying jar of the stiff-legged drop, and the breathless speed of it!

For five minutes of chaos that bronco bucked, straight up and down, upon a space one might have covered with a waggon sheet, and I knew that such rough riding as I had done before had been but child's play!

Then, as I fell into it, and felt the grip of my high heeled boot in the shortened stirrup, the twist of my spur in the flank-girth, the brace of the roll across my thighs and grip of leg that held me there, I knew that I could win. I forgot the wrenching, jarring strain of it, and there came to me the nicety of balance and the quick interplay of muscle of the trained wrestler, but for how long? Already my head was swimming and my eyes blinded from the quick concussions. And then the bronco played the dre.ded "snake fence," twisting alternately to the one side and the other until it seemed as if the force of each sidewise drop must drive his shoulder to the ground. An agony of pain went through every joint and sinew, as I dizzily followed the quick changing of balance. For an instant my heart failed me, and there was a st ange choking in my nostrils, but as I blew them clear I caught the scent and hot splash upon my cheek of my own blood, and with that the decent fellow, who has usually lived inside my jacket, went out from me, and in his place there burned in every vein, and swelled in every muscle a maddened b.ute, as savage, as reckless, and ten thousand times as determined as the one between my thighs.

Jack, afire at the sight of the red trickle upon my white face, cried out, as with the war-shout of a charging captain:

"Quirt him! Dash him, quirt him!"

Tom, judging a weakening of the bronco's nerves, and seeing that the case was desperate, sent to my dull ears in that strong voice of his:

"Now, Tonie, give him his head!"

Slacking the lines, I lashed the brute on head and flank and shoulder with savage blows of the stinging lash of my heavy quirt, while Jack's great cow-whip hissed and roared as it cut burning gashes in the bronco's haunch. Tom, lurching savagely against me, staggered the stallion till he all but fell, and then, the rhythm of his bucking broken, and cowed by the punishment we gave him, he broke into mad galloping, while Tom and Jack, on either side, hustled him clear of every danger.

We ran that bronco till he staggered and was like to fall, and then Tom caught him by the "jaquima." I kicked my spurs out from the tangle of the flank-girth, and Jack, with his great arm about me, lifted me clear of the saddle—the Palomino stallion was tamed.

A SMALL, slender person, with a fresh complexion, and a body and limbs so diminutive that they seemed a reduced copy of those of an ordinary woman, but possessed of a pair of large black eyes which sent the blood to the head of those upon whom she turned them—such was Noeline Fargues, the young mistress of the mill of Espibos.

A ramshackle old structure, built a-straddle of a brook, isolated in a grove of alders, leaning to one side, dilapidated, eaten away by the ivy that covered it, supported here and there by large beams that looked like crutches, but endowed with an alert and joyous clatter which made it resemble a talkative peasant woman—such was the home of Noeline, the old mill of Espibos.

The mill, decrepit as it was, had its faithful customers; its mistress, though small, had a goodly number of lovers.

Among these two were chiefly to be distinguished: Aristide Larrieussec, a big, chubby-cheeked fellow, the son of a neighbouring farmer, and Jouanin Lacaze, a fair-haired youth, who was serving in the position of an apprentice at the largest shop of the neighbouring village.

Aristide, the farmer, often prowled around the mill, his pockets full of fruit for the object of his affections. The two ate it together, seated in front of the millstone, while the iron wheel turned by the water sang its unceasing rhythmic song, and the white flour fell silently, covering everything around as with a frosting of sugar.

Jouanin, the shopkeeper, was less fortunate. He hardly saw Noeline except on Sundays, after Mass, when she came to buy needles and thread at the shop in the village. At such times Jouanin was flushed with joy.

He displayed before the kind eyes of the young girl all the spools of thread and all the papers of needles which the shop contained, and a long time was spent in making a selection, while occasionally the fingers of the two touched each other, in the midst of the articles they were handling.

Sometimes, too, of a Sunday evening, Jouanin would obtain a couple of hours' leave of absence, and bring his rod and line to fish in the brook of Espibos. He hardly ever caught anything, because the brook contained fewer fish than any other in the neighbourhood, but Jouanin would choose his position so that he could watch, at the same time, the windows of the mill and the float of his fishing-line.

He consoled himself for the immobility of the latter by looking at the charming things which were to be seen at the former.

At nightfall, Noeline would generally come to look for her ducks on the banks of the brook, and the grasp of the hand which the lovers exchanged in the Sabbath twilight was so sweet that Jouanin dreamed of it till the following Thursday.

The mistress of the mill had no hesitation in choosing among her lovers; it was Jouanin whom she preferred to all the others. She hardly thought of anything but him. Him alone she trusted entirely, with him alone she felt perfectly happy.

Fair-haired Jouanin was therefore authorised to pay his court, and Noeline's mother soon invited him to come and eat chestnuts at the mill during the long autumn evenings.

The first time, however, that the young shopkeeper went to visit his sweetheart, a strange thing happened. The cricket which always chirped behind the kitchen chimney remained silent.

"That is singular," thought Noeline's mother.

And the young girl, on her part, turned quite pale.

And when Jouanin came for his second visit, the same thing happened. As soon as the wooer opened the door the cricket ceased chirping.

Upon this Noeline's mother crossed herself, and her daughter clasped her trembling hands beneath her apron.

Every time that Jouanin entered the house the hostile cricket refused to let itself be heard, and in listening closely one could hear a peculiar sound, an inexplicable scratching in the chimney, as if the little creature were revolting.

Noeline cried a good deal, her mother was much depressed.

Like the majority of peasant women they both attached great importance to the chirping of the cricket.

They were aware that the song of one of those insects in a house insures to its inhabitants happiness and prosperity. The fact of it remaining silent whenever Jouanin was present was regarded as a sure sign that the poor lad would bring misfortune upon anyone who had anything to do with him.

And yet Noeline knew very well that her lover was good, honest, and industrious; she thought she could read many promises of happiness in his loving grey eyes; but the cricket did not agree with her. It might have proved dangerous not to heed its warning, and when the timid shopkeeper came, with bowed head and a lump in his throat to ask Noeline's mother for her daughter's hand, the old woman looked very grave, and the girl could hardly refrain from sobbing in her apron.

Jouanin was rejected. He was not given the true reason. It would have troubled him to learn that he brought bad luck to a house that he entered.

The mother gave him plenty of probable pretexts, and Noeline escaped from the room to hide her grief. She went and sat down by the millstone, in the old dilapidated mill, listening to the drops of water falling over the great iron wheel, and when she heard Jouanin closing the door as he left the house to return home by the alder-grove, along the murmuring brook, she thought her heart would stop beating in her breast, and she prayed aloud, as if she had been in fear of death.

The following week Jouanin left the country. With his clothes tied in a handkerchief, he went off during a cold twilight, when the last leaves seemed shivering on the trees. He entered the alder-grove, and went along the brook of Espibos.

The young mistress of the mill saw him coming, and remained standing motionless at her door.

"Good evening, Noeline," he said slowly.

"Good evening, Jouanin," she replied, lowering her eyes.

Then as he went on, she ventured to ask.

"So you are going to leave the country?"

He seemed to stumble a little on the path covered with leaves.

"Yes; I have found a place at Orthez."

She said nothing. Unconsciously she turned and twisted between her fingers a small silver cross that hung at her throat, and, with dim, troubled eyes, she watched Jouanin as he went, in the increasing darkness, through the silent woods.

* * * * *

A small, slight person, bent, with the lean body and limbs of a worn-out old woman, but still possessed of a pair of expressive eyes far younger than the face of which they formed a part—such was Noeline Fargues, the mistress of the mill of Espibos twenty-five years after the departure of Jouanin Lacaze. The peasant women of the South of France fade rapidly.

A-straddle of the brook, as of old, the mill still held its own, thanks to several supplementary crutches, and its clatter was as merry as that of a new one.

Noeline Fargues had not married Jouanin gone, no other lover had succeeded in touching her heart. Aristide Larrieussec, ardent though he was, had been disarded like all the rest. The young farmer, long inconsolable, had finally married a girl from the neighbourhood.

At the present day he visited his old sweetheart only for the purpose of selling her his grain. They had both probably forgotten the delicious fruit they had eaten together by the millstone long ago, while the white flour fell silently, dusting every object around them.

Jouanin, for his part, had never returned.

Many a time Noeline had wandered along the brook in the innocent hope of seeing the young shopkeeper appear before her. She had thought of him nearly every day; and almost every night, when the cricket sang she grew sad, and sat dreaming by her lonely fireside, until the resin candle had burned itself out.

Alas! Orthez was so far away! The people of Espibos never go to that town. At the shop in the village no one had heard anything about Jouanin. What had become of the fair-haired young apprentice? Noeline still prayed for him from time to time, when her poor soul was sadder than usual, and, by degrees, in the hollow breast of the lonely peasant woman, the beatings of her heart became cold and monotonous, like the clatter of her poor old mill.

One moonlight evening Noeline, who was then forty-two years old, was expecting Larrieussec, Jouanin's former rival. He was coming to sell her his corn, and to discuss the price. Noeline had offered twelve francs and five sous for the bag. The farmer had asked twelve francs and fifteen sous.

It was nearly nine o'clock. The night was warm, the moon cast its white light on the winding path through the grove. Noeline, standing on the threshold of the mill, saw someone approaching.

"That is not Larrieussec," she thought. "He does not come that way."

The unknown had a square box on his back. He walked slowly, seem fatigued, and, as if he were a stranger, looked closely at the brook, the mill, the trees of the grove.

"Good evening, my good woman," he said, as he stopped. "Would you like to see Our Lady of Lourdes?"

He was evidently a pedlar from the Bearn or the Bigourde, one of those travelling salesmen from Pau or Bagnères, who, under the pretext of showing a statuette of the Virgin, which they carry at the bottom of their box, sell to the country people rosaries, medals, as well as needles and thread.

"My poor fellow, it is rather dark for looking at your Virgin."

However, as the pedlar's voice sounded gentle, and as the Virgin's intercession might possibly induce Larrieussec to lower his price to twelve francs five sous, Noeline continued:

"Come in, salesman; I will look at your Virgin by the light of our resin."

So the pedlar followed her into the mill. When Noeline could see his face she felt the blood rushing to her thin cheeks, and when the salesman looked at her he seemed equally disturbed. At last, in rather a plaintive voice, the man asked:

"So you still live here, Noeline?"

"Oh, heavens!" replied the mistress of the mill, her heart throbbing violently, "is it possible that it is you, Jouanin?"

And for a moment they remained silent.

The water of the brook fell, in resounding drops, on the iron wheel of the mill, as it had done long ago, when the young shopkeeper courted the girl he loved. And suddenly, behind the chimney-piece, was heard the clear chirp of a cricket.

Noeline felt a slight pricking in her eyes, which seemed like the birth of a tear.

Jouanin told her of his life. He had succeeded well at Orthez. He had married there, he had had children, he had a shop there, and, at the present day, he and his family were happy. Only, he had felt a desire to see his old home once more, after twenty-five years of absence, and, from economical reasons, he had made the journey as a pedlar, selling thread, needles, and other cheap wares.

"Oh, I was quite sure you would succeed, Jouanin," said Noeline, with a sigh.

The cricket was still chirping behind the fire-place. The mistress of the mill seemed overcome by a growing emotion.

"Well, then," stammered Jouanin, "will you tell me, Noeline, why you would not marry me twenty-five years ago."

She could not answer at first. She pointed to the chimney with a shamefaced gesture, feeling tempted to hide her face in her apron, as she has been wont to do in her youth.

"It was because of the cricket," she confessed.

"The cricket?"

"Yes; I was a fool. I thought you would bring me bad luck—the cricket stopped chirping whenever you came to see me."

"It stopped chirping; and why?"

Noeline shrugged her thin shoulders to indicate that she did not know. And they both remained thoughtful. Their eyes did not dare meet in the light of the smoking resin.

Before long, however, Larrieussec, the farmer, whom Noeline had been expecting, made his appearance.

"Good evening! I salute you!" he said, after the manner of the peasants, who give as many greetings as there are persons in the company.

And when he had recognised the young shopkeeper of old, he cried:

"What, Jouanin, you here? What the dickens did you come for?"

"I came to talk over old times. That does one good at our age."

"Yes, indeed," replied Larrieussec. "The good old times! By the way, did not you and Noeline think of getting married in those days?"

"You are right," remarked the mistress of the mill.

"And do you know what prevented us?" asked the pedlar. "A cricket!"

"Pshaw! A cricket?" exclaimed Larrieussec. "But let me think—I remember now——"

He burst out laughing.

"Oh, that was a good joke!" he cried. "A good joke indeed!"

Then he went on seriously:

"Bah! You are happy, are you not, both of you? We are all happy here! So there will be no harm in confessing the little tricks of our youth. Ah, that was a capital one! Listen, Jouanin, we are as good friends as ever, are we not, old boy? Very well. It was because I watched you, and scratched the outside of the chimney there, towards our field, every time you came to court Noeline. You see, you were not the only fellow who was in love with her, and I know someone who was horribly jealous of you!"

Then seeing that this revelation had a chilling effect on his auditors, and that Noeline's eyes rested on him sadly, he said very generously:

"But that isn't all. I came to tell you that I accept your price, twelve francs five sous a bag. Will that do, Noeline?"

And Noeline answered in a low tone:

"It will do, Larrieussec."

Upon this the farmer bought some spools of thread for his wife, of the merchant of Orthez, and paid for them at once, without haggling.

"Adieu! I salute you!" he said as he left.

The two old lovers remained alone.

They did not say much. Jouanin slowly rearranged his wares. Noeline watched him, while unconsciously turning and twisting the old silver cross, which still hung at her throat, between her poor misshapen and bony fingers.

For a moment, quite weak and despairing, she felt tempted to imprint a kiss upon Jouanin's grizzled hair, once so fine and so fair, but she restrained herself.

Her lips were too old to bestow a caress upon a man

"Well, then, good-night, Noeline!" said the pedlar, lifting his box to his shoulders.

"Good-night, Jouanin."

They shook hands in some embarrassment, and then separated.

He followed the moonlit path through the grove. She, standing at the door of the mill, looked after him, while, behind the chimney-piece, the cricket chirped, calmly, clearly, indefatigably, as if it would have told Noeline of all the happiness which might have been hers.

He Delivers a Lecture on the American Red Man and Duty.

"LADIES and gentlemen—It is needless for me to observe that this large and intelligent audience makes me proud.

"It was advertised that this lecture would be free, and you found the doors wide open to you. I feel it a sort of duty, however, to take up a collection. Any money so contributed will be evenly divided. One-half will go towards erecting a tombstone over the grave of the father-in-law of Christopher Columbus, as soon as the same can be located, and the other half will be economically expended in paying my personal expenses from town to town.

"As I pass the hat I will call your attention to the fact that if Columbus hadn't been backed by his father-in-law he could never have set out on his voyage of discovery, and that the said father-in-law has never had a fair chance in history.

"As I count up the proceeds of the collection, which amounts to five shillings, I wish to return thanks on behalf of Columbus and all his relations, and to assure you of my own personal gratitude as well.

"My subject to-night is the American Indian, and the duty of the white man towards him. It may surprise some of you to learn that you have a duty towards the Indian but I hope to make it plain to you. I turn the light of my stereopticon on the canvas, and you behold the picture of the savage at home.

"Instead of sowing or reaping he is engaged in a war dance. Instead of broadening his mind he is still clinging to his old time traditions. As he dances he yells for scalps and shouts for gore, and it hurts his feelings to remember that he can't break loose and tomahawk half-a-dozen women and children.

"Who is to blame for this state of affairs? All of us. Had we followed the finger of duty thirty years ago the red man of to-day would have been wearing tight shoes, tall hats and high collars, and his thirst for gore would have been washed away in mock-turtle soup and lobster salad.

"The Indian, as an Indian, can't help his ways or amend them. The white man has given him no choice but to continue on in the same old path. He has not been given enough religion to get up a fight at a street corner.

"We see this savage engaged in a war dance, when he might just as well be employed in compiling a family almanac or canvassing for life assurance, but he is barred from it by our want of interest in his welfare.

"We lay aside the picture of the war dance and substitute another. My heart aches every time I exhibit it.

"You see the picture of a squaw standing in front of her wigwam. She is not a beauty. She is stout and short and without grace, and life holds nothing for her. Years ago she was called Blue Bell, and the young men of her tribe raved over her willowy form and her fawn-like glide. Had the hand of the white race been extended to her then what a difference it would have made in her later years!

"Behold the picture of the savage at home."

"Instead of hunting rabbits with a club she would have been gliding about a drawing room. Instead of wearing an army blanket on an Indian reservation she would have draped and posed for a goddess before some great painter.

"In the place of gathering firewood and cooking mule meat she would have graced the banquets in palaces and had counts and dukes bowing at her feet. No helping hand was extended, and the Blue Bell with the willowy form was left to mature into a squaw, who smokes a pipe and whistles.

clothes, with nothing to do but lick his squaw in the morning, kick his dogs in the afternoon and shout at his papooses after dark?

"I ask the woman with the frozen expression over there by the post how she would like to be a squaw in a wigwam—her feet always cold, her heart always sad, and a consumptive cough ever warning her of a cheap coffin and a shallow grave?

"Our duty is a plain one, and yet we have neglected it. We have taught the heathen of Africa how to eat mince pie, and have taught the heathen of China how to devour plum pudding, but we have turned our backs on the red Indian, and had no concern in his welfare.

"I feel I must speak plainly on this matter. I feel I must say to the fat man with the bald head and contented look on his face that he has been remiss in his duty and ought to be ashamed of himself.

"Do not argue that it is now too late to undo this great wrong—to make good your neglect and indifference. I give you another picture. It is a papoose. In forwarding the picture my artist forgot to mention the sex, but that makes no difference. It is a child growing up. Unless we reach out our hands it will grow up to be a buck Indian with no ambition beyond whooping for scalps and trapping wolves, or a squaw whose life will be devoted to tanning deerskins and roasting prairie dogs.

"My dear friends, I think I can detect looks of sympathy on the faces before me. I think I see mental resolutions to do your duty in the future.

"My feelings in the matter almost oblige me to announce that another collection will be taken up as a fitting close to the meeting, but prudence bids me not to overdo a good thing. In order to prevent a stampede in which numbers of you might be killed or injured, the collection will be dispensed with, but as you depart for your homes think the matter over seriously and earnestly.

"The Indian wants to be uplifted. He wants to leave behind him his wigwam, his tomahawk and his buckskin shirt. He waits for you. Refuse him your moral influence and he remains as he is; extend your hand and it won't take ten years before he will be eating with a fork and promoting trusts and syndicates for the benefit of mankind."

CHAPTER X.

Arrival at Angostura.

As Diaz fell dead on the deck the officers who were near made a rush at Arismendez, but interposing with our pistols we kept them at bay while he went to the break of the poop, and spoke to the crew.

"Captain Diaz was a traitor, he meant to surrender the ship to those two Spanish cruisers which, in an hour, will be within range. You know what the result would be; we should all have our throats cut. As the only means of saving the sloop and our lives I have put him to death. Captain Cautley, who is as brave as Captain Davis and, like him, an Englishman, will take command, and if we cannot give the cruisers the slip we shall engage them. Better die fighting than be killed in cold blood. Guerra a la muerta. Viva la Patria."

"Viva la Patria! Viva el General! Guerra a la muerta!" shouted the Zambos with a great shout.

"You see, gentlemen, the crew are with us," said Arismendez turning to the officers, "and any man of whatever rank who refuses to do his duty and obey his new captain will be treated as a mutineer. Now, your orders, Señor Capitan."

"Lower the Venezuelan flag and up with the British ensign," said Cautley. "Square the yards by the lifts. Up with the foretop-gallant sail and the fore-studding sails. Up with the helm. Pipe all hands and clear for action."

This order was received with a cheer. The Zambos scented battle.

The brig was now before the wind and heading almost due west. A few minutes afterwards the cruisers changed their course and followed in our wake. But they were still three or four miles away and we all watched keenly to see whether they gained on us, or we on them, a question on which depended all our lives; for a fight with the two would have only one result.

It was only when the bustle of making sail, clearing for action and the rest, had subsided, that I could think over the drama that had just been enacted. It seemed to me that if killing in cold blood can be justifiable, it was justifiable in this instance. Slaying Diaz was the only way of saving the lives of more than a hundred men. We could indeed, have tried to lay him by the heels, but the officers and some of the watch, not knowing our motive, might have taken his part and defeated our object. Moreover, in the presence of a danger so formidable and pressing half measures had been folly, and in my opinion Arismendez not merely showed great resolution and courage, but did the right thing at the right time. He did not inform us of his design lest we should demur to it, and as he only decided to act when it became evident that the two ships were Spanish cruisers, there was no time for argument and no room for hesitation. Necessity has no law, and this was a case of dire necessity. We had either to strike or die.

Moreover Diaz was a double-dyed traitor and richly deserved his fate. Among his papers was found evidence that he had been in regular communication with the commandant of Cumana.

The cruisers had changed their course and were in hot chase, but the brigantine, being an indifferent sailer, was falling behind. The sloop, however, was slowly but surely gaining ground, and it began to look as though she would overhaul us before dark.

"If she does I shall engage and try to cripple her before the brigantine can come to her help," said Cautley. "All I ask is half an hour, for if we don't do it in that time we shall not do it at all."

Before long the corvette, a bigger ship than the Libertad, opened on us with her bow-chasers, but as the first shots fell short and every shot checked her speed, this was to our advantage, though we were presently hit, splinters flew about in all directions, and two or three men were wounded.

When she came within range we opened fire with the two carronades which the skipper had mounted on the poop, hulling her repeatedly, yet failing to damage her rigging as he had hoped.

Meanwhile the brigantine was falling further and further behind.

"I have got the time I asked for," said Cautley, "but I shall hold on a bit longer. No use throwing away a chance."

Nearer and nearer came the corvette. Her decks were crowded with men, of whom she had probably twice as many as ourselves.

At the last moment, as it seemed, the Spaniard being within musket shot, Cautley luffed round, thereby bringing the Libertad athwart his bows, at the same time delivering a broadside that swept his decks, a compliment which the sloop promptly returned. After they had pounded away at each other for several minutes she ranged alongside and grappled, a manœuvre which Cautley was unable to prevent owing to the jamming of the Libertad's rudder. For with the brigantine rapidly approaching he had no wish either to board or be boarded. His game was to disable the corvette and get away.

But the Zambos yelled with delight, and, when the ships touched, fully two score of them, heedless of orders, leapt on the sloop's decks, at the very moment we were being boarded by as many Spaniards. We should have had more of them if the grapples had not given way and the vessels separated.

On which the action now ceased, for neither ship could now fire into the other without destroying some of her own people, and so hot a hand-to-hand fight was being waged in both that nobody had a mind for aught else.

The Zambos, as Davis had said, and as we knew, fought like fiends. They seemed positively to enjoy killing and being killed, and in the end all who boarded the sloop were killed. The Spaniards who boarded us shared the same fate. It was no more possible to save any of them than if the Zambos had been so many tigers, and only Cautley and myself made the attempt, at the risk of our lives.

While this was going on the brig and the brigantine had drifted further apart, and the carpenter having succeeded in repairing the Libertad's rudder the skipper put her again before the wind.

But instead of chasing us as we expected she put about.

"You see, gentlemen, the crew are with us," said Arismendez, turning to the officers.

"What has happened to her?" I asked Cautley.

"Badly hurt, I should say. By Jove! she is settling by the head. It looks as if she had got a shot between wind and water. Don't you see how high her stern is? The best thing that could have happened—for us. The brigantine will have too much to do rescuing the crew and saving the stores to trouble us, and our rigging is in such a state that I doubt whether we could outsail her, slow as she is, and the crew is so weakened that another engagement just now is not desirable; we might come off second best."

When we last saw the cruisers they were within hail of each other, the sloop low in the water and evidently sinking. So soon as night hid them from our view Cautley put the brig on the starboard tack, and at daybreak we were once more in a position to bear up for the Bocas, which we passed without seeing anything more formidable than a merchant ship, fishing boats and coasting craft. The Gulf of Sadness, a vast sheet of waveless water, discoloured with the débris brought down by the great river, looked as melancholy as its name.

Borne along by a gentle breeze we entered the Orinoco by the Great Mouth, and were presently in the main channel, which is nearly as broad as the Straits of Dover, but the navigable part for vessels of the Libertad's size being little more than a mile, the ascent of the stream is both dangerous and troublesome, and were it not that the wind blows almost constantly from the north-east it would be impossible to stem the current which runs at the rate of four miles an hour, and in the rainy season, at the rate of five or six miles an hour. When the wind was contrary for a time, owing to the windings of the river, warps were carried out and fastened to the trees along the banks, whereby the difficulty was surmounted and the fair wind recovered.

Just as the sloop entered the river a large schooner was observed lying at anchor, under the land on the side of Cape Barinas. After a long look at her the skipper pronounced her to be a Spaniard.

"At any rate she shows no colours, which is a bad sign. Going back is out of the question, if she tries to bar the way we must fight for it," he said, and gave orders to pipe all hands and clear the decks for action.

"What are you going to fight, Señor Capitan?" inquired the Indian pilot, whose eyes were better than our glasses.

"What an absurd question, Sanchez! Don't you see that Spanish schooner riding at anchor under the bank there?"

"That isn't a schooner, Señor Capitan," answered the Indian, laughing silently.

"What the dickens is it, then?" answered Cautley, evidently annoyed.

"Two pine trees sticking on a sand bank."

And so it proved, the stream had brought them down and set them up, but, as seen from a distance the resemblance to a two-masted ship was perfect, and deceived so sharp-sighted a seaman as the skipper.

When evening came we let go an anchor and sought repose. But the hissing of water-snakes, the splashing of alligators as they plunged into the turbid water, the howling of araguatoes, great red monkeys with terrific voices, and the attacks of myriads of mosquitoes, made night hideous and sleep impossible. We sat on deck smoking, but even fifty cigars and pipes, kept continually alight, failed to protect us from the hordes that thirsted for our blood, and, like Spaniards, gave no quarter.

Nothing so much struck me in South America as the profusion of animal life. Water, earth, air and woods, teem with it, to such an extent indeed, as often to render the lives of those "not to the manner born" a burden and a torment.

When she came within range we opened fire.

At sunrise we weighed and went on, and the further we went, the finer became the scenery. The meandering river was so wide, and islands were so numerous that it was like sailing through a long succession of beautiful lakes bounded by lofty mountains and wood crowned heights. The banks on both sides are covered with primeval forests of majestic trees, many of them hundreds of feet high and linked together by the bejuco, a gigantic creeping plant so thick as a ship's cable. For years after the trees decay they are kept in position by these great plants which bear a strong likeness to the huge water-snakes that lurk in the swamps beneath. Other parasitical plants are aglow with richly-hued flowers, festooned on the trees to which they cling, the whole, as seen from a ship's deck, looking like a panorama of gorgeous gardens.

Parrots, macaws, toucans and other birds of brilliant plumage complete the splendid picture and fill the air with their discordant cries, to which, at measured intervals, answers the metallic note of the bell bird, at one moment sounding close to the ear, at the next dying away in the distance. In the small creeks, over-arched with superb evergreens, you may see spoonbills, pelicans and gigantic cranes, all busily fishing, while hard by, in the main stream, a huge alligator floats among the bulky manatos and agile tomenos that are ever rising to the surface and blowing in shoals.

So, though our nights were wretched, our days were not unpleasant There was much to see, and the novelty and strangeness of it all kept us in a continual state of excitement and delight. Otherwise we should have found the voyage as tedious as it was slow, and we were not sorry when it came to an end, and the Libertad let go before Angostura.

The Orinoco is hereabouts so compressed between high rocky banks as to be little more than two miles in breadth, and so deep and turbulent withal that crossing it is often both difficult and dangerous.

Angostura, or more properly, San Tome, is built on the face of a rock which rises abruptly from the river to a fort on the summit of the hill, whence can be seen a great part of the provinces of Barcelona, Guyana and Cumana, with their vast forests and wide stretching savannahs, and in the near distance rich pastures thronged with cattle, and country houses embowered in plantations and groves. No site could well be more charming, and, as seen from the river, Angostura, with its white buildings, rising one above the other, gaily painted verandahs and steep streets, looks wonderfully bright and picturesque.

So soon as it became known that General Arismendez was on board the Libertad, we had visits from some of the leading personages of the place, who made much of him, as also of Cautley and myself when we were presented to them, which though pleasant enough in one way involved more kissing from moustached and garlic-perfumed lips than we quite liked. At least a dozen houses were placed at our disposal, with a flourish of fine phrases, of which only the Spanish language is capable, but knowing that these invitations were not meant to be accepted I thanked our new friends for their kindness in the effusive fashion of the country and said that we had arranged to take up our quarters at the posada.

Arismendez went to the governor's palace, and on the following day we were presented to several members of the government, when the general, after making his statement and calling upon Cautley and myself to corroborate it, produced the dispatches which Urdenetta had confided to Diaz, as also the document proving the latter's treachery.

"It was not necessary. We would have taken your word for it, General," said the secretary of state urbanely, "as I take it for all you have told it, and we are greatly indebted to you and these English gentlemen for saving the ship, and also for the other services which they have rendered the Republic. I shall now open the dispatches addressed to the government, the ones addressed to the Supreme Chief, who is with the army at the llanos (plains) of Apura, will be forwarded to him on the first opportunity.

"These charges are absurd on the face of them and unsupported by a single proof," he added after reading his dispatches. "All who know General Arismendez—and who does not?—know that he is too good a patriot to provoke a mutiny among his own troops. But I shall have to submit this dispatch to Congress, together with a report of my own, and any written statement which it may please his Excellency to make."

This was done, and in the result Congress not only acquitted Arismendez of the charges brought against him by Urdenetta, but gave him a vote of thanks and made him Vice-President of the Republic, so that by sending him to Angostura his adversary did him a good turn, the vice-presidency being of course an office of much greater dignity than the governorship of Margarita.

In the meantime Cautley and I were enjoying ourselves. The governor gave Arismendez a banquet at which we were present, as also at a ball given by another personage, and we received more invitations to dinners and dances than we were able to accept. Which was an agreeable change from the monotony of Margarita, and it was pleasant to be once more in a civilised community, though it was not the civilisation of Europe.

The street boys smoked big cigars, and wore nothing but straw hats, the Indian women, whom we sometimes met in our rides, dispensed even with hats, carrying under their arms only a short gown which they slipped on before entering the town, by order of the police, though not always, the rule being more honoured in the breach than the observance.

Digitized by Google

But everything comes to an end, even zest for enjoyment, and just as we were beginning to weary of our holiday and long for a more active life, we received a request to wait on the Vice-President at his official residence, whither we of course repaired at the appointed time.

"Well, señores, are you tired of dancing and feasting?" he asked, with a smile which was meant to be pleasant.

"Not tired, yet quite ready for something else," I said.

"A little fighting? If so, I think I can oblige you."

"If it's fighting I am at your Excellency's disposal," put in the skipper with characteristic promptitude.

"Good! I told my colleagues that we could always count on El Capitan. Well, you are to take command of a squadron of large flecheras with orders to cruise off the mouths of the Orinoco and in the Gulf of Paria."

"I thank your Excellency and accept the post with pleasure. When shall I sail?"

"So soon as the flecheras are ready. Probably in less than a week. The mission I have to propose to you, Major Wyvenhoe, is of another sort, perhaps even more dangerous. Yet though I should like you to undertake it, I do not press it upon you. Accept or reject it as you may deem best. It is taking important dispatches to the Supreme Chief, who, as you know, is in the field, which as yet we have had no opportunity of sending to him. Work for a courier or orderly, you will say. But several of our couriers have lately fallen into the hands of the Godos (Goths, i.e., Spaniards), and though their orders were to destroy their dispatches rather than let them be taken they have not done so, and the results in more than one instance have been disastrous. For the Spanish commanders not only spare the lives of couriers who are captured with dispatches, but let them go. Those who make away with their dispatches are themselves dispatched. Now when a man knows that by keeping a certain piece of paper he will save his life he generally ends——"

"By keeping the paper."

"Exactly."

"But how do the Spaniards know that any chance prisoner whom they take is a courier?"

"They don't; only if he has dispatches they reward him, and if he has not they kill him. So it comes to the same thing. Therefore we want to intrust these dispatches I have spoken of to somebody who is willing to take oath that in the event of his being in danger of capture he will destroy them; a man of honour who will die rather than break his word. Such a man as yourself, major. Moreover, by engaging in this enterprise you will make the acquaintance of Don Simon Bolivar, who, though I am not blind to his faults, is a remarkable man, and if you get through with these dispatches you will win his favour. You will also be able to tell him what happened at Margarita, and refute the charges made against us by Urdenetta. But do not decide hastily; take time for reflection. It will be a perilous undertaking; the country higher up the river swarms with Godos, not to speak of other dangers."

Arismendez put his proposal in such a way that I could not decline it without exposing myself to an imputation which I did not care to incur. Moreover, though I was not so quixotic as to court danger, I had never shrunk from an enterprise because it seemed perilous. Also I wanted to go to the front and see this wonderful Mr. Bolivar.

"I have decided already, Señor General, to take these dispatches to the Supreme Chief, or so far as the Goths and other enemies will let me," I answered.

"I thank you, señor, but I shall not take your answer now. Think over it, and if you are in the same mind to-morrow, do me the favour to breakfast with me here at eleven, and I will introduce you to your associate."

"I shall have a companion then?"

"Yes, two are better than one, they can help each other both in council and action, and Don Iago Santleo, a captain in our service, is a very gallant gentleman, whom I am sure you will like. Being anxious to join the army I have no doubt he will be glad to bear you company, and as he knows the country will serve both as comrade and guide."

"And I am sure from your account of him, a very desirable comrade. Your Excellency may expect me to breakfast."

And then, the business being concluded, we made our adieux.

"We could not go on fooling here much longer. All the same, I am very sorry," said the skipper, sadly.

"I know what you mean. We shall have to part. I, too, am very sorry. We have not known each other very long, though long enough to become good comrades and fast friends."

On the following morning I breakfasted with Arismendez, and met Señor Don Iago Santleo, my future comrade. I liked the gentleman so soon as I clapped eyes on him. Tall and stalwart he was, and well set up; in feature bold and handsome; in age, twenty-five or six; his jaws, like his shoulders, were square; his eyes blue; his hair tawny; his expression frank and manly, and he had a winning smile and a joyous laugh.

"You are still in the same mind?" demanded Arismendez.

"Yes, Señor, else had you not seen me here."

"Good! Don Iago, I am glad to say, has already agreed to be your companion, and I hope you will have good fortune and be good friends."

"Unless we are good friends we are not likely to have good fortune, Señor General," said Don Iago. "Without friendship there can be no union, and without union no strength; and for this expedition we shall need all our strength and all our wits."

"I think we shall be good friends," quoth I.

"We want you to do us a great favour, Senor Wyvenhoe," she said archly.

"So think I; nay, I am sure," said he, and so heartily withal that I was fain to think that the liking I had conceived for him he had conceived for me.

We learnt from Arismendez that as the dispatches were still to write, and would have to be written small so as to diminish bulk and facilitate concealment, we should not be able to set out for three or four days, whereupon, breakfast being over, we separated, the general to attend to his official duties, Don Iago and I to smoke in the verandah, where we had an agreeable talk, in the course of which, after telling him something about myself, I insinuated an inquiry as to what part of the country he might come from.

"The west," he answered, pointing in that direction.

Which I thought rather vague.

After answering some questions which he put about England, I remarked that he looked more like an Englishman than a South American.

"You flatter me," he answered, lightly laughing. "But if being born in the country and being descended from forefathers who settled in it more than two hundred years ago make one a Venezuelan, I am a Venezuelan. Are you going to Señora Calzada's dance to-morrow night? An old family hers—or rather her husband's, of pure Spanish blood, and belonging to the first order of colonial nobility, and, what is still better, she has two charming daughters, Pepita and Luisa."

"We have been invited, my friend and I, and we shall certainly go if only for the pleasure of meeting you and making the acquaintance of these two young ladies."

So Cautley and I went and were not disappointed in Pepita and Luisa, who were quite as charming as Señor Santleo had said—beautiful brunettes with great black eyes and raven hair, floating about the ball room in clouds of white muslin and as gracious as they were graceful. I danced with them several times, as also did Don Iago, and I rather thought that Luisa honoured him with her preference while Pepita favoured me. But about an hour before the party broke up both of them were hanging on his arm, talking to him so earnestly that I began to feel a little envious. Presently, however, Pepita, whose fan was only a degree less expressive than her eyes, beckoned me to them.

"We want you to do us a great favour, Señor Wyvenhoe," she said archly. "But first of all are you a Christian?"

"Of course I am a Christian, and as for the favour, you have only to name it; it was granted before it was asked."

"How good of you! I felt sure you would, as I told Luisa. We have a tiny nephew who came into the world only a few days ago. He is to be baptised the day after to-morrow, and we want you and Don Iago to be his godfathers. He and you have blue eyes and fair hair, and blue eyes are so beautiful and rare that we think they would bring the dear baby good luck. Don Iago has given his consent, and I cannot tell you how happy you have made us by giving yours."

Had I been given time to think and not already compromised myself, I should certainly have said no, but I was completely out-manœuvred, and I perceived too late that by saying I was a Christian I had owned to being a Catholic, the one, in Pepita's opinion, implying the other, and my Protestant principles were confounded by her great black eyes which glanced at me over the edge of her fan in a way that had we been en tête-à-tête would either have frightened me out of the room or made me forget Araminta's treachery.

All I could do or at any rate all I did, was to protest my delight at being able to oblige her.

"And you and Don Iago will be compadres," she went on. "Which as you and he are going on a dangerous expedition will be a great advantage, especially to you."

I thought she was laughing at me.

"But how will that be an advantage—on a dangerous expedition?" I asked.

"Oh, you don't know that in South America the tie between compadres" (co-sponsors to the same infant) "is considered as close as that between brothers. You and Don Iago will be sworn friends, pledged to help each other even at the peril of your fortune and your lives."

"We take each other for better or worse, as it were? A sort of marriage?"

"Almost," returned Pepita, blushing. "It is a bond nearly as sacred as that between husband and wife."

"By the way, do you know who he is and whence he comes?"

"No, on those points he is rather mysterious. When we ask him he sometimes says from the west, sometimes from the mountains. But that is nothing, he brought good introductions and we know that Don Iago Santleo is a true man and a noble caballero."

PETTINGILL'S HUNT.

JIM PETTINGILL, who is a stout man, went home to his wife the other evening and asked her where she kept the key of his Gladstone, as he wished to pack up a few things and take the night train for Glasgow to look after some important business matters.

Mrs. Pettingill told him to go upstairs in her room and he would find the key in the pocket of her black dress, which was hanging on a nail behind the door.

Poor, foolish mortal, he did not know that it was easier for the eye of a rich man to crawl through a camel than for his miserable self to find the pocket of his wife's dress.

Blinded by his own confidence, he took the dress off the nail, and that moment his sufferings commenced. He took a short survey of the garment as he held it up in his left hand in order to locate the position of the pocket.

His eyes rested on a small opening, and he thrust his hand into it, only to find his fingers gliding through a kind of bottomless concern, and then sticking his arm into it to the hilt he observed that his hand was protruding from an aperture on the other side. This caused him to change the position of the dress, and he saw another opening, and sounded its depths, and ascertained that it was the same mysterious hole he had been in a moment before.

This slightly annoyed him, and, after throwing off his coat, he went again in search of the pocket. He saw a little slit on the right side, and a softer light came into his eyes. "This is it," he murmured, and, putting his head into the shallow flounce, commenced to grope for the key, which, however, was sleeping snugly in the pocket at least two feet away. Pettingill got angry. He determined to find the pocket or die with his face to the foe, and the next minute he commenced stabbing the dress with both hands, hitting it straight blows from the shoulder, and dancing round it, just as if he were engaged in a rough-and tumble fight.

He glanced at the clock, and saw that the train would start in forty minutes, and once more he jumped for the dress with a low yell that indicated plainly that he was angry enough to match himself against a hornet. He jammed his head into the folds of the dress, and commenced digging with both hands, and the air got full of satin bows, pieces of Watteau pleats and smothered growls.

While seated in a chair resting himself, he glared at the crumpled dress lying on the floor, and the idea occurred to him that the only way to keep the pocket from dodging him was to put the dress on. He did so, and then renewed the search, but his hand would slide into loops, furbelows, folds, flounces, and everything else except the much desired pocket.

This was more than he could stand, and he determined to take off the dress and tear it to pieces, and thus discover the dwelling-place of the pocket. He pulled the dress up over his head as if he were divesting himself of a shirt, and it got caught in his braces, and wrapped itself round his neck in a peculiar way, and he stooped forward and tugged at it with all his strength, but it would not give an inch, and appeared to tighten its grip round his head.

It was hot, and he was smothering in its folds, and, in order to release himself, he beat the air with both hands and danced up and down in one spot until the window-panes rattled.

The dress, however, knew that it was getting the best of him, and would not let him go, and then Pettingill, in his rage, made a blind dash and butted the basin and jug off the washstand and upset the rocking-chair, which prodded him severely in the ribs. The next dive he made the dressing-table suffer, and cologne bottles and powder boxes, mingling with a tin bath-tub and a bird-cage, rolled over the floor.

Mrs. Pettingill heard the crash, and hastening upstairs, discovered her husband lying on the floor on his back, with his arms and head bound up in her dress, and kicking both his legs in the air and using profanity to the tune of 140 degrees in the shade.

She pulled him out of the dress, and he sat up on the floor and gazed at her in a dazed way, and rubbed his ribs with one hand, and wiped the blood off his nose with the other.

There was a look in his eyes which told Mrs. Pettingill that it was not the time to talk to her husband, so she merely picked up the dress, and without any trouble at all stuck her hand in a certain place and took out the key, which she handed him without saying a word. It was too late to catch the train, so Pettingill quietly bathed his bruised head and then went to a locksmith's, and when he came home he brought his key with him, and it was chained to a bar of pig-iron. SHORT STORIES ABOUT THE SEASIDE.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Lost Provinces," by Louis Tracy, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. Robert Allan, of 14 Marylands Road, Malda Vale, W. Attempts for this week's prize must deal with Stories about POLICEMEN, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, September 3rd. What Have They Done with It?

A LITTLE girl made a really nice remark the other day.

It appears that on a previous visit to the seaside for an hour or two, the tide was right up, and she enjoyed the sight.

On this particular day she had just arrived with an excursion, and the tide was out as far as Southend can shove it.

The wee mite stood and gazed upon the mile of mud, and then, remembering the previous amount of water, asked of her teacher:

"What have they done with it? Does it belong to the East London Waterworks?"

Bless her heart, she thought it had been cut off.

A Bit Awkward.

WHILST spending her August holidays this year at Scarborough, a young lady made her way to the cliffs to enjoy her copy of Short Stories, and, on her arrival there, found a young gentleman sitting at the end of a seat reading. This being the only seat available, she was obliged to take her place with the young gentleman, but sitting at the other end.

Shortly afterwards an elderly couple came along, and, after staring at the pair, the old lady exclaimed in a very audible tone to the man who was with her:

"Dear, dear John, another tiff. What a pity young folks can't agree."

In Bonnie Scotland.

ARRAN is crowded at present, and among those who are making themselves happy are several theatrical celebrities.

To make their friends sweltering in the cities jealous they have been sending telegrams right and left.

To one man a wire was written:

"Having devilled curry here. Come and join us."

They reckoned without the lady in the post-office, however. She declared she was not allowed to send swearing telegrams.

"Ye mauna swear in a telegram, my man," she said. "It's against a' regulations."

It took the man and his friends two hours to convince the lady that she was safe in sending the wire, and then the actors debated whether the game had been worth the candle.

Maritime Etiquette.

EXCITED LADY (on the beach): "Why isn't something done for that ship in distress? Why don't some of you——"

Coastguard (hurriedly): "We are doing all we can, madam, and have sent the crew a line to come ashore."

Excited Lady (to her companion): "Good gracious, Matilda, just fancy, the silly fellows were actually waiting for a formal invitation."

Poor Fellow!

A CELEBRATED Parisian dandy was ordered by his physicians to follow a course of sea bathing at Dieppe.

On his arrival at that delightful bathing town he ordered a machine and attendant, and went boldly into the water.

He plunged in bravely, but an instant after came up puffing and blowing.

"Francis," said he, "the sea smells detestably; it will poison me! Throw a little eau-de-Cologne into the water, or I shall be suffocated!"

Not the Drains.

A MEDICAL friend has just returned from a visit to a growing watering place on the Welsh coast. Inspecting some lodgings in a new quarter of the town he noticed a peculiar smell, and called the landlady's attention to it.

"Something must be wrong with the drains, Mrs. Davis."

"Oh, no, sir," was the reply; "it can't be the drains. There are none!"

He took his family to the old quarter.

What She Thought Of.

I WAS walking along the beach at Southsea, admiring the last of the glorious sunset, when I became aware of the presence of a pair of lovers of the Cockney type, admiring also.

"Just look at it, Liza," said he. "It makes yer feel sort of dunno how, somehow, don't it?"

"Yes, ain't it lovely!" said Liza, dreamily.

I listened eagerly. This young lady might have a poetic soul—who knew?

"Don't it make yer think of a nice slice of streaky bacon?"

I left!

That Moss.

Edwin took Angelina to the seaside last month, and she prevailed upon him to spend an afternoon in fishing from a boat.

They had not been out long when she picked up a tin and removed the lid.

"What lovely moss!" she cried; then there was a shriek, the boat heeled over, and its occupants were thrown into the cruel sea.

After a desperate struggle, Edwin succeeded in rescuing his adored one from a watery grave.

For days she lay unconscious, and when at length she opened her eyes it was to find Edwin bending over her in tender solicitude.

Her face hardened, and Algernon groaned in spirit.

"Have you no word for the one who risked his life for your sake, my own?" he cried in bitter anguish.

"Begone, monster!" she replied, with an imperious wave of the hand. "Why didn't you tell me it was the worm-tin?"

All Bets Off.

They were both enthusiastic anglers, and were staying at the seaside together.

They proposed to have a fishing match; the one who caught the most fish was to receive a sovereign.

All went well for a time, till one of them, thinking he had got a bite, leaned too far forward and fell in, and, to add to the irony of it, heard his opponent call out:

"All bets off. You're diving in after 'em!"

Parrot Wit.

A seaside parrot show was held a short time ago, and each parrot was brought into the room in a covered cage, and a prize given for the parrot which showed the smartest wit when it was uncovered.

The owners uncovered the cages in rotation, and many were the witty remarks which were spoken by the parrots.

But the climax was reached and the spectators satisfied when one parrot hopped on its perch, and looking wisely round the room, exclaimed:

"What a beastly lot of parrots."

Needless to say it took the prize.

Cowed.

Just outside Rhyl a man was driving some cows bolted from one farm to another, and one of the cows and climbed a bank.

Against this bank, and built with a sloping roof below it, is a blacksmith's shop.

At the moment that the cow got on the bank a Conservative politician was in the shop haranguing the blacksmith, a Radical, on what he was pleased to term "Radical lies and false promises."

"You returned a Radical for the county," said the Tory, "and now where's your cow and three acres? I suppose you expected them to fall through the roof!"

At that moment there was a crash, and through the roof there fell at the feet of the Tory disbeliever a real live cow. The politician gave a wild yell of terror and fled.

A Very Good Guess.

A mother was assisting her little boy to master a geography lesson, and coming to the description of a desert she quoted a definition from the text book to the effect that it was a barren tract.

The little fellow repeated the phrase after her, but didn't seem to understand the meaning of the words. She then endeavoured to simplify the description by defining it as a "place where nothing would grow."

The boy's face brightened with the light of awakened intelligence, and the mother, proud and expectant, put the question.

"Now, Johnny, what is a desert?"

"Pa's bald head," was the prompt response.

The Bull's Mother-in-Law.

Betty was milking the cow, and a mad bull was coming down the meadow to look for someone to assassinate. Still Betty milked on placidly.

An observer from a safe position saw, to his great astonishment, that the bull, when he got within a few yards of maid and cow, pulled up suddenly, and went off to assassinate someone else.

"Weren't you afraid?" the observer tremblingly asked Betty.

"Nae a bit," she replied, going on milking. "This cow's his mother-in-law."

WE are taught that Mary Tudor—her love of pyrotechnics having been satiated with various displays at Smithfield and elsewhere—expired, assuring all and sundry that the word "Calais" would be found engraven on her soft and tender heart. Though I do not for a moment infer that an autopsy would reveal anything out of the ordinary that could by the greatest stretch of imagination appear to have anything to do with the experience I am about to relate; still that terrible experience is so indelibly impressed upon my memory that, had I had the questionable privilege of existing in the sixteenth century, I have little doubt but that I should have gone down to my grave with the firm conviction that every fact in connection therewith would have been found set forth in the convolutions of my brain.

Ten years have elapsed since that awful night; yet my memory is as clear upon every detail as though what I have to narrate had happened only yesterday. Indeed I am often incensed against myself for my unconquerable terror whenever I recall what I suffered, and even now I cannot undertake a long night journey by train without dread and apprehension.

It was a week or so before Christmas in the year—well, in the early eighties, when I, a young and struggling provincial actor, was hurrying home to London, if not exactly on the wings of love, at all events in a state of high anxiety and excitement—which indeed is hardly to be wondered at, seeing that my young wife was not only anxiously awaiting my return, but was about to celebrate the event by presenting me with a token of peace and goodwill in the shape of a little son—or daughter. I had even refused a lucrative pantomime engagement in order to be with her, a sacrifice only an actor—and as I have said a young and struggling one at that—can fully appreciate; but the advent of the first-born not being an everyday occurrence, I felt justified in the course I was taking.

In a state of pleasurable agitation, now wholly unmixed with a sort of sense of paternal importance about to be thrust on me—a feeling that only exists, I may say, before the event; for never is a man compelled to take a back seat, or to realise his own unimportance more forcibly than on these interesting occasions—I started on my journey to town.

The company to which I had been attached finished up the tour at York, where I determined to avail myself of the earliest possible train for London; this was the Scotch Express, at half-past one in the morning.

It enabled me to attend a breaking-up supper given by some half-dozen or so of us who had become on friendly terms during the time we had been thrown together; so that with many mutual good wishes and in the best of spirits we parted very shortly after one o'clock, leaving me ample time to get down to the station.

The weather was so tempestuous that I would not hear of any of "the boys" coming to see me off. The thermometer stood at many degrees below freezing-point. The wind, blowing a gale, cut like a razor; while intermittent gusts of fine, powdery snow, completely blinded me from time to time as I struggled on my way.

This fierceness of weather rather pleased me than otherwise, as, fortified by an excellent meal, with the good wishes of my comrades ringing in my ears, with my heart beating rapidly and happily with the knowledge that in a few hours I should be with my best-beloved, I hurried to the station.

Heavens! Had I but known what was in store for me, how gladly I would have turned back; but it was not to be! Ere the journey to which I had so long looked forward was ended, I was to undergo an experience the like of which I would not wish my greatest foe to suffer.

Arrived at the railway-station my first care was to find an obliging porter whom I asked to secure me a corner-seat in a smoking- carriage when the mail-train should come in. This he promised to do, if possible, though he assured me that the trains generally were very full. But he "would do his best."

In spite of the storm, within five minutes of the advertised time, the mail steamed majestically into the station; the giant engine breathing hard and snorting contempt for the elements against which it had so successfully battled. I kept a wary eye on my porter who speedily shouted to me:

"Here y'are, sir. Third Smoking. A gemman's gettin' out here."

To bundle me in, together with my wraps and bags, was but the work of a moment. With a "good-night, sir," and a "thank you, very much" at the substantial tip the fulness of my heart had accorded him, he slammed the door and left me.

In less than four hours that porter's life would not have been worth a moment's purchase, could I have laid hands upon him.

On taking my seat and looking round the carriage, I observed that I should have two companions on my run up to King's Cross. One, a woman who was lying down at full length, asleep, carefully covered with voluminous rugs and wrappers; indeed I could only tell her sex by the sight of a long, golden curl which struggled out between the wraps and fell over her shoulder. The other, a man, a foreigner who was busily engaged in an animated conversation with the person who had just got out. They spoke in French and, as is usual with foreigners, in a very high tone, so that I could not help hearing scraps of their talk.

I afterwards had occasion to recall—only too vividly—every word that I heard pass between them. I remember how the light of the lamp fell upon the red-haired, pale, ferret-faced little man, leaning in at the window of the carriage, as he said (I translate as nearly as possible, for they both spoke the argot of the Quartier Latin):

"You've made a rippin' good job of it this time. It ought to be worth a pile of money to you. I only hope you won't be found out." To which the other answered:

"No fear! I'm much too fly."

"Oh, don't be too sure. Mum's the word—mind that."

"Well, you can rely on me, and she"—pointing to the recumbent form of the woman—"won't blow the gaff."

They both burst into a roar of coarse, brutal laughter, and at that moment the train started.

After carefully shutting the window, lighting my pipe and wrapping my rugs round me, I curled myself up in the corner opposite the Frenchman and tried to read. But try as I would, I could not refrain from glancing from time to time at my companion, who sat with folded arms, slowly chewing a big black cigar.

Under ordinary circumstances I am not apt to indulge in senseless antipathies; but this man aroused unconsciously within me a feeling which was a mixture of insecurity (I could hardly call it fear) and disgust. His very appearance was repellent.

Frenchmen always seem to me to be divided into two classes, the dwarfs and the giants, the piou-piou and the cent gardes. As the man we had left behind at York was a miserable specimen of humanity, so this man in front of me was a Hercules. I can see him now, his great bullet-head with its thick black hair sticking up like the bristles of a brush, his beady, shifting eyes, his cruel, thin mouth that slithered across his face, and his great bull-neck, blue with a dirty growth of beard, his shirt open at the collar and half-way down to his great, hairy chest.

I don't know why, but I remember thinking at the time that if ever he had an interview with Monsieur de Paris in the early morning, the window out of which we look into the other world, as Victor Hugo called it, would have to be enlarged for his accommodation. He wore a very tall, black, silk hat, which he never took off, and a long coat, trimmed and lined with fur, which had probably been new five-and-twenty years ago.

Yet, in spite of all this, I felt a desire to talk to him. He fascinated me in some mysterious manner, and at length I burst out with the original remark "that it was very cold." He glared at me from under his shaggy eyebrows, took the chewed black cigar from between his lips, and said slowly:

"I not speak Eenglish—mooch."

Now although I flatter myself that I can speak French fairly well, this man showed so unmistakably that he had no wish to enter into conversation that I could only gasp out a stupid "Oh!" and relapse into silence. I would not venture to tackle him in his own language.

Once more I tried to concentrate my thoughts on my books and papers, but at length had to give it up as a bad job. So I shut my eyes in an endeavour to get an hour's quiet doze before reaching Peterboro'.

However, sleep was not to be wooed. The thought of seeing Mary in a few hours, the excitement of saying good-bye to so many friends, a thousand and one waking thoughts, kept flashing through my brain, rendering the slightest approach to somnolence impossible. Most of all did I keep conjecturing who and what this strange couple could be. I wondered whether the sleeping figure was that of a woman or a girl. She looked very slight and small. Was she beautiful or the reverse? I wondered in what relationship he and she stood to one another.

As I furtively looked again at him—he was now diving into the capacious pockets of his paletot—without knowing what that relationship was, I felt a feeling of pity for her.

The man, having captured a large paper parcel as a result of the fishing expedition in his pockets, proceeded to open it. He was going to eat. He placed the paper across his knees, took a knife out of his breast-pocket and slowly opened it.

I gasped!

It was the most murderous weapon I had ever set eyes on. The blade, tapering to a fine point, was between six and seven inches long, and the handle was made of some curious green stone. As he clicked the spring, I felt an involuntary shudder run down my spine.

He ate as though he had not tasted food for days. His light refreshment consisted of half a large fowl, a long loaf, a Spanish onion, and a large piece of cheese. As I saw that deadly knife flash from one article to another, I shut my eyes and seemed to see a hideous ogre of my nursery tales feeding off little children. For a good half-hour he ravened over his food.

When he had left nothing but a few bones he wiped the knife, dried it on his coat, shut it carefully and put it in his pocket. I must own I felt relieved.

Then he fished once more, this time catching a bottle of claret, of which the cork had been previously drawn and replaced. I noticed this, as the lining of his pocket was wet. He threw back his head and let the wine gurgle down that terrible black throat till his thirst was quenched.

Then he returned the bottle to his pocket, lighted another black cigar and lay back in his corner, panting with exertion. I wondered what the poor girl was to have. Surely, his pockets could contain no more provender—and he had no other luggage.

Meanwhile I was feeling half-perished with the cold, and was thankful when we arrived at Peterboro'. Here, although we were behind time, I determined to get something to warm me or die in the attempt.

No sooner had the train come to a standstill than I made a dash for the refreshment-room, where I had just succeeded in getting down a cup of coffee strongly laced with brandy, when the stentorian "Any more for London?" was shouted out.

I had hardly time to find my compartment and clamber in when the door was shut and locked. I suddenly realized that the Frenchman was not there and I called out to a porter that someone else was coming in.

"Very sorry, sir. Can't help it. We're very late already."

Ere I could well grasp the situation we were off with a roar and a rattle, trying hard to make up for lost time.

"By Jove," I thought to myself, "here's a pretty predicament—and no mistake. Here I am alone in a carriage with a woman I have never seen and who has never seen me. Her companion has disappeared, and I shall have to explain matters. We are locked in, and the train does not stop for an hour and three-quarters, that is until we reach King's Cross. She's been asleep since half-past one and will probably wake up shortly and then—" I dreaded to think what would happen. Should I wake her at once? No, "let sleeping dogs lie" is an excellent maxim. What would she do on arrival? Perhaps the ferocious Frenchman had got into another carriage. I hoped so sincerely. What a brute he was not to give her anything to eat or drink on such a night as this!

At all events he had some feeling, for he had taken off his heavy fur-coat and thrown it over her, completely covering her head. I wondered she wasn't suffocated. Well, I would keep wide awake, anyhow.

Curiously enough, as I had not been able to woo sleep hitherto, I now felt unaccountably drowsy. Perhaps it was the brandy. At any rate I soon fell into a deep but terribly troubled slumber. I had the most frightful dreams, blood-curdling and horrible, yet nothing like so horrible as the reality which was in store for me.

I awoke with a sudden start and, dazed for the moment, hardly knew where I was. Ah, yes, of course. I recollected. There was the mysterious woman still asleep.

I shivered with the cold. I took a little nip from my flask and looked at my watch. A quarter past five. I had slept for an hour. Thirty minutes more and we should be in London. In an hour I should be home. Home with Mary. Hurry on train; hurry on minutes she will be waiting for me.

It was still snowing fast and the wind shrieked at the windows as we rattled along. Whirr—whirr—whirr—bump—bumpety—bump. We were making up for lost time with a vengeance.

Heavens how that woman slept! She would hardly be able to move for cold and cramp on awaking. And how still she was! She had not altered her position for hours past!

I sat and watched her; and as I did so, my eyes became riveted on a dark spot on the floor about as large as a cheese-plate. It glistened from time to time in the fitful light of the lamp. Watching it intently, I saw that it was wet.

I went nearer, impelled by some unknown power. I saw it was growing bigger, as it was added to by drop after drop that fell and trickled and splashed from the seat on which she lay.

Was I dreaming? No. Like a flash of lightning the whole horror of my awful situation seized upon me. My body stiffened with fear, and I gave one inarticulate, impotent yell of agony. The woman was not sleeping—she was dead! Dead—murdered by the ruffian who, in escaping, had left me to face the hideous and inevitable discovery!

Now I understood the two men's horrible conversation. Merciful Heavens—they had laughed—"she could not blow the gaff." No, poor soul, poor soul, she was silent for ever! But, stay, perhaps after all she is not dead, but only wounded. I must see.

I pulled away the heavy coat that covered her. As I did so, one of the collar-hooks must have become entangled in her beautiful hair; for, ere I knew what had happened, the head had fallen with a dull thud on to the floor of the carriage, face downwards, the long golden curls all dabbled in that horrible pool of blood.

Then a frenzy of agonised despair fell upon me. I beat at the walls of the compartment. I shrieked. I tore open the window and seized the connecting-cord to stop the train. It was frozen as hard as a bar of steel. In vain I pulled at it; and when I desisted at last I wildly beat my hands upon my forehead. I found myself covered with blood from great gashes the icy cord had cut into my palms.

Think, if you can, of the agony of those minutes that never seemed to pass! What would happen to my poor wife? It would kill her. I recalled Lefroy and Muller and their awful ends. I wept—I prayed—I cursed—and then, I think, I must have lost consciousness.

When I recovered we were nearing London. Long before the train had come to a standstill at the ticket platform I had a dozen porters running after the carriage, attracted by my piteous shrieks and cries of despair.

As I struggled to alight, bleeding and haggard, I was seized by a couple of officials who demanded an explanation. I could only point to the carriage and mumble:

"Murder—there—murder."

The police were hurriedly called; but, before they could arrive, who should come tearing along the platform but the Frenchman himself.

"Seize him," I cried, "he's the man, he's the murderer."

He dashed at the carriage like an infuriated madman and came out, bearing under one arm the body of his victim, and in his hand—oh, to think of it!—the poor creature's head. A yell of execration burst from every one; but at that moment the guard of the train came up.

"Here, what's the row?" he said.

"Murder!" shouted a dozen voices.

"Murder be blowed. Why, this 'ere cove got in at Glasgow, and mighty partickler he was about his hautomaton as he called her; would 'ave a compartment to hisself. He's a French cove from the music 'alls."

The Frenchman bowed to me and said:

"Monsieur, I am truly sorry. This is my new invention—L'Arcana Mysterieux. The lady walks and talks, and then I cut off her head, and—always like a woman—she still converses. It is a novelty. I shall make my fortune. Alas! that the claret has fallen on her beautiful hair. But no matter, it will wash off. Monsieur, adieu."

And he got into a cab.

I fainted.

THE TOWER CLOCK OF ROZSNO.

THE following incidents are set forth in an old chronicle of "Village Life in Hungary":

It is related how one day the beautiful Elizabeth Grünblatt returned, without warning, to Janos Gothard, her betrothed, his ring. Now it can readily be imagined how like lightning the news of this event spread around the town of Rozsno, and what a dust it raised.

And why not? Was not Janos Gothard son of May or Gothard, whose bears and forbears had always formed a powerful dynasty in their native village? Nor was a girl like Elizabeth Grünblatt to be picked up on every rubbish heap. She, too, came of a fine old stock, whose offshoots had frequently graced the judicial bench; nay, were old Joseph Grünblatt still alive—but that was neither here nor there. Even if young Janos Gothard were a personage with whom it was best to take liberties, surely a betrothal ring is not a fit object for such a pastime.

Hence great was the excitement. The people assembled in eager groups in the squares and streets, and discussed the probable outcome of the affair; general opinion leaning to the belief that the Gothard family would not accept the rebuff in silence.

Then broke in upon their disturbed minds this second wonderful event, which also spread like wildfire; the tower clock had stopped that morning at precisely the hour and the minute at which Elizabeth Grünblatt had drawn the ring from her finger!

It was exactly as though Providence had directly interposed to arrest the hands, and intended to hold them captive until the full truth of the matter should come out.

Now this tower clock had always been as great a source of pride to the Rozsnoites as the fair fame of their women, and here, at one blow of fate, was all over with both!

They had good reason, too, for their pride, particularly in the clock, for it was truly a marvel of its kind, so much so that the famous Albertus Turibius had journeyed away from Switzerland, the preceding year, expressly to study its mechanism.

The wardens had not been at all inclined to permit this profanation, but old Senator Komives gave utterance to this remark:

"Let us not close our ears to the man's request, since we can be perfectly assured that the wonders of our clock will find no room in his head!"

And such was really the case.

A whole week long he rummaged and poked and pounded about among its mighty wheels and hammers, its innumerable little rods and triggers, with the result that Saturday evening, when he had done, he knew precisely as much as he did Monday morning when he began.

There was but one man alive who understood the mechanism of the Kozsno clock, and that was Martin Szontágh, its maker, and he was dumb. But he could never, in any case, have been induced to reveal its secrets, since it was positively the only one of its kind in existence.

In the records of that day it is repeatedly set forth that, in all cases of dispute, where the knowledge of time was a necessity, the law decreed that that of the Rozsno clock should be accepted as the standard.

The remarkable feature of this clock was the separating, at noon and at midnight, of its face into two parts, allowing a cock to come forth, amid an insane din of hammers, wheels and springs, simulating the while a cry, like the crowing of a cock, which rang out over the silent roofs and into the busy movement of the streets this warning:

"Lutherans, look to yourselves!"

Now, all at once, the mighty thing was stilled. It was exactly as though it were making the mute declaration:

"I move not again by the breadth of a hair. Mornings can dawn and evenings fall for all me; I remain as I am so sure as God sees me. I have also shut the cock up away from you for evermore!"

Now is it really worth while, I ask you, to endure all this on account of a woman? To the Rozsnoites it was an indubitable fact that the stopping of the clock had directly to do with the whims of a capricious girl, else why could it not have stopped yesterday, or Elizabeth sent back the ring to-morrow?

To all overtures looking toward a reconciliation the obst nate girl's only reply was:

"I would rather marry the devil than Janos Gothard!"

"Very well," flared up the affronted one, "I can't hand you over to the devil, but I'll do worse!" and he carried the matter into court.

The learned Paul Szakmáry was chosen as Gothard's counsel, Stephen Miskalczi that of Elizabeth. From now on these two honourable gentlemen shunted all the opprobrium of the affair off on to their own shoulders.

For three full weeks they hurled every possible epithet at each other through the medium of their clerks (that being the first stage of the suit); then, when their mutual wrath had reached the required p tch, they opened out upon each other with the usual charges and counter-charges.

Seven ecclesiastical gentlemen of the vicinity were selected as jury. They presented exactly the appearance, in their black robes, with the long white bands hanging down from around their necks, of seven bottles of medicine.

Pale and agitated appeared the ex-fiancé before the august body; proud and defiant Elizabeth Grünblatt. Heavens, how beautiful she was! Her snow-white gown clung tightly to her perfect form—it had been destined to be her bridal-gown, perhaps—and three roses glowed in her chestnut hair, all three blood-red, the colour of love and inextinguishable hate! And what the roses failed to express was given utterance to by those two stars, her eyes:

"No, I will never relent—never, never!"

In vain plaintiff and defendant were made to confront each other. The representatives of justice even took Elizabeth to one side and personally remonstrated with her; but to all she only shook her lovely head, "No!"

"Damnation will o'ertake thee, girl!" warned the foreman, George Fabriczy.

"Thou wilt be boiled in a kettle in the next world!" threatened Paul Szontágh, the scribe, who, in his mind's eye, could already see the seething cauldron into which the radiant young woman was to be plunged.

Verily, the Church deputes overfascinating tasks to her servant, the devil!

But through all the maiden remained steadfast, giving the honourable counsel thereby opportunity for much vigorous debate. At last the parties to the suit were conducted from the room and the jury left to its deliberations.

"I propose to the reverend body," opened the foreman, George Fabriczy, "that we declare the maiden guilty and sentence her as follows: For the period of seven years she shall not marry, neither shall she during that time indulge in any form of worldly diversion whatever."

"Let us put it to the the vote," said another. "'Yea' and 'nay'; 'nay' signifies acquittal."

Paul Szontágh called off the names, and inscribed after each the response.

"Peter Salitius?"

"Yea."

"Samuel Urszinyi?"

"Nay."

"Charles Vitoris?"

"Nay."

At this point Miskolczi hurriedly scribbled a few words on a scrap of paper which he passed over to Paul Szontágh.

The scribe, however, took no notice, but went on uninterruptedly down the list:

"Paul Bistriczky?"

"Yea."

"Constantin Revencsan?"

"Nay."

So far two "yeas" and three "nays." There were now only lacking the voices of Szontágh and the foreman. Paul Miskolczi strove, by every means in his power, to get Szontágh to read the writing on the bit of paper which he was now crumpling carelessly in his hand; but, all unheeding, he uttered, like the foreman, a "yea" in his turn. Thus was pronounced that hard decree which has been brought down by chroniclers to this very day.

Now, at last, Paul Szontágh opened the paper and read what was written upon it; word for word it ran thus:

"Elizabeth Grünblatt sent Janos Gothard back his ring because it is your reverence she loves!"

The world seemed to whirl in a circle round Paul, his blood surged and his eyes danced. The most beautiful and best-born girl in upper Hungary in love with him! How different her conduct appeared to him now! How had he ever brought himself to utter that "yea"?

"And now, Brother Szontágh, be pleased to take down the verdict."

The scribe seized the pen with a hand that trembled, and it was only by the strongest effort of will that he was enabled to write at the foreman's dictation.

"The parties may re-enter!" announced George Fabriczy.

When in the room Elizabeth and Janos remained standing by the door with averted faces. In a choking voice the young clergyman read to them the decree which ran as follows:

"That the sacredness of the holy institution of matrimony be preserved, and to ward from us the wrath to come, we do hereby ordain that the girl, who has held these both in so light case, shall, for the period of seven years, remain unmarried; she shall also, in that time, strictly abjure each and every form of worldly amusement."

Most cruelly was this conceived. Elizabeth was just three-and-twenty, add to that seven years during which she was not to lay the virgin's wreath from her beautiful dark head, and we obtain as a result, thirty, and—a full-fledged old maid! The reverend gentleman had reckoned out with extreme nicety the exact way to make of the radiant blossom a sapless stalk.

Janos Gothard announced himself as satisfied, and Elizabeth left the room, with downcast eyes, without a word.

The very next day Paul Szontágh and Miskolczi began to set on foot the most earnest measures to obtain a reversal of the ecclesiastical decision. They even finally reached with their petition, the very steps of the throne itself, but all in vain. The affair remained precisely where it was.

They had at last relinquished all hope when one day it came to pass that, on meeting old Martin Szontágh in the street, Janos Gothard, Sr., not only did not return his greeting, but pointedly turned away his head.

Now old Szontágh had the reputation of being a man who held himself in very high esteem. He was the maker of the famous clock, had been decorated by royal hands for the same, and this averting of a Gothard head he took extremely ill. Upon arriving home he wrote upon his tablets and handed them to his son:

"Have you any quarrel with the Gothards?"

The young man then related to him the whole story. How beautiful Elizabeth Grünblatt had been tried and condemned, and how he, himself, was now consumed with love for her.

"Why haven't you said a word to me about this?" wrote back the father.

His son smiled sadly. What can a dumb man accomplish where agile tongues have failed? But the old man only shook his grey head again and again, and began hammering and snipping away angrily with his tools, for he had recently set to work with great zeal at repairing the disturbed mechanism of the tower clock.

Easter Sunday was drawing near, and on that glorious morning he had promised the clock should resume its wonderful career. It would be superb, would it not, on the day of our Lord's resurrection, to see the cock appear again between his open doors and hearering out, as loud and shrill as ever, his admonishing cry?

The old man spent the last days before Easter shut up in the tower itself. Finally all was in readiness. Exactly at noon on Easter Sunday, in the midst of the hurrahs of a multitude gathered from miles around, the works of the far-famed Rozsno clock were set in motion.

The jubilation was great, but alas, of short duration. The clock went, but at what a consternating rate of speed! The hour hand galloped round the face twelve hours in one, the minute hand flew from figure to figure in the dizziest leaps and springs, while, instead of appearing once every half-day, as had been his custom, the cock struck open his doors every sixty minutes and trumpeted forth in a more terrific voice than ever:

"Lutherans, look to yourselves!"

"Woe, woe is upon us!" cried the people, beside themselves with fear. The three oldest senators betook themselves, panting, to Martin Szontágh.

"Disaster, master, disaster!" they cried. "Our clock is mad!"

A cunning smile played over Martin's grey, old face. He sized his tablets.

"The clock is but doing its duty, gentlemen. You all admit that the time it sets must, in every case, be accepted by Rozsnoites as the standard?"

"Yes, yes; that is true," affirmed the senators.

The old man pursued:

"You have condemned the girl my son would take to wife to a seven years' penance——"

"H-m-m!" growled Emerick Komives, a light breaking in upon him.

"I have, therefore, so adjusted the clock that it shall tell off those seven years in seven months!"

"But—but you will set it right?"

"When my purpose is achieved."

The deputation strolled, crestfallen home.

In an hour, I should say twelve, the reason for the clock's unaccountable performance had spread throughout the town.

The chief magistrate took counsel with his aids.

"The clock will bring disgrace upon us!"

"In just so much as it was formally our pride, will it now work our confusion!"

"Let us give in!"

Again the senators betook themselves to Martin.

"Elizabeth Grünblatt's time of penance shall be measured according to the clock's present rate of speed; but, in Heaven's name, let it, in future, run as be eems it and us!"

Thus it was that, at the very next grape-pressing, Elizabeth Grünblatt became Mrs. Paul Szontágh.

KOLOMAN MIKSZATH.

20 £10 NOTES GOING BEGGING.

YOU CAN HAVE ONE FOR ASKING!

THE MOST ASTOUNDING SCHEME EVER DEVISED BY ANY PAPER.

THE latest scheme of PEARSON'S WEEKLY is unquestionably one of the most astounding that has yet been placed before the readers of any paper. Briefly speaking, the Editor places you in the position of getting ten pounds by simply asking for it.

At six o'clock on Thursday evening, August 23rd, twenty men left Pearson's Buildings, each with a sealed envelope in his pocket. Each envelope is of linen, tough and unbreakable. No one but the Editor knows exactly what is in those envelopes, so the contents cannot be forged. Each contains, as a matter of fact, a letter signed by the Editor authorising the first person who asks for it to the sum of £10.

NOW YOU SEE HOW YOU CAN GET £10 FOR ASKING.

We don't expect you to rush out at once and ask every man you meet if he has the envelope. That would be foolish—a mere waste of time. Moreover, you would probably get a rebuff.

What you should do is to quietly watch everyone you come in contact with. If you think the man you see is likely to be one of these men, you can, in an inoffensive and quiet manner, simply say: "By-the-way, have you seen this scheme?" and show him this page. If he is not one of the £10 gentlemen he will say he hasn't seen the scheme, and will be interested, and thank you for putting the chance of making £10 in his way. If he is one of the Ten Pounders he will quietly and unostentatiously take out his pocket-book and hand you the sealed letter.

This you will at once post to us in a registered envelope, and WE WILL SEND YOU A CHEQUE FOR £10.

THE TWENTY TEN-POUNDERS

Will travel by the train. Will wear ordinary clothes. Will stop at all sorts of hotels. Will smoke and drink. Will attend places of entertainment. Will look in shop windows. Will loaf about the beach or parks.

In fact, will behave just like ordinary mortals.

They will wander about our big cities, they will alight from trains at wayside stations, and walk about villages and small towns, and they will altogether give every opportunity to people to get those £10 notes.

If you are at this moment in the train one of these men may be opposite you, or sitting next to you! Just casually show him this page. If he's one of them you'll get £10.

You will at once say: "Oh, yes, but I might ask a thousand people, and yet not get the right one."

Of course you might; but then, you might ask three, and the third might be the right one. Don't think because you simply move in a limited circle during your day's work that you're not likely to see the right man. All these men will intrude themselves unostentatiously into people's daily lives. They may converse with you on any subjects but those which will give you a hint regarding the ten pounds, unless you broach such subject yourself.

Don't think that you have to ask everyone you meet. Just show the page to a fellow passenger by boat or train, to a chance acquaintance on the beach or on the parade. No harm is done if he's not the right chap. You can both just laugh over it.

ONE THING IS CERTAIN.

The Two Hundred Pounds is wandering about the United Kingdom at this moment. Someone has got to get it. Why not you?

As each £10 has been asked for advertisements will be inserted in the newspapers published in the locality in which the claim has been made.

Every day the Ten Pounders will write to the Editor and tell their experiences—where they had breakfast, where they lunched, whom they sat next to, what those people were like, what they were talking about, and what they ate—in fact, will say just exactly what they have been doing every day. Some of this information will be published in the Daily Express every day and in Pearson's Weekly every week, so you will know just how things are going along.

The Ruse that Failed.

"Now, Arthur," said Mrs. Barrington as her husband put three handbags on the seat beside her in the train and handed over her ticket, "I want you to be sure and write to me every day, and tell me everything you think, how much you miss me, and all about the way the servants get along—don't omit any of the details, thinking that I shall not be interested, for every word that you write, dear will be precious to me. Put plenty of local colour in your letters."

"Oh, I'll keep you posted," he replied. "You have a good time, and don't worry about me. I'll get along somehow. Of course, it'll be lonely and all that, but I'll manage to pass the time. It'll be rather dismal for me to sit in the garden alone when it begins to get dark, thinking of you in the gay crowd having a good time, and never giving a thought to——"

"Arthur," his pretty wife interrupted, "if you continue to talk that way I just shan't go. You know I shall think of you every minute I'm away, and if the doctor hadn't said the sea air would be good for me I wouldn't have thought of accepting Aunt Laura's invitation. Please don't fret me, love, will you? Remember that, wherever I may be, and no matter how gay my surroundings, I shall be thinking of you."

They threw kisses at each other as the train moved away. Then Barrington went to his office and began writing letters. They were to his wife. He wrote fourteen of them—enough to last for two weeks.

In general outline the letters w re about the same. He started each by filling a sheet with endearing words and declarations that he was very lonely without his darling. Then followed the local colour she wanted, in the form of comments on occurrences of the day in and about their home.

The letters were not dated, but he sealed and addressed them, and arranged them in a pile so that his lady clerk could take off the top one day after day and drop it into the letter box.

He had been gone nearly a week when there came a telegram for him.

Of course, telegrams had to be opened, and when Miss Wildreth, the lady clerk, read the message she turned pale.

"Why don't you answer my questions about the housemaid's ankle and your liver? Am awfully worried."

That was what Elizabeth Barrington had telegraphed.

After studying the matter for a while Miss Wildreth decided that it was necessary for her to act. She was clever enough to hold a position that not more than one man out of fifty could have filled, and she had the habit of keeping her eyes and ears open. Still, she said to herself:

"The housemaid's ankle? I can see how he might know something about his own liver, but—and why should his wife, of all people, want him to see about it? Well, if I ever get married——"

But instead of finishing what she had started to say, she wrote the following dispatch:

"Leg and liver O.K. Don't worry."

It was about ten o'clock the next day when another telegram for Arthur Barrington was received. It read: "Yesterday's letter contradicts telegram. Why are you deceiving me? Are you better to-day? Shall I come home?"

The lady clerk's reply was as follows:

"Am true as steel. Don't think of coming home."

Miss Wildreth had just begun to feel that she had succeeded in settling the disagreeable business when a messenger boy arrived with another telegram, in which her employer's wife said:

"Don't understand. What do you mean by being true as steel? Something tells me you are worse. Wire immediately."

The lady clerk replied:

"Never mind reference to steel. Am all right."

Mrs. Barrington watched eagerly for the postman on the following day, and when he handed her Arthur's letter she opened it with trembling fingers. Eagerly she scanned the first page and was about half through the local colour when she jumped up and ran to her aunt, crying:

"Merciful goodness, what can this mean? Three days ago Arthur wrote that the housemaid was 'still laid up with her lame ankle,' which I have tried in vain to get him to tell me about, and that he was not feeling well, and the doctor had told him his liver was out of order. Yet here in to-day's letter he tells me that the housemaid has just fallen downstairs spraining her ankle, and that he made himself a Welsh rarebit the night before last, and ate so much of it his liver is all upset. Why on earth did the housemaid fall downstairs when she had a sprained ankle, and what ever possessed Arthur to eat a Welsh rarebit when the doctor had just warned him about his liver?"

Her aunt was trying to work it out when Elizabeth Barrington happened to think of the telegram she had received the day before.

"This letter must have been written about the time they were sent," she said. "I'm going home. Something's wrong. Arthur's liver trouble has gone to his head. My poor darling has lost his reason. He writes a thing and then denies it by telegraph. By starting to-night I can be with him to-morrow morning. Oh, how shall I pass the weary hours?"

* * * * *

Miss Wildreth broke down and made a full confession when Mrs. Barrington rushed, wild-eyed and pale, into her husband's office. Then the two young women sat together in the private room and wept.

"If I hadn't accidentally knocked over the pile of letters he left to be posted," the lady clerk sobbed, "they would not have been mixed up; there would have been no reference to the spraining of the housemaid's ankle before it happened, and his liver would not have troubled him until after he ate the rarebit. How shall I ever be able to explain it to him?"

"You needn't try," Mrs. Barrington answered; "I'll explain to him when he comes home. Dear old fellow! I'm so glad he doesn't know anything about this. He mightn't be having a good time at all if he did."

IN these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver plated pencil-cases or ten popular six shilling novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, SHORT STORIES, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by first post on Monday, September 10th, 1900.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 610. FOR WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 8TH, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

A Real Tonic—
Not a Stimulant.

When prostrate and worn-out at the end of an exhausting day's work, do not be persuaded that alcoholic drinks are required. The brief span of vigour and exhilaration produced by stimulants is but short-lived. It is succeeded by languor and lethargy more troublesome than before. But with Guy's nutritive and stimulating Tonic how different! The sufferer finds that a few doses will dissipate fatigue, and infuse new energy upon the Muscular and Mental Powers; his lethargy goes, his sinking leaves him, and his Nervous terror and agitation are removed; hard brain-work becomes an intellectual enjoyment; the Stomach is strengthened, the Liver regulated, and the entire Nervous System invigorated by its use.

Guy's Tonic
Revives Strength.

Mr. B. Howard, writes from Ryall Grove, Earl's Croome, Worcestershire:

"I have found Guy's Tonic a wonderful help when run down; it is what I call a Strength Reviver."

Guy's Tonic Restored my Appetite.

Mr. J. Bird, of Summer Lane, Birmingham, writes:

"I desire to add my Testimony to the great value of Guy's Tonic. It restored my Appetite, cleared the tongue, and acted most beneficially on the Liver and Nerves. It also gave me refreshing Sleep, freedom from Dreams, and a pleasant waking. The distressing Symptoms of Melancholia and Despondency have never returned since I took the first bottle of Guy's Tonic."

Constipation. The Booklet wrapped round every bottle of Guy's Tonic gives valuable advice on Diet, and simple, yet complete, instructions for the safe, pleasant and permanent cure of Constipation. The advice is based on high Medical Authority, and it should be remembered that Constipation, now so prevalent, is frequently the cause of Ill-health and Debility, and is usually a troublesome complication of most cases of Indigestion, Sluggish Liver, and Nervousness.

A new size (Six Ounce) Bottle of Guy's Tonic, price 1s. 1½d., is now on sale at all Chemists and Stores.

No. 610.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending Sept. 8th, 1900.

THE DETECTIVE CONFEDERATE.

"Lord Whintley, Caerdoal Castle, Cornwall," read Clearsite, the well-known private detective, from a card his clerk had brought to him. "Let me see—Whintley. Yes, to be sure, that is the man who goes in for archæological researches, and who, I read in the papers a day or two ago, is to start immediately for Mexico to inspect some monument or other that has lately been discovered."

"The gentleman's waiting in the outer office, sir," reminded the clerk.

"Ask him in," returned the detective; and, arranging an important-looking roll of papers on his desk, he awaited the entrance of the nobleman.

A little man in a long, fur-lined overcoat—it was January, and the snow deep on the ground—was ushered in by the clerk. He had a thick, grey moustache, and wore blue spectacles, and his high fur collar was turned up round his ears.

"Mr. Clearsite himself?" queried the visitor.

"Yes" answered the detective, wheeling an arm-chair up to the fire. "Will you sit down, my lord?"

"Thank you. My time is rather short. I leave London to-day, on a long journey."

"Yes," returned the detective, "I have heard that your lordship was starting for Mexico."

"Dear me!" answered the visitor, as if astonished at the detective's information. "Marvellous! You know that, do you? You detectives seem to find out most things."

Clearsite did not state how he obtained his information; he merely bowed.

"Well, Mr. Clearsite, my visit to you is connected with this journey. My wife—hem—my wife, Lady Whintley, is considerably younger than I am—hem! Lady Whintley, in fact, does not take a great interest in my researches, and is remaining at Caerdoal Castle. Lady Whintley is fond of amusement—not that I make a complaint of that, mind; but—well, there is such a thing as being over confident, particularly when a man is considerably older than his wife, and he is leaving her for a time—eh?"

The detective was leaning back in his chair with his hands folded resting on his chest, and his eyes screwed up to the most penetrating attention. "Jealousy," he was reflecting; "and jealousy is a good grist-bringer to the detective mill."

"Yes," answered the detective, wheeling an armchair up to the fire.

He simply nodded and waited for further information.

"It is an awkward thing to express," continued the visitor.

"We detectives are accustomed to strange cases," answered Clearsite; "and what you say to me will be kept in the most inviolable secrecy."

His visitor appeared reassured.

"Well," he said, "the truth is, I want my wife watched, and I want you to do the watching. I will make the job well worth your while. I will pay you at the rate of £100 a month. Can you undertake the business?"

Clearsite looked very profound, and after some apparent consideration, agreed to do so.

"It is a very delicate business, you see," he said. "Firstly, have you any suspicion of any favoured lover?"

"Partially," replied his visitor. "Lady Whintley has a cousin, whom she professes to look upon as a brother, and who, doubtless, now I am away, will be a good deal at Caerdoal Castle."

"Yes, and how do you propose that I should do this watching without exciting Lady Whintley's suspicions?"

"Ha, ha!" laughed this strangely jealous husband; "that is where the beauty of my plan comes in. I purpose to send you to Caerdoal Castle on the pretext that when my absence becomes known, the place might be expected to be attacked by burglars. I want you to be always on the watch, taking a turn about the place at night, looking into rooms, examining locks—a sort of person whose eccentricities have always an excuse. Not a bad idea, eh, Mr. Clearsite?"

The detective felt almost aggrieved at the artful inventiveness of the amateur, and in self-defence felt bound to say:

"In theory this sounds easy, but there will be difficulties in execution."

"Of course, but you are clever enough to overcome them. I leave London to-day. Will you go down to Caerdoal Castle to-morrow?"

"Yes, I think I can undertake to do so. Will you give me a line of introduction to Lady Whintley?"

"No, I think not. Say I engaged you at the last moment."

"But perhaps your wife——"

"My wife will be delighted at my forethought. The boat leaves to-night. You will see my name in the list of passengers. I will now wish you good day. I suppose you do not desire anything on account; if you do here is a £20 note."

"Thank you, Lord Whintley, though that was not necessary; but I think it would be preferable you should give a line to your wife."

"I think not. Surely I know better than you. If you do not care for the job——"

"It is not that, but——"

"I have settled the 'but' before, so you go down to-morrow; be wideawake. Mind, Clearsite, don't have any dust thrown in your eyes."

The detective smiled such a smile of confidence that even his visitor seemed to catch the infection, and to smile back, quite strangely to say, contentedly:

"There is one thing, my lord—where am I to communicate with you?"

"I will communicate with you."

"Oh, yes, you will send me an address."

"Ha! ha!" laughed the visitor again almost boisterously, "I will send you a wire when you may expect to see me."

"Expect to see you?"

"To be sure. Don't you understand my journey is a pretence? I shall certainly start, but directly I get a chance I shall find an excuse, which will require me to return. I shall manage to get transferred to a homeward bound vessel, and be back in London within a month."

The detective looked disappointed. His employer seemed uncommonly sharp; one month!—why he had considered this at least a six months' job.

"I will wire to you from London and run down incognito. I will arrive late; you will let me into my own castle, after the servants are in bed. We can have a chat, compare notes, and if necessary I can take myself off for another two or three months while you complete your investigations. Now good-bye. Do not be astonished at any time to hear I am back. Good day," and the visitor was off.

"Well," reflected Clearsite, "I rather despised bookworms and antiquaries, but this man's wits are not dulled by archæological studies. Why, he was born for a detective; while his wife most probably thinks he is absorbed in the past, he has a weather-eye open to the present. A smart idea that journey to Mexico—a decidedly smart idea—but he is a smart fellow; he actually seems to take a delight in finding out what most men try to conceal from themselves. Well, well, my profession is not to seek the motives of my employers, but those of the people I am employed to watch."

He then sent for his clerk, and gave directions for the cases he had in hand, and stated that he should manage to run up to town at least one day a week, and that if anything very pressing turned up, a wire addressed to him at Caerdoal Castle would reach him.

* * * * *

The next afternoon Clearsite arrived at Connolly Station, which was a short drive from Caerdoal Castle, at about five, and selecting a cab, allowed himself to be conducted to his destination.

The footman, who opened the door, looked rather suspiciously at the gentleman, who refused to give his card, and asked to see Lady Whintley on business connected with Lord Whintley.

Clearsite had judged it prudent not to disclose his identity to the servants, as the idea of a detective on the premises has a silencing effect among domestics. What he wished was of a diametrically opposite nature.

After being kept some minutes waiting, the detective was shown into a small study, where he was joined by a young military-looking man of about thirty.

"You wish to see Lady Whintley?" interrogated the gentleman, whom Clearsite concluded to be the cousin, "As you did not give your card or name, Lady Whintley in the absence of her husband, asked me to see you. May I ask the nature of your business?"

"The nature of my business," replied Clearsite, "does not render it desirable that my name and calling should be known to the servants, but I have no objection in giving you my card, if you will kindly take it to Lady Whintley; and I should be obliged if you would tell her I saw Lord Whintley yesterday, and that I am come down here at his express wish."

The young man looked with some astonishment at the card which announced the detective's name and profession.

"You say you saw Lord Whintley yesterday?" he asked.

"Yes, just before he started for Liverpool."

"I will give your message to Lady Whintley," said the young man. "If there has been any discourtesy shown to you, you will, I am sure, allow that your mode of introduction was rather suspicious; but since you are following Lord Whintley's instructions, of course Lady Whintley will see you."

He left the study, and, after a short absence, returned with a young woman, handsome and attractive.

Clearsite rose and made his best bow, and the young man, after saying: "Lady Whintley, this is Mr. Clearsite," was about to retire.

"Stay, Frank," she said; "I should like to hear what is the motive of Mr. Clearsite's visit."

"In brief, my lady," commenced the detective, "Lord Whintley called at my office yesterday. He said that the fact of his going abroad might get known, and that consequently burglars might attempt to make a raid on Caerdoal Castle, and that he thought while he was away you would have more security if a detective were resident here, and he engaged me to undertake the business."

"How thoughtful of dear old George, is it not, Frank?" broke out the lady. "I thought he went away with nothing but monuments and inscriptions in his head, and, you see——"

"Yes, it was very thoughtful," interposed the young man. "I suppose, Mr. Clearsite," he continued, "Lord Whintley gave you a note for Lady Whintley?"

"No," replied the detective. "I naturally suggested he should do so, but he would not. I pressed the point, but he got quite irritable, and said I could explain to Lady Whintley."

"Just like George," put in the lady; "he can't bear opposition."

"Yes, but," said the cousin, "we have only Mr. Clearsite's word that he is Mr. Clearsite. He might have come down with a bogus message, and be the very burglar he is presumed to come down to catch."

Clearsite drew himself up to his full height, but he saw that what the young man said was reasonable enough.

"I should propose," said Frank, "that for to-night Mr. Clearsite should go to the village inn, like any ordinary traveller, not mentioning his name at all, and that to-morrow he and I will go up to London together, where, of course, his personality is well known, and then, if all is satisfactory, he will return with me and will enter on the duties intrusted to him by Lord Whintley. I think this is fair, eh, Mr. Clearsite?"

Clearsite was bound to confess that it was so; but, somehow, he formed no very favourable opinion of Cousin Frank, and was convinced that Lady Whintley's reference to her husband as "dear old George," was a clever bit of acting intended for his special benefit.

After all, he did not much regret Mr. Frank's distrust; the next day would bring about a solution in his favour, and Lady Whintley would in the future be bound, as a sort of reparation, to consider, with an extreme indulgence, all his actions.

The next evening he was installed in a position of trust at Caerdoal Castle.

In accordance with his wish, it was given out that he was a sort of steward intrusted with exceptional powers during Lord Whintley's absence. He had free access all over the house; to account for his nightly perambulations it was said that he was a sufferer from insomnia, and he had a small study allotted to him on the ground floor.

His meals were served in his own room; he used to walk down to the village, and was soon a popular habitué in the Whintley Arms, and at times would drop in for a glass at the less reputable publics.

In the housekeeper's room Mr. Jones, as he chose to be called, was ever welcome; and Biggs, the butler, confessed that Jones was a social fellow, and a cute one into the bargain, who thoroughly appreciated his (Biggs') general conversation and particular gossip.

Three days after his arrival at Caerdoal Castle, Clearsite was taking a cup of tea in the housekeeper's room, in company with Mr. Biggs, and being now on fairly familar terms with these two trusted retainers, he determined to touch delicately on the domestic relations of Lord Whintley and his wife.

"Charming place, this, Mr. Biggs," commenced the detective. "It seems strange that Lord Whintley can't be satisfied here without running over to such an out-of-the-way place as Mexico."

"He is clean mad on anything connected with antiquities; thinks of nothing else," responded the butler.

"Ah!" continued Clearsite; "you don't seem to be going into mourning for his absence. From what I can see, you are expecting company and are preparing for festivities."

"We always have guests at the Castle at this time of the year. The Lord Lieutenant's ball comes off next week, you see."

"And Lady Whintley is going?"

"Yes, of course, and we shall have her sister, Viscountess Brodley, and Lord and Lady Manton of Mossmere, here also, who will go with her."

"And Mr. Frank, of course?" said Clearsite, trying to look very knowing.

"Yes," replied Biggs; "he takes my lord's place in his absence."

Clearsite smiled again, somewhat to Biggs' astonishment.

"You see," added the butler, "Mr. Frank Graham was a ward of Lady Whintley's father, and they were brought up like brother and sister, and my lord always asks him to be here in his absence."

"Oh, he does, does he?" thought Clearsite. "I wonder what can be his game?"

"Lady Whintley is considerably younger than the husband?"

"Yes, considerably," returned Biggs; "but it was a regular love-match on her part. She is as proud of his discoveries as if he were Prime Minister, and it was as much as he could do to prevent her going over to Mexico with him."

Clearsite could not conceal his astonishment.

"True, is it not, Mrs Jellypots?" asked the butler.

"She is wonderfully attached to him," answered the lady; "and he seems to take it all as a matter of course, and never troubles about anything but his books and coins."

"Well, Clearsite, you see I know how to keep an appointment."

"He is wider awake than you think," reflected Clearsite; "but both my lord and my lady must be very clever to keep their troubles so completely to themselves."

"This ball will be a big affair then?"

"Rather," replied Mr. Biggs. "It is what they call the biggest society function of the county for the year. Of course to you, Mr. Jones, being in your confidential position, I may say that to-morrow I go to London to bring Lady Whintley's jewels from the bank. They are worth over thirty thousand pounds, and it would not be safe to keep them down here."

"No, I should think not," ejaculated Clearsite. "Too much of a bait for burglars, if they got an inkling of the matter. Have you ever, Mr. Biggs, had a visit from any of these gentry?"

"Once," replied the butler, "and a daring attempt it was, too. A fellow found out from my lady's maid all about the jewels. It was just before the Lord Lieutenant's ball, and while the family was at dinner a ladder was put up against my lady's dressing-room window and the thieves entered. Luckily, an under-gardener caught a glimpse of them, pulled away the ladder and aroused the house. Mr. Frank, and some other gentlemen, who were staying here, rushed upstairs in a trice, opened the door and found two of the burglars on the floor, and a little fellow in a police-inspector's uniform holding them fast. He explained that he had shadowed the two men, and entered the room by the ladder after them, and had thus caught them in a trap. He asked the gentlemen to help him take them to some place of safety, till he could, with the assistance of a couple of servants drive the rascals over to the lock-up in the nearest town. The two burglars were locked up in one of the stables, the police-inspector taking the key. He then went into the dining-room and had a glass of wine, everyone looking on him as a hero. After a little he said he would have a look at his prisoners. Several of the company offered to accompany him but he would not hear of taking anybody out into the cold. He said his investigation would not take above twenty minutes, and away he went. After half-an-hour, as he did not return, someone went to see what detained him. then it was discovered that burglars and police-inspector had disappeared, and after communication with Scotland Yard, it appeared positive that the Inspector was no other than the famous burglar known as 'Slippery Swad,' and that he wore the disguise of a police-inspector under his great coat, in case of emergencies.

"Clever, wasn't it? The three men got off, and they say 'Slippery Swad' has never been caught."

"Quite right," answered the detective, "he has not, and there is a reward of £500 for his capture. He is the artfulest——" But Clearsite drew up short, not wishing to show he knew much about such things, and added —"burglar out, I should say, from what you have told me."

"Yes," answered Biggs, "we were always afraid he would return, for when he posed as the inspector, he asked to go over the place, to see if no other attempt had been made in any other room, and thus learnt all about the castle. But my lord had a system of electric bells fixed to all the doors and windows, called, I believe, 'burglar discoverers,' and these are turned on when the family are at meals, or in bed, as you know, Mr. Jones, and the fact was notified in the public papers; so that, probably, Mr. 'Slippery Swad' heard of this arrangement, and does not consider another attempt quite safe."

Clearsite, when he was alone reflected deeply on what he had heard. His observations at Caerdoal Castle confirmed absolutely the conversation of the housekeeper's room.

Lady Whintley was a loving and devoted wife. Her cousin, viewed by herself as a brother, was apparently trusted by her husband implicitly.

Everybody evidently looked upon Lord Whintley as a man whose every thought was taken up by study, and who took little or no interest in what was passing around him; and yet what a different aspect did the detective's personal experience of Lord Whintley put on matters generally! Could the man be a maniac?

Clearsite was fairly puzzled. There seemed, at present to be no clue to the mystery; all he could do was to wait, and in his case waiting was paid for, which was an extra inducement to patience.

The next day, Biggs, the butler, went to London, and returned safely with the jewels, and the day following, Clearsite received a telegram, worded as follows:

> "Opportunity has surpassed my expectations. Am back in London. Meet me on the lawn to-night, outside castle, at twelve. Be careful that I am not observed.
> W—Tley."

"Sharp work," thought the detective. "If he is a madman, there is a decided method about his madness. Anyway, I will put him thoroughly to the proof when I see him to-night."

Clearsite felt so confident in his powers of observation, that he was quite impatient for the meeting, which would, he was convinced, furnish him with a solution of the mystery.

Before half-past eleven, everyone at Caerdoal, excepting the detective, was in bed, and a few minutes before twelve, he opened the glass doors of his study, which led down, with two steps, on to the lawn, and himself noiselessly descended to his rendezvous.

The clock from the castle turret had scarcely struck twelve, when he saw a figure glide cautiously from the shrubberies towards him. The moon was shining, and he had no difficulty in recognizing his employer, dressed just as he had seen him when he called at his offices.

"Well, Clearsite," said the detective's visitor, advancing to his side, and speaking in a low, distinct voice: "archæological mummy, as I daresay you have heard me described, you see I know how to keep an appointment; and you, man, have you any news for me?"

"Very little, my lord. I have been much puzzled."

"Fooh!" interrupted the visitor, with a shudder; "it is cold here to talk! let us go in. What room have they given you?"

"The little study, opening on to the lawn."

"Good! That is handy. Go on, I will follow you. A strange way to steal into one's own castle, is it not? But I am a strange man. Forward, Mr. Clearsite!"

They entered the study, and the detective's visitor drew a chair to the fire, and made himself comfortable.

"So they have bamboozled you, eh, Clearsite?"

"My lord," returned the detective, "as yet I am unable to give a decided opinion one way or another."

"More time needed, eh? Never mind, Clearsite, I have news for you. I have found out positively that the day Mr. Frank Graham went up to London with you, he pawned Lady Whintley's diamonds. I presume the jewel-case was obtained from the Bank by a written order from Lady Whintley, and on its return a seal was put on it in the presence of Mr. Graham, but the stones were unset, and have been replaced with crystals, and the gentleman has been able to pay a debt of eight thousand pounds, for which he was being closely pressed by bill discounters of my acquaintance. What do you think of that?"

The detective eyed his visitor with admiration. Who would believe that such a quiet-looking little man could be so sharp? He had missed his vocation. What a detective he would have made! And what a cunning pair Lady Whintley and her cousin were!

"Have you positive proof, my lord?"

"Well the circumstantial evidence is, to my mind, convincing. First, I have proof that Graham pledged diamonds for a total amount of twelve thousand pounds at three different pawnbrokers. Secondly, I know the bill-brokers, who held his bills for £10,000, and whom he paid on that day. The only link wanting in my evidence is, that the diamonds were Lady Whintley's; but she has valuable diamonds, worth considerably more than that sum, and if they were not hers, where did he get them?"

"True," said Clearsite. "Yet the doubt is an important one."

"You are right. I hope I may be deceived. I know my wife always sends for her jewels from London, to wear at the Lord Lieutenant's ball. Do you know if she has them yet?"

"Yes my lord. Biggs fetched them yesterday."

"Good! Then we can soon decide. Can you distinguish crystals from diamonds?"

Digitized by Google

"I would not like to assert positively, my lord."

"Never mind. I am a connoisseur in precious stones. I suppose Lady Whintley sleeps in her same room?"

"I believe so. The second door on the landing."

"Is the dressing-room door locked?"

"No, my lord; her maid sleeps there since you have been away."

"And the jewel-case is in Lady Whintley's room?"

"That I cannot tell."

"I will have a look for it, and if I find it, we will examine the stones."

So saying, the visitor took off his boots.

"But, my lord," interposed the detective, "if you are discovered?"

"Well, if I am? I suppose I have a right to do as I like in my own house, eh, Mr. Detective?"

And creeping from the room with the noiseless footfall of a cat, he left the detective alone.

Clearsite did not exactly like his position; but it was not long before his visitor returned, carrying a brass bound jewel case.

"I have no key to open it Clearsite," he said. "I must break the lock."

"That will betray the act, my lord."

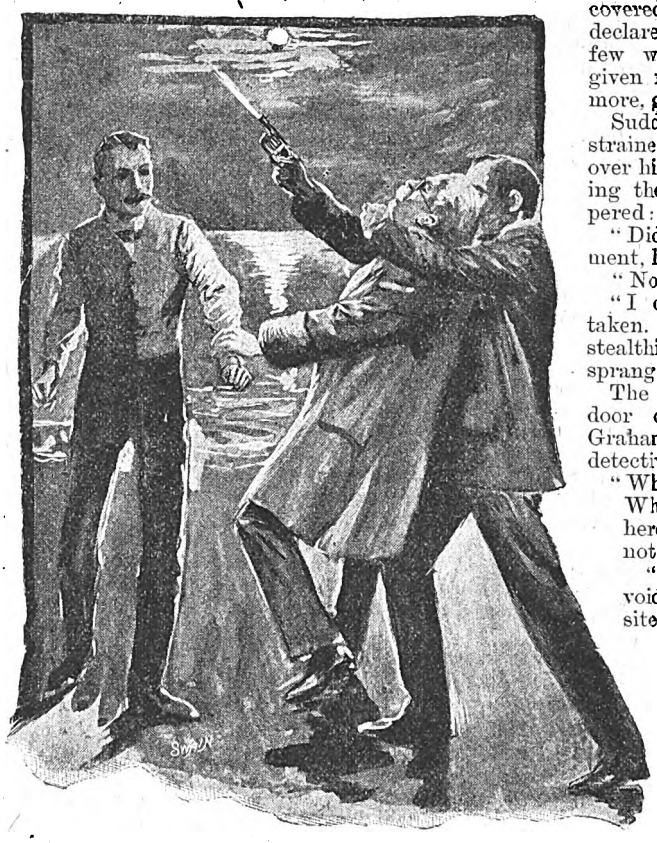
"I suppose it will, but it cannot be helped."

And before the detective could oppose the act, the lid was forced, and the jewels, necklace, ornaments for the hair, bracelets and the other trinkets were strewn on the table.

"My lord, this was most foolish."

"Perhaps it was, but you see I was right. There is not a diamond here. Everyone is an imitation!"

"Are you sure, my lord? They look full of fire, and you see they are set hollow."



The detective had thrown him backwards, the pistol-shot firing upwards.

"Why man, surely you know that crystals nowadays are set just like diamonds? I have made a special study of gems; and the lot of stones there, are not worth fifty pounds."

The man's head fell on his arms, and tears stood in his eyes.

Clearsite was moved at the sight of his distress, and tried to suggest mistakes; a desire of Lady Whintley to help her cousin as a sister a brother.

"I assure your lordship," he added, "I have carefully watched her ladyship, and I believe her to be fondly attached to you."

"Do you? Are you saying what you really believe? Thank you, Clearsite; you have given hope once more," said the man, looking up. "I will take these back to her room, and to-morrow I will come here, the first thing before she is up and can have discovered that I have broken open the jewel-case, then I will have an explanation. Perhaps my action was hasty, but a husband's feelings do not brook delay."

Replacing the jewels in the case, and taking it with him, he once again left the room.

He must have stumbled over something, for Clearsite's sharp ear detected a slight sound; but he was back again in a few minutes, and put on his boots.

"I will leave you for to-night, Clearsite," he said. "To-morrow the first thing, expect me. If, before I come, anything should be discovered I authorise you to declare the truth. Your few words of hope have given me fresh life. Once more, good night."

Suddenly a look of strained attention passed over his face, and approaching the detective, he whispered:

"Did you hear a movement, like a footstep?"

"No my lord."

"I did—I am not mistaken. Hark!" and moving stealthily to the window he sprang out.

The next moment the door opened, and Frank Graham stood before the detective.

"Who was your visitor? What was he doing here? I am sure I did not mistake the voice."

"If you recognised his voice," returned Clearsite, "it is useless for me to delay the discovery that must come to-morrow."

"What do you mean?" exclaimed Frank roughly. "Are you that man's confederate? How dared you receive him here?"

"Dared, Mr. Graham," said Clearsite, "is a strong term. Since you recognised Lord Whintley, how dare you speak of him as you do? Surely he has the right to come here when and how he chooses."

"Lord Whintley! What do you mean? Are you mad?"

"You said you recognised the voice of the person in conversation with me?"

"Yes—yes—as that of the notorious burglar, who once imposed upon us all here—as the man known as 'Slippery Swad.'"

Clearsite's face became awful in its expression of baffled rage, as he ejaculated:

"Ah; I see it all. It was he who personated Lord Whintley. He has imposed even on me, and has made me a confederate in stealing Lady Whintley's diamonds. He cannot have got off far. Let us follow immediately."

Digitized by Google

"Wait a moment," returned Frank calmly. "Let us first consider what direction he will probably take. We kept very close a discovery we made on his former visit, namely, that he came and departed by means of a boat, which, while he and his confederates were on land, was moored in a creek on the seashore, at about ten minutes walk from the lodge gates. Possibly he will repeat this experiment. He will run across the park, but there is a door in the yard, opening to a short cut to the shore, which reduces the time distance by at least five minutes. Quick, and we shall yet catch him."

The two men started immediately, Frank still in his stockinged feet, and Clearsite regardless of his hat.

They soon reached the confines of the park, and from a little eminence, saw that Frank was right in his conjecture, as there was, in the creek, a boat with two men in it, evidently waiting for someone who had landed.

"We are in time," said Frank, shrinking back into the shadow of the park trees, and advancing in the direction from which he expected "Slippery Swad" would appear.

Clearsite followed.

In a few minutes they perceived the man they were expecting. He darted from the park at a smart trot and directed his steps towards the boat.

Frank impetuously sprang forward and confronted him.

Events pass rapidly at such crises. The burglar's presence of mind was ever at call.

He scarcely stopped, as he pulled a revolver from his pocket, and pointed it straight at his assailant, and, in an instant a sharp report rang out.

Luckily indeed for Frank, Clearsite's experience in criminal catching had come to his aid, or the young man's chance for life would have been small.

The detective had allowed Frank to face the burglar; he himself had rushed unperceived behind him, and throwing his arms round his neck at the critical moment, had thrown him backwards, the pistol-shot firing upwards.

The men in the boat immediately made off, and Frank and the detective returned with their captive to the Castle, where he was temporarily secured in a cellar, under lock and key.

Frank undoubtedly owed his life to Clearsite, and readily enough promised that, with the exception of Lord and Lady Whintley, no one should know how cleverly the detective had been duped.

Clearsite, consequently, drew the £500 for the capture of "Slippery Swad," and, in addition, received a handsome present from Frank.

Moreover, the detective's name was in everybody's mouth, and his reputation was considerably increased, as he received all the glory of bringing such a notorious culprit to justice.

When brought up for trial "Slippery Swad," in the pockets of whose fur-lined overcoat Lady Whintley's diamonds had been found—he having only replaced on her table the empty jewel-case—was condemned to a lengthy term of penal servitude, which he richly deserved; but before being removed from the dock, he somewhat astonished the judge and the court by exclaiming:

"And how about my confederate? Surely I thought I should be safe if I engaged a detective."

Clearsite became very pale and fidgeted about uneasily, particularly when the criminal winked at him knowingly; but without further explanation, "Slippery Swad" was removed to the cells below, and his professional engagement with Clearsite was never made public, till this true history was written.

And even here, names are so concealed, that the pseudonym of Clearsite effectually hides the individuality of the detective who was so cleverly imposed upon by one of the sharpest of modern burglars.

The Rolling Platform.

MONSIEUR Legrand, of Chambéry, read thoughtfully the following advertisement aloud to himself, in the dignified seclusion of his office:

At Whitsuntide, the Company of the South-Eastern Railway of France will issue return tickets to Paris for all classes, available for eleven days, from the 25th of May to the 4th of June, inclusive. These tickets can be taken at all Stations of the Company.

Monsieur Legrand took a pencil and made a calculation of the cost of the journey for himself, Marius Legrand, silk merchant and draper of Chambéry, his wife and his daughter Céleste.

"Three first-class tickets, 234 francs; other expenses, 250 francs. Lodging: when I go to Paris, I pay four francs for my room; with the Exhibition going on, will have to give double. For three people eighteen-twenty with attendance—so, for nine days, 180 francs. So much for food, so much for carriage hire, theatres, etc. Total 790 francs—at least 800 to 900 francs, let us call it 1,000 francs (£40) at once. It is agonising to spend so much money. But Céleste will be enchanted. Ever since she was seven years old, have I promised her a visit to Paris. And this is the year of the Exhibition! I can afford this folly, I will do it. Va!"

Without waiting any longer, Monsieur Legrand opened the door of his office that communicated with the rest of the house and shouted in a loud voice, "Eloise, Céleste, pack up. We go to Paris on the 25th."

He was answered by two shrieks of joy.

Monsieur Legrand had not been to Paris for fifteen years. And why? Because this dear man was so fat, moving was disagreeable to him. When he entered a room first you saw his waistcoat and then, some time after, the rest of Monsieur Legrand. For a long time he had said good-bye to his feet and could only see them in a looking-glass. When, therefore, it was a question of moving his enormous person he thought twice about it, and it was only his charming good heart and wish to give pleasure to his wife and daughter that induced him to undertake this great expedition.

Madame Legrand was a great contrast to her husband, she was as thin and flat as he was round and heavy. She was also as discreet and reserved as he was expansive and noisy. Céleste, their daughter, had the talent, or rather the good fortune, to conciliate in her person the best qualities of both parents, and formed a most seductive whole. She was charmingly proportioned and added to this a smiling face, with large, dark eyes and golden hair, and red lips that opened on two rows of pearls. In fact she was acknowledged to be the grace and the beauty of Chambéry.

This journey was, no doubt, a great event.

It caused good Monsieur Legrand much agitation. It was only when they were safely off, shut in a compartment by themselves, that he heaved a sigh of satisfaction and mopped his forehead with one of his own best silk handkerchiefs. Then he counted all the small parcels, made sure of his pocket-book, all his keys, and counted the change in his purse. I have said they were alone in their compartment. Monsieur Legrand took a quarter up himself and was able to repose at ease, without the fear of cramping other people. When approaching a large station, he thought it wise to take precautions, however; he disposed the parcels artfully on the disengaged seats, and when the porters, as French porters always will, at large stations, flung open the door, shouting out "Dijon, ten minutes," Monsieur Legrand blocked up the opening with his fairy form. All the travellers who approached retreated before this fortification, and his plans would have been crowned with success, had he only continued them a few minutes longer. But, thinking all would go well, he moved back a few seconds before the train departed, and in this moment of time a young man quickly jumped in.

"The carriage is full," said Monsieur Legrand angrily.

"Not quite, I think," said the newcomer coolly; "it seems to me four or five places are still vacant."

He sat down peacefully in the corner facing Céleste. He was a well-dressed young man with a distinguished air. He drew a newspaper out of his pocket and proceeded to read it, without troubling himself more about Monsieur Legrand than if that gentleman were still in Chambéry.

Suddenly a packet in the net above Céleste fell on her hat, and she gave the charming cry of a frightened bird. The young man sprang to his feet, seized the packet, inquired if his fellow-voyager were hurt—then resumed his seat, but not his reading. This accident had permitted him to study Céleste, and he judged her charming countenance more worthy of study than fights in the French Chamber of Deputies. At the same time Monsieur Legrand, touched by the politeness of the young man, felt his anger evaporate and began a conversation with him. The young man replied pleasantly to the father, while admiring the daughter. Soon Monsieur Legrand had told him his name, his business, his place of residence and many other details. But to all, the young man only said, "Ah!" It was not compromising. While he talked pleasantly, he kept to generalities and told them nothing of himself or his business. Monsieur Legrand remarked that they were going to see the Exhibition, they talked a long time on the subject.

"What I desire to see above all, is the Palace of Costume," said Céleste.

"I, the Beaux Arts," said Madame timidly.

"I, the Rolling Platform," exclaimed Monsieur Legrand. "To move round without moving oneself—what a splendid invention! We will go on it to-morrow morning at ten o'clock precisely."

The young man then explained the working of the Rolling Platform, the best way to get to it, and especially indicated with care the point at which it was best to get on. They said good-bye to him at the station in Paris, with the greatest friendliness. Monsieur pressed his hand effusively, Madame Legrand bowed gracefully and Céleste smiled upon him in the most enchanting manner.

"Ciel!" cried Monsieur Legrand, "I have forgotten to ask the name of this most charming young man." He rushed after their late companion, but alas! he was not built for running and soon had to give up the chase.

He returned. "Alas! it is ended," said he, "we shall see him no more. What a misfortune!"

Madame Legrand was also sad, Céleste seemed unconcerned. Young ladies sometimes can see far into mysteries, and Céleste had a presentiment that she would again see this delightful young man.

When the next day, at ten o'clock precisely, the family Legrand arrived at the point indicated to ascend the Rolling Platform, the first person they saw was their travelling companion.

Monsieur Legrand gave a cry of joy, Céleste blushed. After greeting them with much amiability, the young man, to show them how to do it, jumped lightly on to the lower platform, which only travels at the rate of four kilometres an hour, and from that he jumped on to the second, which goes round twice as fast. Céleste followed him with the same lightness.

But it was quite a different operation for Monsieur and Madame Legrand. He had no agility, and as to Madame, full of fear, she did not dare to place her foot on the rolling machine: so that the young people were soon far away from the father and mother, who remained paralysed in the same place, vainly asking how they were to rejoin their daughter.

"Happily," said the good father, naively, "she is in good hands."

At last, in fact, in a quarter of an hour, the Rolling Platform had rolled round and back to the same point and a well-known voice called to them:

"Oh! how amusing it is."

It was Céleste, leaning on the balustrade, by the side of their amiable friend. Neither seemed to be tired of their present employment. So this time Monsieur and Madame Legrand, with great courage, mounted on the platform in the best way they could. Once there, they did not venture to move, but remained firmly clutching the sticks with round heads, placed at intervals to support the passengers. So they followed the young people in a maze—but at a long interval. At last they were delivered by their daughter herself, who approached, smiling and holding the hand of her friend, no doubt only to assist her in keeping her balance. They lunched together, and together visited the different palaces and pavilions. They only left each other in the evening, then making an appointment for the next day.

"It is too tiresome," cried Monsieur Legrand, on entering his hotel, "I have again forgotten to ask the name of this too charming person. To-morrow I must remember."

But the next day he again forgot. He only remembered at the end of four days, by which time they had become so intimate with him that he never quitted them from morning till night. He finally told them to address him as Henri Leblanc, and as Monsieur Legrand knew this was a name of good repute in the commercial world of Paris, he was quite satisfied. Of course it did not follow that their friend was a member of the important firm of the "Bon Marché," but still the name of the principal partner was the same, and all things are possible.

Anyhow, the Legrand family were out for a holiday and were not disposed to let unworthy suspicions cloud their pleasure in Monsieur Henri Leblanc's society.

It must be confessed the confiding father of the family was a little imprudent. Being lazy and disinclined for exertion, he got into the habit of handing Monsieur Henri Leblanc his purse to take tickets for the various entertainments they went to, instead of struggling himself to the box office; so, by degrees, Leblanc became general paymaster—let it be well understood—with Monsieur Legrand's money.

The days passed all too swiftly till the ninth day came; on the next day their return tickets expired, their holiday was ended. They must bid a sad farewell to the delights of Paris and return to the quieter pleasures of Chambéry.

Céleste was nearly in despair; charming as Monsieur Henri Leblanc had invariably been still he had said nothing that distinctly or definitely implied a wish to annex for ever her charming self. Could it be he was trifling with a damsel who had devastated—yes, the expression is not too strong!—devastated the hearts of Eastern France? So Céleste on this last day put on her prettiest frock and most becoming hat, determined to hasten matters to a crisis. Also Monsieur Legrand, answering to a hint from Madame, filled his purse well, to provide for a fitting last entertainment to their delightful friend.

"As I am at the Credit Lyonnais, my dear," remarked the good merchant, "I may as well draw sufficient money to pay our hotel expenses and travelling extras. It will save me another journey to the bank. I will therefore write a cheque for 800 francs."

The prudent Madame demurred to this.

"Is it not unsafe to carry about so large a sum in the crowded Exhibition?" she said nervously; "we are specially warned by the police to beware of pickpockets."

But Monsieur Legrand only laughed at her fears and stuffed his purse gaily with 100 franc notes. Not only this, but he explained the whole transaction to Monsieur Henri Leblanc, who had come to fetch them from their hotel in the morning to go to the Exhibition.

"It is safer to carry the money with you," their mentor said gravely, "than to leave it in the Hotel at the mercy of the servants," and he related one or two stories of hotel robberies that much horrified Madame Legrand.

"The money can, however, be left in charge of the manager," she ventured to remark timidly.

"No, no, my good friend," said Henri, "believe me, it is better to trust to oneself only in these cases. What is the manager after all, but a paid servant of the company? I know nothing definite against him, but still ——"

So Monsieur Legrand trotted forth with the whole 800 francs in his purse, and they all went gaily in at the Grand Entrance in the Place de la Concorde. They went to the Palais de l'Optique and saw the reflected pictures of the observations taken of the moon by the enormous telescope, which truth compels me to say were not admired by them.

"The moon resembles exactly the appearance of a patient recovering from a bad attack of smallpox," said Céleste, shuddering. But she found pleasure in the exhibitions of electric light effects in the same palace, the imitations of storms, thunder and lightning, and the curious examples of the Röntgen rays. From there they passed to the Palais de Costume on the right. It was the ladies' fourth visit to this enchanting place. Monsieur Legrand remained on a chair outside while Henri Leblanc accompanied Madame and her daughter on their round of inspection.

Monsieur Legrand's purse had some time before been intrusted to his dear young friend to pay the extra one franc fifty centimes each required at the entrance of both the Palais de l'Optique and the Palais de Costume. Monsieur Legrand sat outside and amused himself by planning a veritable feast in the way of a dinner in the evening. At last the others appeared.

"There is yet time," exclaimed Céleste, "for just a round on the charming Rolling Platform before we go to our lunch."

They took their way to the nearest point for getting on, and arrived there, having climbed a steep staircase to do so. Monsieur Legrand sank breathless on the seat p ovided at the side.

"Excuse me for one moment," said Monsieur Leblanc hurriedly, "I see a friend I must speak to—I will return immediately."

He sprang on the Rolling Platform and was out of sight in a few seconds.

They waited, chatting gaily, for him to come round again on the platform. They waited half-an-hour—an hour—in fact, they may be waiting there still, for the nice, courteous young man whom they never saw again.

SADI GRANT.

"I CANNOT say yes, Walter. I shall always be a sis—"

"Sister to me? No, you won't."

"Yes, Walter; your brother Charles proposed to me last night, and I accepted him."

A BAYSWATER young man is quite "gone" on Hamlet. He was reading it to the girl of his heart last week. "Or if thou wilt need marry, marry a fool," he read.

"Is that a proposal, dear?" she asked.

"Yes, darling," he replied.

And they settled it there and then.

THE angriest man on earth was a fellow who was walking home about eleven o'clock at night, when a stranger drove up alone in a dog-cart, and said:

"Ain't you tired of walking?"

"Yes, I am," said the man; "much obliged," and started for the vehicle.

"Well, why don't you run a while?" said the man in the trap as he drove off.

Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXII.—He Establishes a Home for Friendless Dogs and is Surprised at Results.

THE Bowsers had just finished dinner when the area bell rang, and a minute later a discussion was heard between the cook and a small boy who had a dog at his heels.

Mr. Bowser hurried down stairs and was absent for a quarter of an hour. When he returned, Mrs. Bowser looked at him in a way that called for an explanation, and he explained:

"It was a boy with a dog. I have shut the dog up in the shed."

"But what do you want with a dog?" she queried.

"Nothing, my dear. Have you ever noticed how many homeless dogs there are in the streets?"

"No; I never did."

"I didn't suppose you had, knowing how selfish and cold-hearted you are; but I have. At this very minute there are probably a thousand friendless, homeless dogs wandering about the city."

"And is that our fault?"

"In one way, no. In another way we have a duty to perform. As human beings—as men and women with souls and hearts—we should take heed of the sufferings of the brute creation. What is more sad than to see a poor dog skulking about in fear and hunger? That he is an outcast and outlaw is not his fault. The world owes him a living, the same as it does a man. Humanity owes him food and kind treatment."

"Perhaps you are going to found a dogs' home?" asked Mrs. Bowser after awhile.

"You have hit it exactly," he replied, as the cat came out from under the sofa and sniffed the atmosphere as if she suspected the presence of a canine. "Yes, madam, I have established a home for friendless dogs, and it already has an occupant. I have arranged with several boys to bring me every friendless dog they can find. Each canine shall have bed and board for a couple of weeks at least, and I have no fear that the public will not take them off my hands. You are not with me in the charity, of course, but I shall carry it through just the same. There goes the bell, and that means another dog."

Mr. Bowser opened the door to find another boy and another dog. He was paying the lad and giving him words of praise at the same time when the f mily cat, which had followed him down stairs, took a hand in.

With a yeowl and a howl she lit on the dog's back, and for two or three minutes Mr. Bowser, the boy, the dog and the cat were all mixed up. Then the cat retreated, and the dog was conducted to the asylum.

"Phwat's all this about?" demanded the cook, as Mr. Bowser returned through the kitchen.

"My dear woman, I am being kind to homeless dogs," he replied.

"And are others to come?"

"I hope so. Yes, I am in hopes to pick up about fifty more."

"Then I quits my job in the mornin'! I have never yet worked in a dogs' home, and, please heaven, I never will! No use to talk to me, sir. I can stand a cat or two about, and I can put up with a cranky man, but I'm no lady assistant in a dogs' home."

"I suppose you've been conspiring with the girl," said Mr. Bowser, as he got back up stairs. "But she can leave and be hanged to her. I know I am right in this thing. I know that my course is dictated by the sentiment of mercy, and the dogs' home shall go on in spite of everything."

"You miserable old dog-thief!"

Mrs. Bowser was slipping upstairs without a word in reply when the bell rang again and dog No. 3 appeared. He had scarcely been put in the shed when Nos. 4 and 5 turned up.

The boys were having wonderfully good luck in coming across wanderers, and it was cash down and words of encouragement in every case.

By ten o'clock Mr. Bowser had nine dogs in the shed, and after exhausting the scraps in the kitchen he had sent to the butcher's for meat and bones. He was enjoying that complacency felt by all men who have nobly performed a duty when there came a loud peal at the front door. He hastened to open it, to find a woman on the steps. She had something to say, and she began at once:

"A nice sort of man you are, I must say! Where's my dog?"

"Your dog, madam?" he queried.

"Yes, my dog! He was stolen out of the yard half-an-hour ago, and the boy was seen to enter this house. So you've got to encouraging boys to steal dogs, have you? I'll have him or bring the police here!"

"My dear woman, don't get excited. If your dog is here, he was taken by mistake, and I am sorry for it. I received him as a homeless, friendless canine."

The dog was found among those in the shed, and the woman went away muttering and scolding.

She had not been gone ten minutes and Mr. Bowser was about to lock up for the night, when the door-bell was almost jerked out by the roots. It was a man this time.

He pushed his way into the hall, and, shaking his fist under Mr. Bowser's nose, he shouted:

"You miserable old dog thief, but I am going to drive your head through the wall!"

"What—what's the matter?" was the stammering query.

"The matter is that you are encouraging a band of Hooligans to steal people's dogs and that one of them has stolen mine and brought him here. Trot him right out, or I'll thump you till you can't holler!"

"My dear man——"

"Trot him out, I say!"

The shed was visited and the missing dog recovered, and his still indignant owner talked fight till the gate closed behind him.

Mr. Bowser was wondering over the wickedness of his assistants when Mrs. Bowser came down stairs.

"Don't you think it would be a good idea to turn the rest of the dogs loose and abolish the home?" she presently asked.

"Never!" he shouted in reply. "I set out to establish a home, and I'll do it or perish in the attempt!"

At that moment the sounds of an awful racket came up from the shed. The seven dogs left had entered into a battle royal, and the noise was one to rouse the whole neighbourhood.

Mr. Bowser dashed downstairs and out into the yard, and in another second he had the door of the shed open. He was going to yell at the dogs and stop the row, but no sooner was the door thrown open than the fighting, struggling seven made a rush. So did Mr. Bowser.

Instinct warned the dogs that he was to blame for the row, and they stopped fighting among themselves to snap at his heels. It was a neck-and-neck race, with a bulldog trying to find a place to hang on to, but Mr. Bowser not only reached the fence, but went over it into the next yard and wiped out a bed of flourishing onions as he struck the earth.

It wasn't five minutes before twenty men and boys appeared, and one of them had wit enough to let the dogs out. They went out snarling and howling and fighting, with the bulldog having the best of it, and amid the general uproar Mr. Bowser climbed back into his own yard and got into the house. Mrs. Bowser was quietly awaiting him.

"Well, how many bites did you get from your homeless, friendless dogs?" she asked as she surveyed his tattered trousers' legs.

He turned red and glared at her and swallowed the lump in his throat, but he made no reply. He was so mad and scared and upset that he couldn't even charge her with conspiracy, and after seeing that the front door was locked he followed her upstairs and simply managed to growl out:

"Woman, you and I will settle this thing in the morning!"

"I THINK I was frank—I don't think I deceived you, Meg. Unless a fellow has a practice left him by his father, ready to step into, it's going to be uphill work, dear. I—I thought I stated things clearly enough before you came out, didn't I, sweetheart?"

There was a break in Eric Blandford's voice as he faced his young wife—the wife of barely a year. That year had been long enough to convince him that the unalloyed bliss he had imagined married life to be was all a myth—and further, that his wife was painfully, incurably English.

When, five years before, they had met at an informal dinner party at the house of his own pet, particular chum, he had thought her delightfully so. Her quiet manner, both in dress and voice—her perfect intonation when she spoke (which was seldom) came as a welcome relief from the noisy dash and freedom both in manners and dress, of the young Australian girls of the party.

Two generations back, Eric himself had been English, pure and simple too—for his father, a colonel of an English regiment retired on half-pay, had come out to settle in Tasmania and to end his days there. The end had come sooner than he had expected, and before Eric, his second boy, was out of his articles.

Then had come the uphill pull, and for lack of healthy competition in Hobart, Eric had come to Sydney. It was there, in the early days of his struggle with the world, that he had met Margaret Weyman, and it seemed to him that a strong hand had been stretched out to help him.

She had only looked at him with those steadfast grey eyes of hers in a way that said as plainly as words, "I believe in you"—and a man will give up the whole world and all that is therein—or better still, conquer it—to win the woman who tells him that.

An impetus had been given to his ambition and it was not long before he had his foot upon the first rung of the ladder of success.

It was at this time that the English mail brought him much bad news. Meg had suddenly lost her father from heart failure, and her mother, whose devotion had been proverbial, had survived him but a day.

More than that, it had come as a severe shock to his children, of whom, fortunately, there were only two—that, when all had been settled by his lawyer, the comparative luxury and comfort in which they had been reared must henceforth be a thing of the past; for they had lived, like many others, up to every penny of their income.

Jack, Meg's only brother, who was one of the spoilt and only boys one meets with so often, had calmly informed her that one of them must turn out as there was "only just enough," as far as he could see, "for one to scrape along on."

Like the cad that he was, when a little self-denial would have made enough for both—he had put it so that a girl of spirit such as Meg's could take it only one way.

With Meg, that way was soon decided on. She was fairly accomplished and had been given what is vaguely known as a liberal education.

She determined to turn the latter to account by taking a post as governess, and had already obtained a morning engagement as an opening, and was beginning to like her work, when she received from Eric Blandford—who had written her as a friend these five years—a formal offer of marriage.

The letter had followed on his success in his last law exam., and was to tell her that he was now fully qualified and in partnership with a fellow who had been articled with him.

"There will be no home for us at first, Meg, save the home that we can make of each other's society; but I think we can be very happy in rooms, at least, for a time."

So Eric had written, and then he pleaded, as men do, the theory of the "half loaf better than none," and though he could not be much with her, they would see each other every day, and he would know she was cared for and not dependent on any stranger for that which he, and he only, had a right to give her.

That was nearly a year ago now—but on the wet, dark Australian winter morning when the Blandfords started that ever painful and utterly useless policy of "having things out," it might have been ten, so far away did it seem to both.

They had got beyond mere disillusionment, and had reached the period of mutual recrimination.

Very hard, very bitter had grown the little white face of Meg, with its clear-cut, sharply-defined features, as she descanted at length, and for quite the fiftieth time, on the absence of good taste, refinement, or tact in the boarding-house of Mrs. Miggleson.

How vulgarly coarse those girls were—with their cockney twang and shoppy conversation—as if it were not possible to leave their type-writers at the office for once.

Then those hateful meat breakfasts that were so coarse, and so unlike the dainty English refinement she had been used to. And the men—well—they were beyond even Meg's power of description, and certainly were of a type she had never known at home

"But, Meg, dear, you forget," protested her husband, "they are English; their fathers were as English as yours, or at least, your husband's. You will see it all in time—it is only the natural result of climatic influence."

So Eric argued, but all to no purpose—and there was much more that Meg contrived to say, with a selfish woman's heedless thought of the pain she was inflicting, while Eric went through the painful process of dressing; and then, finding any words of his useless, he left her without even their good-bye kiss—and they had never forgotten that before.

He turned at the door as an afterthought struck him.

"Oh! by-the-bye, the Sessions begin to-day, Meg. I may not be home to lunch, and am afraid I may not be back to dinner even. Don't wait for me, dear, go up alone. You can bear it perhaps for once. It's not for long, now."

He paused, his hand on the door; but there was no sign of relenting on the cold, pure face that was like a vase of crystal, in which he saw himself with all his weaknesses, his delusions, his mistakes, with cruel distinctness.

He snatched a hasty breakfast, and thought hard as he ran for his ferry-boat.

"Poor little girl—perhaps it was hard on her—hard in any man to expect a woman to give up so much—all the little comforts and refinement, such as a temperament like hers would demand. What right had any man to ask it?"

Now it chanced that the first thing Meg noticed when she listlessly commenced to dress was a small, red-leather bound book, a note-book apparently, that she had never remembered to have seen before, and with the natural curiosity of her sex she took it up, opening it at the fly-leaf. There, in the bold, clear hand that she knew so well, she found the simple words written "My Diary," and underneath, her husband's name in full.

She felt a sneak—that is, the less feminine half of her did. The other half said:

"Why not look, he has no business to hide even this from you."

With the true instinct of a woman, she turned to the end first. The entries ended on the day before. They were very simple.

"Lunched at the A.B.C., 6d. I am getting economical for Meg's sake. I am a selfish brute, I know, but I'd do anything to make her happy, if I knew how. It used not to be so difficult—or perhaps it seemed easier and I didn't notice it."

She read on—turning back over a week of similar entries—reading now on her awakened conscience at the end of each roll and coffee lunch, "for Meg's sake," then came a week-end entry that, to Meg, seemed to be written in such large type that it blotted out aught else.

"No smoke for a week—astonishing how well a man gets on without a smoke when he sets his mind to it—it's quite easy."

Then the letters got so large that Meg had to brush her arm across her face to make sure she was reading properly, and two big splashes fell on the open page before her. To some women tears are the eye-openers of the soul.

All that day she racked her poor little brain. What could she do to show Eric, to tell him she hated herself for being the selfish little brute that she was, thinking only of herself, and never of the daily sacrifice of his life for her. How unhappy she had sent him to his work that morning; if only she could go over to the office now and tell him.

She bathed her eyes and went in to breakfast which she had suddenly remembered. But no, for all through the long, dreary day the rain came down pitilessly, in sheets, as it only can rain in Australia. The wind rose too, and there was a talk of the ferry-boats being delayed and perhaps stopped, for they could not make their wharves.

If it would hold up so that she might meet each one in the dusky evening light, in case he came, to tell him all and to welcome him.

But Fate was not kind in one little respect to-day as it seemed, for the rain did not abate one jot.

She had finished her last book, too, and was reduced to flattening her little nose on the window pane as she had done when a child, watching the rain as it swirled down the gutter of the steep, rock-hewn road to the ferry at the Point.

Her sensitive nature, once aroused, magnified her thoughtlessness into a crime, and she was feeling utterly miserable when a knock at the door of her room was followed by Mrs. Miggleson with a cup of tea.

Now, not being a first-class boarding establishment, it was not customary for boarders at Mrs. Miggleson's to be supplied with afternoon tea—it was entirely an extra, and therefore all the more refreshing to Meg who, in her distress of mind, had forgotten to order it.

Even the motherly face of Mrs. Miggleson (like Mrs. Rumbelow, of Davy Garrick fame, she rejoiced in the possession of "seven blessed children") was refreshing, as she set down the cup with a jerk and a "thought you'd like a cup o' tea, Mrs. Blandford, seein' as it was a wet day."

Meg almost forgot it was Australian tea, and such an exhilarating effect had it, that she soon set about devising some new plan of showing her penitence.

To go out was impossible. Eric, too, had said that he might not be in to dinner. Surely he would be in soon after, a happy thought struck her.

Amongst her English treasures was an evening bodice that she had never worn; but it was an exact copy of the one that Eric had seen her in that first day they had met—five years ago—when each looked out on such a different view of life.

It was a thick corded silk—white—a tiny square, cut à la Greque at the neck, and edged with a key pattern in gold thread. He had mentioned it often after in his letters and of how it suited her pure classical features.

So far she had had no opportunity to wear it; for her life had been mapped out on far different lines from that of her first visit, when she had been merely travelling with her well-to-do parents.

She reflected a moment—how they would all stare when she went up to dinner—the ill-bred women, the boorish men; but she would bear it all "for Eric's sake."

She dressed, plucked up her courage in both hands—and went in to dinner. Her over-wrought nerves fancied she heard the front door open as she turned the top corner of the flight that led to the dining-room.

She took her place amid a flutter of mixed feelings that no one seemed to take any pains to disguise, and struggled with the heavy meat meal in which there was none of the simple dainty refinement she had been accustomed to at the home table. She felt restless, nervous and ill at ease in a way she could hardly account for by her distress of the morning.

As soon as possible she hurried back to her room, and in a fever of anxious expectation paced to and fro on the cold floor-cloth which covered it.

A hurried slam of the door—no bell—no, the key was in—he would not wait—and Eric Blandford stood in the doorway, his face blanched with an indefinite fear of he knew not what, staring in amazement at his wife.

"You here, Meg?" he panted.

She ran to him, laying a little white hand on each outstretched arm.

"Here? why yes, dear, where else should I be?"

"Oh, nowhere, of course; forgive me, Meg, I was a fool; but I came in an hour since, and you were not here—and I thought—oh, never mind! it was very foolish what I thought; but you seemed so miserable this morning—I thought, Meg—I—thought you had run away—gone."

The last word was almost inaudible, and ended with a little cry that would have been hysteria in a woman. The man was worn out in nerve and mind and brain, and this had been as he thought the last straw.

She nestled her head in under his arm in a winning, bird-like little way she had, and drew down his head to kiss him. He picked her up in his arms like a child and carried her to the basket lounge that stood in the window recess.

With the tact and sympathetic nature of a strong man he asked no questions, only held her there in all the strength of his manhood's love till she had sobbed her tired, rebellious heart out. For she was tired—tired of fighting that strong conviction that told her she had married the best man in all the world.

At last she looked up through her tears.

"So you did come home after all to dinner, Eric?"

"Yes, I got Wright to do my work, because you know you said you couldn't go up alone to dinner here again—and I thought I'd find you here in our room—but never mind; only, why this, dear?"

He held her at arm's length.

"Are you going out? You didn't tell me."

"Not unless you take me, Eric. Don't you think, dear" (coaxingly) "that we might be extravagant for once and go to the theatre this evening, it's Pinafore this week?"

"And so you put this on" (touching her sleeve gently) "to please me only."

"Isn't that enough excuse for wanting to look pretty, sweetheart," she whispered; "but suppose you get some dinner while I put out your things."

EDNA S. GAMBLE.

"MAY I have the pleasure of seeing you home?" he bashfully asked.

"Certainly," she graciously replied. "There is a big hill just in front of the house, or, if you prefer it, you can climb a big tree in the cow-field. Go anywhere so that you can get a good view."

"AH, how have you amused yourself at the art exhibition?"

"Oh very much! I have admired no picture but yours."

"Really?"

"Yes, indeed; because there was so many people standing before the other pictures that I gave my whole attention to yours to save crowding."

HAVE YOU GOT THAT TEN POUND NOTE?

Thirty Ten-Pound Notes Going Begging!

YOU CAN HAVE ONE FOR THE ASKING!

THE latest scheme of PEARSON'S WEEKLY is unquestionably one of the most astounding that has yet been placed before the readers of any paper. Broadly speaking, the Editor places you in the position of getting ten pounds by simply asking for it.

The idea is this:

Thirty men are wandering about the country, each with a sealed envelope in his pocket. Each envelope is of linen, tough and unbreakable. No one but the Editor knows exactly what is in those envelopes, so the contents cannot be forged. Each contains, as a matter of fact, a letter signed by the Editor authorising the first person who asks for it to the sum of £10.

NOW YOU SEE HOW YOU CAN GET £10 FOR ASKING.

We don't expect you to rush out at once and ask every man you meet if he has the envelope. That would be foolish—a mere waste of time. Moreover, you would probably get a rebuff.

What you should do is to quietly watch everyone you come in contact with. If you think the man you see is likely to be one of these men, you can, in an inoffensive and quiet manner, simply say: "By-the-way, have you seen this scheme?" and show him this page. If he is not one of the £10 gentlemen he will say he hasn't seen the scheme, and will be interested, and thank you for putting the chance of making £10 in his way. If he is one of the Ten Pounders he will quietly and unostentatiously take out his pocket-book and hand you the sealed letter.

This you will at once post to us in a registered envelope, and WE WILL SEND YOU A CHEQUE FOR £10.

THE TEN-POUNDERS

Will travel by the train. Will wear ordinary clothes.
Will stop at all sorts of hotels. Will smoke and drink.
Will attend places of entertainment.
Will look in shop windows.
Will loaf about the beach or parks.

In fact, will behave just like ordinary mortals.

They will wander about our big cities, they will alight from trains at wayside stations, and walk about villages and small towns, and they will altogether give every opportunity to people to get those £10 notes.

If you are at this moment in the train one of these men may be opposite you, or sitting next to you!

Just casually show him this page. If he's one of them you'll get £10.

You will at once say: "Oh, yes, but I might ask a thousand people, and yet not get the right one."

Of course you might; but then, you might ask three, and the third might be the right one. Don't think because you simply move in a limited circle during your day's work that you're not likely to see the right man. All these men will intrude themselves unostentatiously into people's daily lives. They may converse with you on any subjects but those which will give you a hint regarding the ten pounds, unless you broach such subject yourself.

Don't think that you have to ask everyone you meet. Just show the page to a fellow passenger by boat or train, to a chance acquaintance on the beach or on the parade. No harm is done if he's not the right chap. You can both just laugh over it.

ONE THING IS CERTAIN.

The Three Hundred Pounds is wandering about the United Kingdom at this moment. Someone has got to get it. Why not you?

As each £10 has been asked for advertisements will be inserted in the newspapers published in the locality in which the claim has been made.

Every day the Ten Pounders will write to the Editor and tell their experiences—where they had breakfast, where they lunched, whom they sat next to, what those people were like, what they were talking about, and what they ate—in fact, will say just exactly what they have been doing every day. Some of this information will be published in the Daily Express every day and in Pearson's Weekly every week, so you will know just how things are going along.

A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

By William Westall.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XI.

I Start with Dispatches for Bolivar.

The christening performed by an urbane old priest, who fortunately took my orthodoxy for granted, came off as had been arranged, and was followed by a feast at which many guests were present and many toasts drunk. To one of these I was called upon to respond, rather to my dismay, for though I knew Spanish indifferently well, my vocabulary of fine phrases was rather limited, and I had not acquired the art of turning the pretty compliments which the occasion required.

Nevertheless, I did my best, and Pepita was good enough to say that I acquitted myself to admiration. But Pepita was a bit of a wag, if a lady can be a wag, and liked to tease as much as to please.

"Your accent is pure Castilian," quoth she, "and what you said about our darling being born under a lucky star and at a time when the newly-risen sun of liberty is chasing away the last of the black clouds of despotism which have so long darkened this beautiful land, was very nice and very American."

And then she laughed, as well she might, for I had not enough Castilian at my command to say anything so flowery and absurd.

When the time for parting drew near she became more serious, affecting a great interest in my welfare and inquiring whether our expedition was likely to be so dangerous as had been said.

"I can only tell you what I heard. The Vice-President thinks it will be dangerous, and Don Iago is of the same opinion, but I daresay they exaggerate. Besides, dangers are made only to be overcome, and I have no doubt we shall return to Angostura safe and sound," I answered, with somewhat more confidence than I felt.

"I hope you will, Señor Wyvenhoe. It would be terrible if any harm—if you were——" And then, as though the thought were more than she could bear, Pepita covered her face, and added, in a voice broken with emotion, "If you were to fall into the hands of those cruel royalists think how sad it would be for us all, especially for"—here a long pause—"especially for your dear little godson."

On this the fan was turned aside, revealing a merry face and a pair of mischievous black eyes.

"And would be sad for nobody else?" I asked, laughing at my own discomfiture, for I had been foolish enough to think her emotion real.

"Si, señor, for us all. Luisa and I would be very sorry—really. So take care you come back safe and sound and bring Don Iago with you."

And I thought that they might be sorry—for a few minutes. The christening party was the last dissipation in which my compadre and myself indulged before our departure. We had to prepare for the sterner work before us, and there was much to do and several important questions to consider. The first related to the sort of craft we were to take.

Arismendez offered us either a launch or one or more flecheras, as we might prefer. Launches are large, clumsy boats, with a single mast and a big sail, and a caroza or awning in the stern sheets; flecheras, as distinguished from war flecheras, long canoes, cut out very light and paddled by twelve or more Indians, and are as swift as their name "arrow boats" implies.

Their greatest fault is the scantiness of their passenger accommodation, which is limited to a low, narrow cabin wherein there is barely room for two persons. Yet, flecheras being independent of the wind and faster than launches, we did not hesitate in our choice.

"You take flecheras," said the skipper, and we took his advice.

The next question was how many. A large expedition might attract attention and so invite attack, a single boat would be unable to withstand the river pirates, who at that time infested certain parts of the Orinoco, so we asked the General for two flecheras, and as Indians, though the best boatmen, are not warlike, we found ten Zambos who agreed to paddle on condition of having a hand in all the fighting and plundering that might come in our way. It was also arranged to take with us a young fellow of the name of Bonanza, known both to Arismendez and Santleo, but he had nothing to do with the dispatches and did not take the oath.

Our weapons were four double-barrelled guns, one barrel rifled the other smooth, twice as many pistols for ourselves and a dozen muskets for the Zambos, and all carried machetes, long broad-bladed, wooden-handled knives, equally adapted for cutting through bush and cutting down enemies.

So our fighting strength consisted of fourteen well-armed men, enough, as we were assured, to enable us to defy all the ordinary perils of the water. As for those of the land we should have to trust more to strategy and good fortune than to numbers or strength.

When all was ready we received the dispatches and took the oath, which was to the effect that we would neither deliver them nor divulge their contents to any other person than Don Simon Bolivar, the Supreme Chief, that if we were in danger of capture by the enemy and unable to escape we would effectually destroy all the papers placed in our charge; also, that no torture, fear of torture or of death should induce us to betray to the enemy any knowledge we might possess of their nature or of the condition of the Republic, which was both portentous and comprehensive, and a grim incident that happened on the same day emphasised its significance.

A courier had arrived from the army without his dispatches, of which he had been deprived by the Spaniards. It had been impossible, as he averred, to destroy them. After hearing his report and asking him a few questions, Arismendez ordered the poor devil to be straightway hanged, and when we left Angostura his body was swinging from a gibbet.

It was a cruel and, as I thought, an impolitic deed. The man might have been surprised or taken prisoner in circumstances which rendered the destruction of his dispatches impossible, and had he deserted or said that after destroying them he had escaped, when escape seemed impossible, he would have saved his life instead of being punished for telling the truth.

Santleo agreed with me.

"The General is too much given to killing people," he said. "They all are. It is a warning to us. If we are surprised with our dispatches, which the saints forbid, we won't return to Angostura, mio amigo. We have not sworn to do that."

"Do the Spaniards ever torture prisoners?"

"I believe so, and they say that Morillo sometimes does it out of pure devilry, not merely to extort confession."

"And the patriots?"

"I never heard of any of our generals sanctioning the torture of prisoners, though I should not be surprised if some of the baser of them did. Spaniards were always cruel. We have all some Spanish blood in our veins, and an admixture of Indian or negro does not improve the strain."

"Some Spanish blood! Why, I thought you were of the blue blood?"

"You are mistaken."

"But there is nothing of the Indian or negro about you," quoth I, glancing at Santleo's red-brown hair and blue eyes.

"No, sir," he returned proudly and emphatically. "I thank Heaven that the mixture in my blood is of the noblest on earth. It is agreed that we start to-morrow at daybreak, is it not? It should be earlier, only I think several of our friends who don't rise before the sun have expressed a desire to see us off."

"Bueno! It is agreed," I replied, and so the talk ended, Don Iago being obviously indisposed to say aught more about himself, which was provoking, the little he had said having whetted the curiosity which Pepita's account of him had excited.

The friends who came to see us off were Señor Calzada, with his two fair daughters, and a few others, including of course the skipper, who if he felt as unhappy as I did must have been rather miserable, for we had become warmly attached to each other, and I was loth to lose him, yet we tried to put a good face on it and were both outwardly cheerful.

"I wish I were going with you. You will see more than I shall," he said as we walked down to the quay.

"But I shall not see Mrs. Barnish. It would take a good deal of Venezuela to compensate you for missing her."

"You are right. I would not swap her for the whole country, with its alligators, mosquitoes, centipedes, and snakes thrown in. You may laugh, Wyvenhoe, but your turn will come."

"It has come—and gone, thank goodness. I may marry sometime as a matter of duty, but I don't think the woman exists whom I could like as well as I like you, dear friend."

We found Santleo and Bonanza at the river side, and were presently joined by the Cazadas. Luisa looked unhappy, and had hard work to control her voice and restrain her tears. Pepita was unusually quiet and subdued.

"Do take care of yourself and don't run into unnecessary danger," she whispered. "We shall all look anxiously for your news."

I observed that Don Iago and Luisa were also having a few words apart.

After being embraced by Señor Cazada and several other caballeros and shaking hands with Cautley, we went on board the flecheras, the moorings were cast loose, the patrons (pilots) gave the word: "Vaya con Dios" (Forward in God's name), and we sailed away, followed by a chorus of adios and the skipper's hearty "Good luck and a pleasant journey."

Santleo and I had to sit as close together as two "insides" in a narrow coach, our shelter being a sort of open tent in which we could neither lie down nor stretch our legs.

"Luisa and Pepita are nice girls, and I have known Luisa longer than you have known Pepita," said Don Iago, suppressing a sigh.

"You are sorry to leave her?"

"Yes, and I think she was sorry to be left, poor girl

We sailed away, followed by a chorus of adios.

She and her people have been very kind. They made me feel at home, and partings always remind me of——"

And then, without completing the sentence, he sighed again and relapsed into silence, and I, being also in a melancholy mood, made no attempt to keep up the conversation, though I should have liked to know of what it was that partings always reminded my compadre.

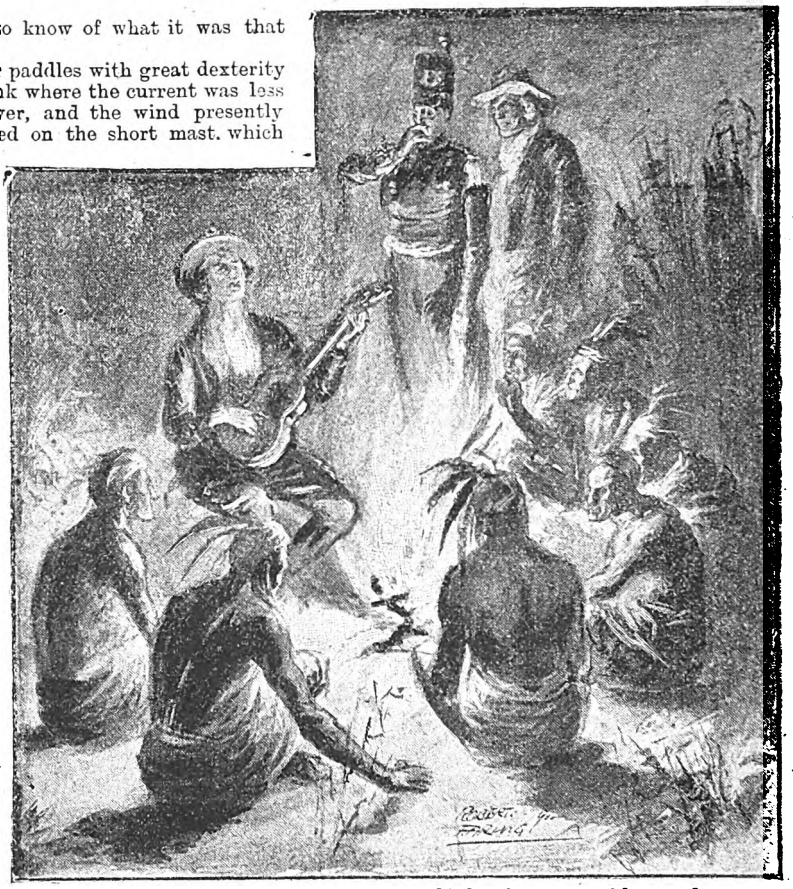
The Indians rowed well, handling their paddles with great dexterity and keeping the canoe near the right bank where the current was less powerful than in the middle of the river, and the wind presently getting up a small square sail was hoisted on the short mast, which proved a great help. The crew of our flechera numbered twenty-four, exclusive of the patron, of whom sixteen paddled, two abreast, while the remainder rested, and when their turn came relieved as many of their comrades. The other boat being smaller had fewer men, nineteen all told.

Now and then, by way of variety, we changed places, Bonanza joining Santleo and myself John Ready, or vice versâ. Above Angostura the river scenery is of a different character from that lower down. The country is higher and for the most part less densely wooded, and in many parts quite open, affording views of well-watered savannahs thronged with innumerable herds of wild horses and cattle, and groups of small islands, shaded with trees and covered with luxuriant vegetation, stretched from shore to shore.

But the patrons always give overhanging trees a wide berth; snakes lurk in the branches, basking and flashing their brilliant colours in the sun, and though the greater part were probably harmless, the dreaded cascabel (rattlesnake) was generally among them, and a few of these dropping into the boat would have caused trouble.

And so we fared all day, the Indians neither stopping nor slackening, even during the hottest hours, and when evening came we landed on a sand bank, which seemed a convenient place for passing the night. Wood was gathered, a fire kindled, and coffee made. We had brought with us a supply of tasajo (jerked beef) and biscuits, and the Indians found in the sand several nests of turtle eggs, which make excellent eating, and formed a toothsome addition to our repast.



Bonanza fetched his guitar and sang some old Spanish songs of love and war.

After supper Bonanza fetched his guitar and sang some old Spanish songs of love and war, then several chansons du pays, chanted in a wild recitative, the Indians joining in the chorus, so that we had quite a musical evening.

A gay dare-devil caballero was Antonio Bonanza, with a dark skin, a handsome face and gipsy-like eyes, full of quips and cranks, spirits that nothing could damp, and an incessant talker.

When the singing and the talk round the fire were over we rolled ourselves in our cobijas and lay down on the sand, which made an easy bed, but the mosquitoes made sleep impossible; we could only turn and groan, and turn again, and as a last resort creep to the lee side of the fire whereon the men had heaped green wood, though, owing to the pungency of the smoke, the remedy was almost as bad as the disease, and we rose at daybreak weary and unrefreshed. Then, after a breakfast of coffee, plantains and biscuits, and a plunge in the river, we continued our journey.

The next day and the next, and the day after that were merely repetitions of the first. The scenery was always fine, the animal life always abundant and wonderful, but the constrained position we were compelled to adopt by day and the mosquitoes by night took the edge off our enjoyment. Of human life we saw little. Nearly every village we passed had been burnt by the royalists and deserted by its inhabitants, save, perhaps, a few squalid women and wandering Indians.

Now and then we landed to stretch our legs and replenish our larder with our guns, but we never ventured far from the boats, for we had been warned that the country, as well as the river, was infested by robbers, and that the Indians were not to be trusted, except to betray us to the enemy—foreign or native—there being still Venezuelans who had not renounced their allegiance to Spain.

About halfway between Angostura and Caycara we came to a pass known as La Boca del Inferno (Hell's Mouth), the most remarkable and impressive part of the Orinoco I had yet seen. The river first narrows, then widens out, then narrows again, forming a vast and beautiful pool in which hundreds of alligators, porpoises, manatees and water-hogs, and millions of fish disport themselves.

Higher up is the Boca, a point where the main body of the mighty stream is forced between two immense pillars of rock and hurled into the pool like a hurricane. Even the largest trees are sucked under as soon as they enter this strait, not to reappear until they have passed the pool.

At the first view of that portentous flood of urgent water, lashing against the rocks up which it leaps in tongues of foam, whirling its spray high in the air, rushing wildly between its confines, I thought we had come to the end of our journey, that further we could not go. But thanks to the courage and dexterity of our boatmen we won through, sometimes warping, sometimes rowing, after a long and hard struggle, and presently finding a suitable spot for a bivouac rewarded them with a good supper washed down with a double allowance of aguardiente.

"How about the robbers and pirates who, as it is said, infest these parts? Are there any?" I asked Don Antonio as we sat by the fire.

"At any rate they seem to be rather scarce. We see none," quoth he.

"Wait a bit, there is plenty of time, and river pirates no more show their colours than land robbers announce their coming," said Santleo laughing. "We may have seen both without knowing it. I did not like the looks of that big launch we passed just before entering the narrows."

"What was there wrong with the launch?"

"With the boat itself—nothing; it was the crew I was thinking of. There were too many of them, several armed. However, we have nothing to fear from her; she is going down stream and the rapids are between us."

"Fear! We have nothing to fear from any of them armed as we are," exclaimed Bonanza.

"That depends on circumstances. You are spoiling for a fight, I think, Don Antonio," said Santleo smiling.

"Well, I should not object to a brush with the rascals, just to keep our hands in."

"I should, and so I think would Señor Wyvenhoe. We have our dispatches to think of, and there is neither glory nor aught else to be gained by an encounter with pirates. However, as their aim is plunder and they don't like hard knocks they are not likely to trouble us unless we grow careless and let them take us at a disadvantage."

I don't think we grew more careless as touching pirates, for we always set a watch at night, and whenever we met a large launch or several canoes in company kept them at arm's length and looked to our weapons, for we had heard it was the pirates' way to give friendly greeting, ask for news, or, pretending to be traders, offer something for sale, and so take their victims unawares.

But we went oftener ashore to stretch our legs than we had done, and bought plantains and tazajo from the Indians, which, seeing that some of them were supposed to be in league with the robbers, was perhaps not very prudent. But immunity always did make for indifference and always will.

One day we found a village which had escaped destruction and were cordially welcomed by the alcalde, a polite, fair-seeming old gentleman, who assured us that no royalist troops or robbers had been seen in the neighbourhood for a long time, and offered us quarters for the night, of course for a consideration.

It had perhaps been wiser to refuse, but the temptation of a quiet night in comfortable beds was irresistible, and after a good supper we turned in and slept the sleep of the just, for though the patio where our cots were placed was not free from mosquitoes, they were of a much less blood-thirsty sort than those nearer to the river, and did not disturb us.

The alcalde, who averred himself an ardent patriot, though very courteous was also very curious, asking with some persistence questions which it did not suit us to answer. He knew we hailed from Angostura, we could hardly hail from anywhere else, and it was obvious from his manner and his remarks that he had a shrewd suspicion we carried dispatches and were going to the front.

When morning came he first invited, then urged us to prolong our stay

"You had better," he said as a final argument. "El rio es malo" (the river is bad).

"How so?" I asked him. "The river was good enough when we left it, and the weather has not changed for the worse."

On which the old gentleman wagged his head portentously, looked preternaturally solemn, and drew his thumb across his throat with a significance there was no mistaking.

Don Iago laughed.

"You mean we may have our throats cut," he said. "You need have no apprehension on that score. We can take care of ourselves, and those who interfere with us are more likely to get their throats cut than to cut ours. Vamonos, amigos. Adios, Señor Alcalde."

"Adios, señores," he answered surlily. "All the same, el rio es malo, and you will regret not having heeded my warning."

"I distrust that old fellow," said I when we were under weigh.

"So do I for several reasons, one of which has only occurred to me a few minutes since. If I had thought of it last night, as I ought to have done, I should have been against accepting his hospitality," returned Santleo.

"And what is that?"

"The fact of his being there and the village not having been destroyed. Royalist troops were undoubtedly hereabouts not many months ago, and if the alcalde had not made himself useful to them they would have burnt the place down about his ears. As likely as not he is a royalist at heart, and gave us quarters only to find out who we are."

"But what could be his motive for pressing us to prolong our stay?"

"Suppose he is in league with the pirates and had contrived a nice little scheme for surprising the flecheras while we were fooling round here? Or suppose there is a detachment of Spaniards not more than seven or eight leagues off, that he has sent an Indian scout with word that there are three rebel officers in the village whom he has reason to believe are carrying dispatches to Bolivar?"

"He would want to keep us here until they came?"

"Just so."

"Por Dios! Let us go back and give the old traitor his deserts," exclaimed Bonanza.

"I could not consent to that. It would be murder and of no earthly use. The best thing we can do is to hurry to the boats and get away quickly," said I. "Is not that your opinion, Don Iago?"

"Of course, and the more quickly the better. Double quick march!"

On this we went on at a run, though it was warm work, and were greatly relieved to see the flecheras lying in the cove where we had left them. After what had happened I should not have been surprised to find them either plundered or gone.

So soon as we were out of the cove and away from the trees sail was made, the wind being fair, and we went on our way, if not exactly rejoicing yet feeling devoutly thankful that we had come off so well. At any rate, it was my feeling, and I know it was my compadre's.

Had the alcalde got a few men together and fallen on us while we slept he might have taken both us and our dispatches; but for so bold a course he probably lacked both the resolution and the means, or as we had arms he may have feared for his skin. Treachery was more in his line, and from what subsequently came to pass I have not the least doubt that had we tarried an hour or two longer the boat would have been captured, and we should have had to fight for our lives, with scant hopes of saving them.

Two hours after leaving the cove, though owing to the winding of the river we had not gone far as the crow flies, four men in a canoe half-a-mile ahead were observed paddling about as if they were on the look out for something, and they no sooner saw us than they disappeared, which in the light of our recent experience struck both Santleo and myself as suspicious, and the flecheras were ordered to keep further out.

Soon afterwards two flecheras full of men and two canoes shot out into the river, no doubt from the creek into which the small canoe had disappeared.

This was more suspicious still, and though it by no means followed that they meant to molest us we made ready for action, opened the ammunition boxes, loaded our rifles and pistols, and the Zambos were ordered to load their muskets, all of which was done with as little movement as possible so as not to attract the attention of our possible enemies, who, after going halfway across the river, had headed up stream and were almost abreast with ourselves.

"I think they mean mischief," said Don Iago; "but if they are pirates and what I have heard of their ways be true they won't bear up and engage like men, but pretend to be friendly and try to take us unawares."

"And if they do?"

"What say you?"

"Don't give 'em a chance—fire first."

"So say I."

"If we are sure their intentions are hostile."

"Sure we cannot be; we can only judge by their ways, and it were madness to throw away a chance. However, as we are not to fight unless it cannot be avoided let us try to give them the go by. That will show whether they mean honestly."

The idea was a good one, and the crews of the two flecheras were ordered to increase their speed gradually. The strange flecheras followed suit, paddling in a style which showed that we had no chance of outpacing them. On this our fellows went slower, but slow or fast the strangers kept abreast of us, as yet, however, out of speaking distance.

"You see," remarked Santleo significantly.

The Zambos were now ordered to prime their muskets and lie down in the bottom of the boats, and we put our pistols in our belts and laid out pieces and swords within arm's length. The second boat with Bonanza and Ready on board was close by on our right and between us and the left bank of the river.

Meanwhile the strangers were edging towards us, but we kept steadily on our course as if we neither feared nor suspected them. Presently one of the flecheras drew nearer, leaving the other and the canoes a few hundred yards in the rear, probably in order not to alarm us.

"Buenas dias amigos!" (Good day, friends!) sang out a man in the bow of the leading flechera, at the same time holding up a bunch of plantains and a basket of cassava-bread as though he wanted to trade, but the flash of machete blades and the gleam of gun-barrels belied his friendly overtures.

"Bear to the left," I said to the pilot, and then to the Zambos: "Fire!"

On which all the muskets and rifles went off, doing dire execution among the pirates, who immediately replied, killing one of our Indians and wounding several, but our volley caused so much confusion and disabled so many of their rowers that the enemy's boat, left for a minute to herself, swung round with her prow to the stream.

"Vaya con Dios! Row for your lives, men!" cried Don Antonio, and without more ado drove right into the pirate flechera, turning her over like a log.

It was a brave deed and well timed, for the second flechera had just come within range, but we had done enough for safety, and leaving her to pick up the people who were struggling in the water we went ahead followed by a few musket shots and a flight of arrows from the canoes, which hurt nobody.

When Santleo and I had done what we could for the wounded I ordered the dead man to be thrown overboard, on which the Indians howled like Irishmen at a wake, and the patron told us that it was a part of their religious belief that the body of an Indian cast into the river became a voracious alligator and avenged himself for the indignity by preying on mankind. He said also that unless we would let them bury their departed comrade in their own way they would stop rowing and desert at the first opportunity.

We consented naturally, and when, three or four hours later, we came to a likely looking place, ran into a small creek and made fast to the side. The body was then put into a hammock, which was slung on a pole and carried by two Indians, who were occasionally relieved.

Santleo, Bonanza, and myself followed the funeral procession, leaving Ready in charge of the boats, only the patron and about a dozen of the Indians going with us.

After walking nearly an hour we came to a glade, which the Indians thought suitable for their purpose. Leaving them to prepare a grave and celebrate the funeral obsequies untroubled by our presence, we went off in pursuit of game, following a track made by cattle and deer through the brushwood, and taking with us a Zambo to carry whatever we might shoot.

Don Antonio, elated by our praises of his gallantry, was in unusually high spirits, chattering almost incessantly, and had just broken into a song when without a word of explanation he darted off like a deer and the next moment disappeared at a turn in the path.

"What a harum-scarum fellow he is," I remarked, laughing.

"No doubt of that. All the same he is as brave as a lion and as sharp as a hawk. What has he seen, I wonder? A petticoat, perhaps."

"I daresay. He is a great admirer of the sex. However, we shall soon know. He won't go far."

We were still talking when an Indian came up at a run, breathless and panting.

"Soldiers! soldiers!" he gasped, trembling like a leaf.

We thought the man was mad, but when he had recovered his wind and pulled himself together he said that having seen several lancers through the trees he had run on to warn us, and as he was evidently in earnest and could have no interest in deceiving us we were constrained to believe him.

Had Don Antonio been with us we should have hurried back to the boats at best speed, but as leaving him was out of the question we primed our pistols and cocked our guns, and going cautiously forward presently perceived our friend leading a troop horse which bore on its back a lancer, his head, which was bleeding profusely, hanging on one side, his heels on the other, and apparently lifeless.

Bonanza's usually bright face showed great concern; he looked continually about him, his eyes were never still. When we met he whispered, glancing backward: "As you value your lives no noise." Then he led the horse into a side path, beckoning to us to follow him.

SHORT STORIES ABOUT LANDLADIES.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "An American Emperor," by Louis Tracy, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. E. M. Wood, of 28 Croydon Road, Bournbrook, Birmingham. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about CATCH PHRASES (such as "THERE'S 'AIR") and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, September 10. Post-cards only, please.

Smart Woman That.

A LADY on the look-out for lodgings knocked at the door of a house where the notice, "Apartments" was shown.

"Come in," said the refined landlady, who answered the door in her walking out costume. "I have not been accustomed to letting," she said, as her visitor sat down. "My father was in a good position, and kept a coachman."

"Indeed," said the lady, "I wanted a bedroom and share of sitting-room."

"This is my sitting-room, and I didn't think I should have to give it up," said the landlady, "still, between one lady and another lady——"

"How much?" began the visitor.

"It is hard to go into these details," furtively wiping her eyes. "You may think it strange, a reduced lady——"

"Oh, I am sure you are, I should give as little trouble as possible, a tea, dinner——"

"This is my father's likeness," said the landlady briskly. "He was a perfect gentleman. A lady——"

At this moment a man entered with a heavy tread. It was a policeman.

"Sorry to disturb you, ladies, but I have a warrant here for the landlady on a charge of abstracting a £5 note from the desk of her late lodger, Mr. Sharpnose."

"Oh, and I have nearly taken her apartments," said the true landlady, pointing to her visitor. "This is terrible, and I thought her a real lady."

And in spite of protestations the innocent visitor was hustled off to the police station, where she had some trouble in making them see the mistake they had made. Meantime the "lady" landlady had time to clear off.

Why She Wanted Him Saved.

THE other day a party from Yorkshire were on a boating excursion, and by some accident suddenly upset, to the great distress of the people on shore.

One old lady outdid all the others in her entreaties to save "the young man with the red hair."

Her appeal was heeded, and the young man was saved.

The onlookers congratulated the old lady on the rescue of her son, but she exclaimed that he was not her son.

"Your nephew, then?"

"No, he ain't no relation of mine, but he owes me 7s. 6d. for board and lodgings."

Looking Ahead.

A LANDLADY, keeping a large lodging-house near Dublin, was surprised the other day when the servant came and told her that a man had called and asked permission to look over the establishment.

Thinking he wanted lodgings she made no objection, although naturally she thought it a strange request, and before he left she asked him why he wanted to make such a close examination of the premises.

On this he naïvely explained that they had had a meeting in the village and drawn lots for the various properties in the neighbourhood which they were to have when the Socialists were in power.

He had drawn her house, and he wanted to inspect his lot.

Mr. Bowser and the Landlady.

IN order to deaden his disappointment at the failure of his farm-house scheme, and also as a kind of solatium to his wife and the cook, Mr. Bowser decided that they should spend a few days by the sea, and accordingly they visited the popular seaside town of Fleece-'em-all, and put up at a lodging-house kept by a very voluble female, who described herself as a "pore, hard-working, struggling widow."

For a time, to wax poetical, "all went merry as a marriage bell," but it was not destined to last, for the fates, with their usual perversity, had decreed that Mr. Bowser's feelings should once more receive a rude shock.

In an evil moment he asked for his bill, which was handed to him with commendable promptness.

And such a bill! It was enough to "stagger humanity," and Mr. Bowser reeled and sank into a state of utter collapse beneath its overpowering influence.

In the course of a few minutes he had recovered sufficiently to ring for the landlady, and when she appeared he received her with a torrent of expletives and wound up as follows:

"Madam, I was under the impression that by staying here we were assisting a poor struggling woman, instead of which I find that we have been intrusting ourselves to the rapacities of a human pelican."

"What, me a pelican?" screamed the landlady.

"Yes, you," replied Mr. Bowser, "for nothing but a pelican could show such a monstrous bill!"

How He Got Warm.

In Cambuslang, Glasgow, lives a landlady noted for the small fires supplied to her lodgers. The house is situate near a large ironworks, which belches forth large tongues of fire.

One winter evening she was much surprised on entering one of the rooms to find the occupant with the window raised and he was sitting with his feet hanging outside.

Visions of suicide rose vividly before her, so she said in her most motherly pay-the-bill tone of voice:

"Don't you think you would be better in bed?"

"Yes," was the reply, "I was just warming my feet in front of the ironworks before I go."

"Settled" in Threepenny Bits.

I am a curate; a proverbially pale, not young, but poor curate. Until quite recently I was in lodgings, and being, although a curate, honest, it was my wont to settle with my landlady every Monday morning.

One Monday I was paying her as usual, and with the money I gave her were two threepenny bits.

"Ah, sir!" playfully said my landlady, "you curates are all the same; you knows how to find 'em. Why, the last gentleman who was with me—a curate gentleman as well, sir—'e used to settle with me every month, sir, and every time 'e used to pay me in threepenny bits!"

The Lodgers' Revenge.

Two young friends, on finishing their apprenticeship as printers, secured situations and lodgings in a Lancashire town. They purchased their own provisions, and every Saturday they bought a certain quantity of flour, which their landlady converted into "home-made" bread for them.

But as time went on, their loaves gradually diminished in size and weight, until, at length, the painful fact that that good lady was appropriating their flour forced itself upon them. They thereupon resolved on revenge.

It was their usual custom to dine on Sundays at their landlady's table. On that day a large meat pie formed the principal item of their menu; so on the very next Saturday after their discovery, they purchased a few pounds less of flour, buying instead a quantity of plaster of Paris to compensate for the deficient weight.

The flour and the plaster of Paris they carefully mixed, and awaited the result.

Sunday arrived, and, as usual, at the dinner the pie, which had been baked early in the day so that it might be "nice and cold," was prominent. Grace having been said the good lady commenced operations on the pie, but to her astonishment, try as she liked, she could not cut its crust, the knife slipping as from the back of a turtle.

Amused at the woman's efforts, the young men lost control of themselves and laughed loudly.

"What have you got to laugh at?" cried the perspiring dame.

"Oh, at nothing particular," was the reply, "only take our advice, and make certain that when you go to our flour-bag, that you don't help yourself from the one in which we keep plaster of Paris!"

Done!

In a Northern temperance hotel, a party of visitors were making merry one evening in one of the upper bedrooms, after having provided themselves with a supply of the best "mountain dew."

The worthies, however, had a fancy for whisky hot, but the difficulty was to get the hot water without causing any suspicion as to its intended purpose. Finally, by the aid of "palm oil" (in the shape of a shilling), the boots was induced to bring up a large jug of hot water "for shaving."

But Nemesis awaited the drinkers. As the boots was ascending the stairs with the hot water, the proprietress (a very prim and strict old lady) met him, and inquired his destination.

"It's hot water for shaving for twenty-two, ma'am."

"For shaving at half-past nine at night; never!"

"Well, ma'am, that's what the gentleman says."

"All right, then, wait a minute."

The landlady opened the nearest bedroom door, entered, and picked up some soap. Returning to the boots she threw the soap into the hot water, with the remark:

"If the gentleman wants it for shaving he can't object to the soap; so take it up now."

The Boarder at Breakfast.

"I have been reading a very interesting article on coffee," said Mrs. Smith, as Mr. Hunker passed up his cup for refilling.

"Being about a beverage, the article couldn't be dry," observed Mr. Hunker playfully, and then added: "Three lumps of sugar, please."

Something like a frown passed over the landlady's face at the boarder's remark, but she continued:

"The article was one which deserves a large circulation, I think, for the good of the race. It was on the injurious effects of coffee drinking. The author said we are becoming a nation of coffee topers. The pernicious effects of too much coffee drinking he set forth in an exceedingly strong light. Among the serious results likely to follow, he enumerates a sallow skin, shattered power, and in some cases he thought consumption might be traced to the inordinate use of the beverage. The author said that appalling statistics could be produced of the ravages of the coffee-drinking habit among the English people."

"It was coffee he was talking about, was it?" asked Mr. Hunker, as he rose to go.

"It was, Mr. Hunker."

"Then I don't think we need worry ourselves."

CLEOPATRA'S ASP.

ACTORS accustomed only to the short journeys and civilised surroundings which are connected with a tour through the English provinces, can have little notion of what it is to be "on the road" in the Western States of America. It is not only that the country and the people are less civilised, but both are so different. Side by side with the strongest marks of primitive habitation you find instances of the latest invention.

The Pullman car startles the antelope and the prairie dog in its passage; advertisements of Mustang Liniment are daubed upon immemorial cliffs; and every little township of wooden houses has its church, its newspaper, and its Lyceum.

It was in the latter building (which for the benefit of the uninitiated I may explain, serves much the same purposes as an English town hall) that the travelling company that I had arranged to join at Kansas city, in the spring of 188—, usually gave its performances. It is surprising, I may remark in passing, how advanced the Americans of the West rn "cities" are in the arrangement of these local theatres. In most of them some decent stock scenery may be found; and the rooms are nearly always clean, and the general arrangement most systematic.

The company I was about to join was one of those struggling combinations of which there are so many travelling the States. Upon the basis of a small amount of capital and a large stock of histrionic enthusiasm, the "leading man" of the company, who was also the manager, had "organised" the troupe for the exposition to the benighted denizens of the Far West of the beauties of the legitimate drama in general, and of his own acting in particular.

His wife was a little woman from Florida, and the darkness of her complexion and a certain blueness of the tinge of her finger-nails spoke pretty decidedly of an admixture of negro blood in herself or in her ancestors. I found, soon after I joined the company, that she had been tried in Shakesperian leading parts, but had so egregiously failed in them that even to the partial eyes of her spouse the fact was evident that a substitute for her in these rôles must be found. The result was an advertisement in a New York theatrical paper, and my acceptance thereof, decided partly by the fact that I had been "resting" for a tediously long period, but more by the opportunity which seemed to be offered to me of gaining experience in the higher walks of the drama.

I found the manager, who rejoiced in the Transatlantically aristocratic name of Calhoun, extremely polite, indeed, perhaps rather too much so, considering that his wife was a member of the company. I must say, however, that this amiability on Mr. Calhoun's part arose much more from histrionic selfishness than from anything approaching to gallantry. Like most enthusiasts, he would have sacrificed anything to improve the effect of his performances; and the fact that in me he found a leading lady, who, whilst competent to sustain the characters allotted to her to the satisfaction of his audiences, was yet sufficiently modest to adopt his views of the proper treatment of a dramatic situation, had, I am sure, more to do with his cordiality than any personal admiration for myself. I need hardly say that the "views" alluded to generally dictated giving a prominence in his own performances and a retiring reserve in mine which was not in every case warranted by the author's text.

As for Mrs. Calhoun (Pepita, as her husband called her—an example we may as well, for the sake of brevity, follow), she showed her dislike for me from the moment we met. It was, perhaps, too much to expect an actress who had made a failure in "leading business," and who had been relegated to the Charmians and Emilias of Shakesperian representations, to welcome with cordiality the individual who came to take her place.

At the same time, I think Pepita might have been a little less demonstrative of her antipathy. When we met in the passages of the various theatres which we visited she swept past after the slightest of nods, turning to me with marked disdain her rounded, though somewhat swarthy shoulders; and whilst I was upon the stage I often caught a glimpse of her standing in the wings, glaring upon me with eyes that shone with the lurid glare of bitter detestation.

I soon discovered that, in addition to her hatred of me as a dramatic rival, Pepita cherished a feeling of jealousy of another kind. Knowing how deeply artistic egotism drowned every other voice in Mr. Calhoun's breast, I was much amused at this ridiculous fancy on her part; and I am much ashamed to say that, to annoy Pepita, I often elaborated the "business" between Mr. Calhoun and myself, especially in scenes of an amorous nature. I had, however, to be careful how I did this; for the tragedian, whose mind was entirely occupied with himself and the effect which he was producing upon the audience, was inclined to be uneasy at my thus putting myself forward; and I saw clearly that the day on which I cast him distinctly into the shade would be the day on which I should receive a firm, but courteous "notice."

I will pass over several weeks of experience of this sort, during which I had firmly established myself in the good graces of the various members of the company (with the exception always of the hostile Pepita), and come to the time of our visit to the little city of Selma, in the State of——.

I generally made a point, in the places in which we played, of making the acquaintance of a few of the more respectable of the inhabitants. Manners are much franker and more simple in this particular than with you in England, and a well-conducted young woman in a travelling company is received with hospitality by the unconventional people of the Western townships.

During our stay at Selma I had made the acquaintance of the family of Deacon Clay, which consisted of one strapping girl and three stalwart sons, all about (or over) six feet in height.

The eldest and most stalwart of these three was named Saul, and it was he who in the forenoons during the first three days of our stay at Selma showed me the "lions" of the place, the waterfall, the saw-mill, and the "Maiden's Leap"—for Selma, like other places, had its romantic traditions. On the fourth, as I, like Oliver, "asked for more," he proposed to take me on a visit to "Old Leathers." I consented, and on our way to this curious personage's abode he gave me some information about him.

Old Leathers, it appeared, was a harmless lunatic, who lived on odd jobs and the charity of the neighbouring farmers. His particular weakness was a friendship for snakes in general, and rattlesnakes in particular. To avoid the danger of being bitten by these reptiles, he invariably wore a suit of soft leather, boots, jerkin, and all—hence his cognomen.

We started from the town in one of those boxes upon wheels which are dignified in the West by the name of "waggons"; and after a jolting drive of several miles arrived at a glen between two "bluffs." At the top of this Saul fastened the horses, and led me carefully down the narrow path which wound its way to the bottom of the little valley.

It was bestrewn with masses of rock of all sizes and shapes, three or four of which, thrown together by some convulsion of nature, formed a sort of cave between them. Pausing some twenty feet above this, Saul hallooed, and a figure, which I saw at once must be Old Leathers, appeared in answer to the summons, like a demon through a trap in a pantomime.

The old man was eccentrically clad in the suit of leather in which I had been prepared to see him attired, and the skin of a raccoon with the tail hanging gracefully behind, formed a charactistic covering for his grey head. His features were deeply marked with age and a hard frontier life, but had an appearance of haleness and health only seen in those habituated to an open-air existence.

"Here's a young lady come all the way from New York to see you," said Saul, with pardonable exaggeration. Old Leathers took off his cap and bowed with the air of a polished courtier. "Can't you show her your pets?"

"Why, yes," said the old man. "But you must not be frightened," he continued with a genial smile. "It's not every one that fancies 'em. Keep quiet and I will bring them out."

Though considerably nervous, I concealed a cowardice which I felt that Saul would have despised, and was silent, whilst the old man took a flute from his pocket, and began to play one of those "Christy Minstrel" airs which are so popular in the United States.

Then I saw a sight which astonished me. From under each of the numerous blocks of stone which were scattered around came a snake. "Copper-heads," spotted with copper-coloured splotches not only on the head but all over the body; "garter-snakes," grey and yellow-green, were there; but the majority of the audience at Old Leathers' concert belonged to the species designated in natural history books as the "deadly" rattlesnake.

They came forward and curled and wound themselves about Old Leathers' ankles, their heads gliding upwards over his legs, moving as if in caress, and then falling to the ground, rising again to repeat the motion. The quaint figure of the old frontiers-man; the grotesque contrast between the strains of "Mother, I am dying fast," and the general surroundings; the background of the rocky cliffs and irregular rock-strewn grass; and the sight of the ever-moving, silent reptiles, whom my fancy and their constant restless motion multiplied into thrice their number, had a strange effect upon my senses.

Louder and longer sounded the soft notes of the flute; faster and faster coiled and uncoiled themselves the supple bodies of the snakes; till, at last, I felt a sort of mesmeric drowsiness coming over me, and had I gazed at this strange spectacle much longer, I believe, despite my horror of snakes in general, and "rattlers" in particular, I should have left the spot where I was standing and joined in a tarantala dance with Old Leathers' favourites.

But the music ceased, and almost before he had time to put up his instrument every snake had disappeared as suddenly as it had come.

I pressed the old man to take a reward for his exhibition, but he courteously refused.

"If you would like to buy one, miss," he said. "I sell many to menageries, and send some to England." Seeing my horror, he added: "You would not be the first, miss. Only this morning——"

"Oh, no!" I interrupted him in horror.

Thanking him for his courtesy, we departed as we had come, but by what seemed an easier path.

As we climbed it I noticed on the ground a glove. On picking it up I saw it was a woman's, and abstractedly put it into my pocket, and we gained the waggon and drove home as fast as Deacon Clay's two trotters could carry us.

It had been arranged that we should play Antony and Cleopatra on that particular evening, by particular desire of the deacon and leading inhabitants of Selma, and I asked Saul to drive quickly that I might be back in time for the "call" at twelve.

On arriving at the hall, I found a warm altercation going on between Mr. Calhoun and his wife. She had formerly attempted the part of Cleopatra, and I believe it was the one in which she was least unsatisfactory.

But I really believe that her strongest objection to my undertaking the rôle arose from her distaste for the demonstrations of affection which the great dramatist's lines suggest between the amorous Antony and the Egyptian queen.

I was obliged to be a listener to this connubial dispute; and from what I heard I gathered that the conduct of Pepita had of late not been entirely exemplary. She had, it seemed, been "making too free" with a party of "cow-boys" (cattle drovers from Texas) who had honoured Selma with a visit; and it was as much to teach her a lesson as to secure an adequate representation of the part that her husband refused, in not too civil terms, to alter the cast of Antony and Cleopatra, Pepita might play Charmian if she chose; otherwise she might "leave it alone."

At this refusal the passionate temper of the mestizo flared into flame. She first of all poured out upon the devoted head of her husband a flood of abuse which I need not write down here; and then turning to me, she scolded me soundly for having "supplanted" her, as she called it.

"Yes," she said, her black eyes flashing, her nostrils dilated, and her hand clenched in a style that, if she could only have reproduced it on the stage, would have made her successful as a tragedienne, "you have taken my bread out of my mouth, and you have taken my husband; but, mark my word, you won't live to enjoy either!" Then, her eyes falling upon the glove which happened to be protruding from the pocket of my ulster, she cried: "Thief! Would you take everything?" snatched the glove away, and dashed, weeping wildly, out of the place.

I was surprised to discover that it was Pepita's glove which I had picked up, and an uneasy wonder how it came to be left where I had found it hovered, so to speak, at the back of my brains for some hours. But, as these were also occupied with the very harassing work of rehearsing, it was not strange that my "secondary musings" had no definite result.

There was a sort of suppressed hostility in Pepita's manner when we met at the theatre in the evening. She was paler than usual, and more reflective and abstracted. She played Charmian as if in a dream. There was evidently something on, or in her mind which made her manner so unusual. Once, when her husband attempted to enter her dressing-room, she slammed the door in his face, and bolted it on the inside.

The play proceeded, as usual, till we came to the well-known scene of Cleopatra's suicide in the last act. The actor who played the clown was ushered in by Cleopatra's handmaidens, and in answer to my question, "Hast thou the pretty worm of Nilus there, that kills and hurts not?" delivered the speech set down for him.

While waiting for my cue, I was harassed by a sound for which I could not account. It was a gentle "whirr," like a dry pea rattling in its pod. I tried dreamily to localise this noise; and it is a curious instance of the difficulty of decision in these cases that it was not until I had actually taken the basket into my hand that I found that the sound was caused by something inside it.

The exigencies of the stage leave no time for hesitation. Come what may, the business of a scene must not stop. I took the basket from the clown, and, after speaking the lines which precede the action, raised the lid, and took what I presumed was the usual "property" snake from its interior.

I shall never forget the shudder of repulsion that ran over my body as I felt the clammy, oozing thing which I had grasped. A sort of restriction of the muscles took place which prevented my loosing my hold, even when I saw that it contained a large rattlesnake, which, stirred to a high pitch of anger by its restraint, was drawing back its head, with its neck in exactly the shape of a note of interrogation, its mouth open, and its little eyes sparkling with rage, whilst it agitated its rattle savagely. In another moment it darted its nose against my neck with a force that was startling, and, overcome with sickening horror, I fainted.

* * * * *

When I came to myself I was suffering an intolerably burning pain in my neck. Saul Clay was standing near the sofa in the dressing-room, to which I had been carried after I had fainted.

In a few words of deep feeling he told me that he had witnessed the accident, and, though not able to prevent the snake biting me, had applied the rough, but generally effective, frontier remedy of placing some gunpowder upon the bleeding wound and igniting it.

It was to this readiness of action on his part that I probably owed my life. The snake had escaped in the confusion.

I was brought to the belief that, but for Saul's remedy my fate would have been sealed, by a shocking occurrence which happened the same night.

It appeared that Mrs. Calhoun had determined to leave her husband, and fly with one of the cow-boys I have already alluded to. Late in the night she took the keys of the building from her husband's pocket, and came to the theatre, probably to procure some expensive dresses which were in her room behind the scenes. Whilst groping about for a light she must have trodden upon the snake, which probably dropped through a chink in the stage into her apartment; and when the janitor came in the morning, he found her stiff in death. Some letters in a man's hand, which were discovered in her pocket, explained her plans.

This painful event broke up the company. Learning that I was about to undertake a tedious journey back to New York, the good deacon persuaded me to remain with him till I might be able to hear of another engagement.

I remained; and it was not long before one was offered me. The most perspicacious of my readers will have already foreseen that it came from Saul Clay, and that the part which I was to fill was that of his wife.

I accepted the rôle, and he says that I fill it to satisfaction; in fact, "leave nothing to be desired."

A blue mark on my neck, which nothing can erase, is the only memento which I possess of the painful accident which led to our marriage.

THE WOMAN WHO COULDN'T STAND DRAUGHTS.

My wife's aunt felt a draught. She felt it in her feet, which, at the time, were planted on a breadth and a half of our parlour carpet. My wife's aunt is very sensitive to draughts. She was born in a remote corner of Aberdeenshire, where there is an easterly or northerly gale twenty-nine days out of every month, and people have to blanket horses in their stalls after they are fed, to keep the wind from blowing the hay out through their hides. My wife's aunt was brought up in her father's mill, which had neither doors nor windows, but plenty of holes cut for them, and yet the first thing she found to complain of in our parlour was a draught of air.

"This is the draughtiest place that ever I was in," said my wife's aunt. "I don't see, Howard, how you can reconcile it with your conscience to expose your wife to the peril of catching her death o' cold."

"Our health has been excellent hitherto," said I; "but if you think that this draught is a serious danger, I will have it stopped. I am greatly surprised at it, because our landlord vowed that there was a free circulation of air in every room, and my knowledge of his veracity led me to think that we should have to manufacture oxygen for breathing purposes by a chemical process."

"It's blowing half a gale here now," said she, "and it's as much as my life is worth to sit in it. Can't you give me something to put my feet on? The wind blows all along the floor."

I selected a chair which I thought would stand the pressure, and hoisted her feet into it, though I had no idea it would prove injurious to her health. North-easterly snowstorms have been her daily food for years, and a forty-knot breeze is regarded as next door to a calm where she came from. Then our aunt announced that she had traced the draught to the open grate in our parlour.

We had no fire in it, for the rooms are heated by steam on mild days, such as the one in question. So, under my aunt's supervision, I stuffed the chimney full of paper, and how I shall ever get it out again when we want a fire is more than I can tell If I thought the landlord had skipped a payment on his insurance policy I might burn it out, but otherwise I would not risk the chance of making money for him.

It was desperately hard work to plug up the chimney, but it did no good. Auntie was sure that she should blow away. So Maude closed the folding doors behind the "pourteers." She did not tell me that she had done this, and so, when I rushed through the curtains in search of something to drive into the seams round the skirting, I brought up with a sounding bang against the closed doors. I have done that trick four or five hundred times since those curtains were put up, and yet I have not taught my nose to pick out the soft spots on the doors.

After tinkering with the skirting for half-an-hour, and accomplishing nothing but a stiff back, I asked our aunt whether the breeze was moderating. She gave me no encouragement. She had talked so much about draughts by this time, that both Maude and I were able to imagine that we felt the cold breath of the tomb blowing on the back of our necks.

We made some further investigations as to the source of the draught, and had almost decided that it came from the dark and mysterious cavities into which the folding-doors withdrew when our aunt permits them to be open. It is often possible to hear strange and melancholy sounds by listening at that one of the three caverns which leads dimly in the direction of our neighbours. The sounds of pianos get in that way, and why, I asked, should not other deleterious influences invade our dwelling by the same track?

In view of this possibility, we began to plug things into this place and poke them back with a long stick. We used old newspapers, and almost anything, in fact, which we did not want in our flat. The hole appeared to have a capacity about equal to that of the bottomless pit, but our supply of rubbish was good, and our diligence exemplary.

I think that we might still be engaged in trying to fill that cavity if the gentleman who rents the flat next to ours had not come over to inquire what was our object in thrusting ten or a dozen sacks of rubbish, besides two or three pairs of old trousers, into his parlour. He said that the newspapers were out of date, and the clothing did not fit him, and, in short, he begged us to desist.

"I'll tell you where the trouble is," said our aunt at this stage of the game; "your windows don't fit. There are cracks round them big enough to crawl through."

There was undoubtedly some truth in her allegation. Our landlord has built a great many houses, and the parts of them were furnished to him by wholesale. Sometimes he was not so careful as he ought to have been in putting things together. Several of our windows were intended, I believe, for other houses in different parts of the town.

It seemed best to follow our aunt's advice, and get a man to put weather strips on the windows. It will not surprise anybody who knows me to hear that I went into the weather-strip game in the gentle spring instead of in the autumn. I engaged the weather-strip artist to come the next day. By this time the newly-discovered draught had given Maude such a cold that she could not speak above a whisper, and she and poor Carlo took cough medicine every hour.

I superintended the adjustment of the weather-strips. It was necessary to keep the windows open while the work progressed, and in the course of the operation I contracted a chill that will probably never leave me in this world.

Our servant, too, has a cold. She suffers because of her obedience to our orders, which is the last fate I should ever have predicted for her. By keeping the windows closed, according to directions, she raised the temperature of that room to a point which made it necessary for her to go about her work clad in as little as was consistent with her ideas of propriety.

Consequently, whenever she was obliged to go into any other room she felt the difference in temperature to a which was too much even for her iron constitution. So she bought a quart bottle of Irish whiskey and went home to her relations, who welcomed her with an enthusiasm second only to that with which they welcomed the bottle.

But our aunt continued to be quite well, There is no sustaining power like that of happiness, and when she found that the draught which she had invented had laid us all up, her joy was full. It may have been on that account that she did not take cold herself.

A Jolly Good Thrashing.

MANY people are in the habit of assuring their friends that they "enjoy very poor health," not meaning by this assertion to express contentment with their condition, but the contrary. When I, however, tell you that I once had a jolly good thrashing, there is a special intention in every word of the phrase.

The castigation was jolly, because I thoroughly relished every blow as it fell on my body; and it was good, because it saved my life. The circumstances in which I took this very unusual form of gratification were as follows:

I was living at Trimurtigherry, where I had a small cotton-cleaning and pressing factory. The cotton grown from indigenous seed in that district has but a poor staple, and, in fact, is a crop only cultivated on soils which are considered too poor for cereals.

This inferiority of quality naturally deterred shippers from placing orders freely with me; and in the hope of demonstrating to the ryots the advantage of paying more attention to the industry, I procured a variety of seed from America, and formed a small model plantation near my bungalow.

It succeeded very well, and as the balls ripened, I used carefully to gather them myself, in order to keep the different kinds distinct, and to test the yield.

I was engaged one morning in this manner, and was in the act of plucking some pods off a tree, when I felt a sharp bite on my right wrist. At the same instant I saw a snake drop to the ground and writhe rapidly away.

I noticed a bright, yellow line on each side of the upper surface of the reptile's head convergent on the snout, and I feared, only too justly, that I had been bitten by a tic-polonga, the daboia Russellii, one of the most common of venomous snakes. If anything were needed to confirm my misgivings, it was supplied by a glance at my injured wrist.

A look was sufficient, and I instantly knew that the wound had been inflicted by a poisonous serpent.

The two fatal marks where the creature's fangs had pierced my skin were only too plainly visible.

"At least my destroyer shall not escape," I thought, and springing forward, I crushed the snake, which proved to be a tic-polonga, under my heel, just as it was reaching a crevice in the earth, where it would have been safe.

Revenge was certainly my primary impulse in killing the reptile, but I had a secondary object, which was to ascertain its age and size, as the consequences attendant on a poisonous snake-bite are materially affected thereby.

The tic-polonga attains a length of fifty inches, and death generally rapidly supervenes on the bite of a full-grown specimen, especially if the wounded part happen to be one of the extremities, such as a finger or toe which can be fairly seized between the animal's jaws. The venom is in that case injected deeply into the flesh, and commingling at once with the blood, is rapidly diffused through the veins and arteries, and reaching the heart, paralyses the action of that organ.

But if the part attacked present a wider surface, so that the epidermis may perhaps only be abraded and the subcuticle remain unpierced, the chances of remedial measures proving efficacious are greatly increased, while the consequences of any wound inflicted by a daboia of not more than twenty or twenty-four inches may generally be counteracted.

The degree of danger from snake-bites also depends considerably on several other conditions, such as the health of the patient; whether the snake has recently made a meal or bitten any other; and, finally the time of the day, as in the early morning, when the air is raw and chilly, a snake is languid, and will strike with comparatively little energy, whereas during the heat of the day it is active and generally very fierce.

The circumstances of my case seemed decidedly against me. The tic-polonga I had killed was at least thirty inches long, and its poison glands must consequently have been fully charged at the moment it bit me—it was after nine o'clock, and a very hot day, and the bite on my wrist was deep.

The only point in my favour was that I was in excellent health. I knew the awful gravity of my situation, and was aware that unless some remedies were applied immediately, I should certainly be dead in three-quarters of an hour at the longest.

There was no surgeon or apothecary within fifteen miles of my factory, but I fortunately had some knowledge of the proper method of dealing with such cases as my own, having once seen a ryot being treated for snake-bite by the remedies I proposed to apply to myself, only I remembered, with melancholy interest, that the unfortunate Hindoo had died, notwithstanding the unremitting exertions made to save his life.

The treatment for snake-bite is ligature of the limb above the wound, free incision, sucking, cauterisation, bathing the wound with ammonia, and taking ammonia or brandy internally.

Remembering these directions, I rushed into the bungalow and made a very efficient tourniquet with a walking-stick and a wet towel, which I passed round my fore-arm, effectually stopping the circulation. I also summoned my boy, Veerapen, to my assistance, and as I had no ammonia in the house, I ordered him to open a bottle of brandy with all speed.

Whilst Veerapen was getting the cognac, I slashed my wrist freely all round the injured part with my pocket-knife, particularly probing the punctures made by the serpent's fangs, and as the blood spurted freely from the wound I sucked it with the vigour and desperation of a man who knows that a delay of only a quarter of a minute in eliminating the virus from his system may seal his doom.

I noticed with horror that my arm was swelling rapidly, and I began to experience a difficulty in respiration, which I knew was a most unfavourable symptom. Some powerful excitant was necessary immediately to counteract the effect of the poison, yet it seemed as though Veerapen would never bring the brandy, and I called wildly to him to come to me.

He ran into the room with a bottle of the precious liquor in his hand, but in his confusion he could not find a corkscrew, and he was too much dazed and terrified by my misfortune to think of the ready expedient of knocking off the neck of the bottle. However, I soon sent it flying, and pouring out half a tumbler of brandy, I drank it at a gulp.

The spirit revived me, and thus nerved to renewed action, I bade Veerapen call the cook to bring some burning sticks from the kitchen.

With one of these glowing firebrands I seared my bleeding and quivering flesh, never flinching under what in ordinary circumstances would have been excruciating agony, but rather cherishing the pain which was a possible means of saving my life. But I feared my case was past all help, for I was sensible that the contractions of my heart were growing very feeble, and respiration became more and more difficult.

I felt the keenest anguish, and I knew that there remained only one final stage, that of falling into a faint before death supervened.

Just as my senses were deserting me, I was able to clutch the bottle of brandy, and once more poured out a large quantity into the glass. With an effort I just managed to quaff the requickening spirit, which acted on my prostrated nerves like a magic draught.

I rallied; and with a fierce determination to live, I braced my senses together for a final struggle with the potent poison which was now coursing like liquid fire through every vein in my body.

The brandy had no intoxicating results, its ordinary

THESE FELLOWS DIDN'T LIE.

"All these fellows can't be telling lies, can they?" said Mr. Mulcahy to himself, laying down the paper he had been reading and seeming to debate the point in his mind.

Yet he knew the world, and how many statements, even from good people, have to be taken with a grain of salt. Nevertheless, he concluded to risk it; and now, he says, he is thankful he did. The story, put short, is this:

Mr. William H. Mulcahy, whom a letter directed to 27 The College, Mitchelstown, co. Cork, Ireland, will always find, was in his younger days passionately fond of hunting, and rarely missed an opportunity of following the hounds. He then resided at Ballinora, Carrick-on-Suir, and regularly hunted with the Tipperaries, the Kilkennies, the Wexford and Kildare, and Lord Waterford's packs.

"Being hardy and robust," he says, "I took small care of myself; I often got drenched to the skin and let my clothes dry on me. To that, and to irregularity in eating, I attribute what came afterwards.

"I began to lose tone and appetite, and food didn't agree with me as it used to. As time wore on I got worse and had to give up hunting.

"Presently I had to live on soup and milk, and my tongue was furred like lichens on a rock in the woods. Then my heart began to act badly. The least effort made it palpitate violently, and when I lay down you could hear it. Many a night, unable to sleep I got up and smoked and read till morning.

"Under this sort of thing my strengh went out of me, and my breathing was so bad I couldn't walk fifty yards without resting.

"Once, as I was leaving a shop in Clonmel, I heard a man say, referring to me: 'Ah, well; he is about at the end of his tether.' Yet I have since attended the funerals of many who were there that day. What poor stuff, my friend, some prophecies are made of. Up to that time no medicine or treatment had helped me.

"Then I read about Mother Seigel's Syrup and letters from people who had been cured by it. All these fellows can't be telling lies, I said; I'll have a try of it myself.

"The first bottle set up my nerves like tuning a fiddle. I began to get good sleep. After that I felt hungry, and when I smelt breakfast I wasn't long getting down stairs.

"To cut my story short, I rapidly picked up my weight and strength and have since been healthy and active. No need to assure you and the public of my faith in Mother Seigel's Syrup."

The statement of which the above is a condensation was sworn to by Mr. Mulcahy on January 24th, 1900, at Mitchelstown, Co. Cork, before Mr. Joseph L. F. Fairbrother, a Commissioner for Oaths for the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland; the Commissioner adding that he personally knows the deponent.

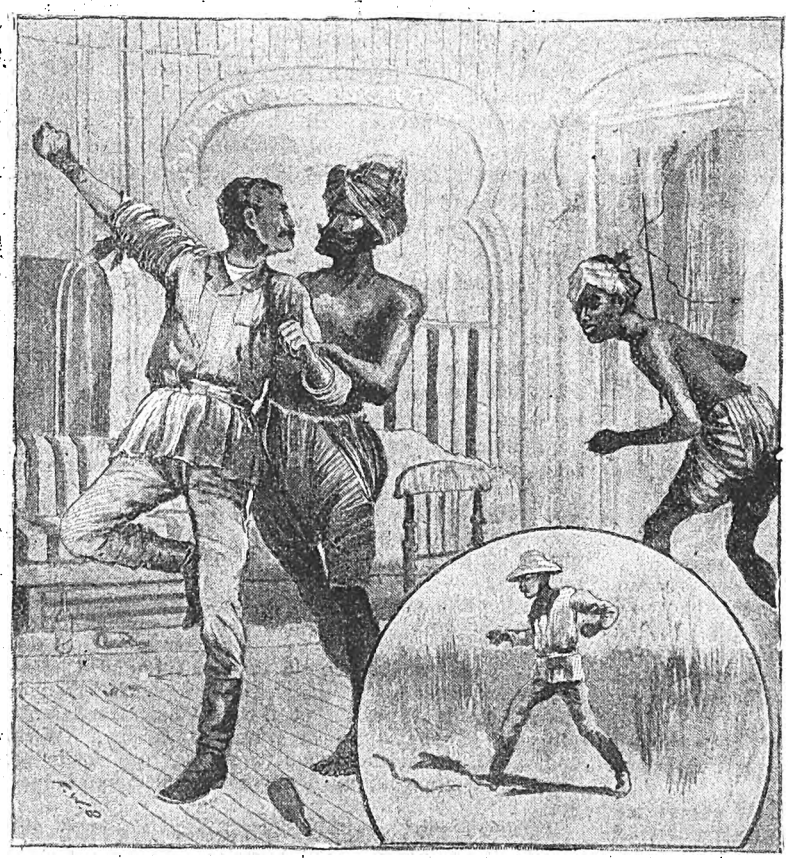
effects being neutralised by the virus in my body. The giant Alcohol had for once to combat with a rival mightier than himself, and my life depended on the issue of the struggle.

Knowing I might at any moment lapse into the fatal comatose state, I hastily gave my instructions to Veerapen and the cook while my mind remained clear. I directed them to hold me by my arms, one on either side, to keep me walking about, and on no account to suffer me to lie down or go to sleep. I explained to Veerapen that my life depended on my being kept awake, and I ordered him to check the fatal drowsiness by thrashing me with my own horsewhip if necessary, and not to spare it.



I turned upon my servant with an amount of fury which caused him to retreat.

Veerapen armed himself with the whip as ordered, and he and the cook began marching me up and down the room.

An overwhelming faintness soon came upon me, and I should have gone to sleep as I walked, had not Veerapen then administered a sharp cut across my calves.

The pain stung me into activity, and I turned upon my servant with an amount of fury which caused him to retreat in hot haste. But remembering why the blow was given, I thanked him for it, curbing my passion and telling him to resume his cure of me. I begged him, no matter what my present anger might be, to continue, by the severe means I had placed in his hands, to prevent my falling asleep, as I would handsomely reward him if he saved my life.

I cannot recollect all that passed; but Veerapen told me that I alternately commanded and intreated with tears in my eyes to be allowed to go to sleep if only for a minute, but that the only attention he paid to my threats or intreaties was to lay on all the harder with the whip.

The blows roused me from my state of torpor for a few minutes only at a time, but during these intervals of consciousness I thoroughly relished the cure I was voluntarily undergoing, and experienced a positive pleasure in feeling the stinging cuts showered on my back, arms, and legs by my lusty attendant.

The struggle for life was protracted, but gradually the pulsations of my heart became more regular, the load which had oppressed my breathing was slowly lifted from my chest, the fatal yearning for sleep rolled away, and I knew the mortal risk was over.

Perhaps Veerapen had a few old scores to pay off—anyhow, he discharged his duty so thoroughly that, by the time I was out of danger, I was black and blue from head to foot, but I bore him no grudge for these striking marks of his fidelity.

I know I consumed a great deal of brandy, but I did not think I had finished as much as six bottles. Veerapen, however, assured me I had not only taken that quantity, but had wished to have more, only he refused to let me have it.

He produced half a dozen "gentlemen-commoners" as vouchers to his assertion, and if he and the cook had not grossly exceeded the limits of sobriety that night, I might have been persuaded that I alone had swallowed a full gallon imperial measure of old cognac. As it was, I formed an opinion that my worthy servitors had been drinking my very good health and speedy recovery, and I did not reprove them for the jollification on such an occasion.

I gave my faithful boy twelve months' pay, and to the cook, six, as a reward for their timely services. I do not think anything could induce me to part with Veerapen, or Veerapen to leave me as long as I remain in the country.

The effects of the poison did not altogether disappear for some time, but manifested themselves at intervals in muscular spasms, which were very painful and accompanied by great depression of spirits. Time, however, cures all things, and I am to-day as sound as though I had never been within an ace of losing my life through the bite of a tic-polonga.

The Brain Gymnasium

IN these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver plated pencil-cases or ten popular six shilling novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, SHORT STORIES, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by first post on Monday, September 17th, 1900.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

A HAIRDRESSER AND

"I RECOMMEND VI-COCOA TO ALL MY CUSTOMERS."

Mr. S. ALDER, 1 Scoresby Street, Blackfriars Road, S.E.: "I have much pleasure in recommending your valuable Vi-Cocoa to all my customers. I am a Hairdresser by trade, and have to stand on my feet sometimes for fourteen hours a day, which I used to find very trying. In fact, I used at times hardly to be able to keep awake, and, being a total abstainer, I used to drink a lot of tea, not caring for minerals, but that did not seem to make me feel any better. I always felt dull and heavy until I was recommended by one of my customers to try Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and since then I have felt much better, and I can keep awake all night if I like. Of course, some people will say we cannot afford to pay so much for our Cocoa; but I am sure if they try it they will find it come cheaper in the end.

"You can do what you like with this testimonial, and I hope that my fellow-tradesmen will be as much benefited as I have been, and find that it comes up to their expectations."

SHORT STORIES

No. 611.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending Sept. 15th, 1900.

SARREO.

"WELL, there's niggers an' niggers, some just as good as any white man," said Mr. Thomas Potter as he, the second mate of the island-trading barque Reconnaisance, and myself the supercargo, walked her short, stumpy poop one night, "though when I was before the mast I couldn't stand one of 'em bunking too close to me for a long time. But after a while I found out that a Kanaka or a Maori is better than the usual run of the Jack Dog who calls himself a sailor man nowadays.

"Why, I've never seen a native sailor yet as was dirty in his habits—they're too fond o' the water. Look at these Rotumah chaps aboard here—if there's a calm they'll jump overboard and take a swim instead of turning in when it's their watch below. Bah! white sailors ain't worth feeding in this island trade—lazy, dirty, useless brutes; a Kanaka is worth three of any one of 'em. Did you notice that large photograph in my cabin—that one showing a ship's company standing on the main deck?"

"Yes, I did, Mr. Potter."

"Well, that's the crew of the Fanny Long, and amongst 'em is a fellow I'm goin' to tell you about—a chap named Sarréo. We had that picture taken in Hobart after we had come back from a whaling cruise. We had been very lucky, and the skipper and owners had all our photographs taken in a group.

"I was second mate, and this Sarréo was one of the boatsteerers. He and I had been shipmates before, once in the old Meteor barque, nigger catching for the Fiji planters, and once in a New Bedford sperm whaler, and he had taken a bit of a liking to me, so whenever I got a new ship he generally shipped, too.

"Well, I was tired of whaling; I had two ribs broken on that cruise in the Fanny Long by a boat being stove in by a whale. So after I had got my money I walked out of the office, thinking of going to Sydney by the steamboat, when up comes Sarréo.

"'Got your money, Sarréo?' I says.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"'Yes,' he answers. 'What are you goin' to do now' Mr. Potter?'

"'Going to Sydney to look for another sh'p.'

"'All right,' he says quietly. 'I come, too. I don' want to go whaling any more.'

"Sure enough, when I went on board the steamer, there he was sitting for'ard on his chest, smoking his pipe, an' waiting for me.

"In Sydney there was a fine big lump of a schooner just fitting out for a trading cruise to the Solomon Islands, and I happened to know the skipper, who worked it for me with the owners, and I got the berth of chief mate; and Sarréo, who used to come every day to the place I was staying at to ask me not to forget him, was shipped as an A.B.

"What sort of a looking chap? Well, he was a short, square-built chap, with a chest like a bullock. He was rather darker than a Samoan or a Tahiti man, owing to a seafaring life, and had straight, black hair. He only spoke as a rule when he was spoken to, and kept himself pretty much aloof from the rest of the hands, though he wasn't by any means sulky."

"Where did he hail from?" I inquired.

"Ah, now you're asking, sir. There was a beast of a supercargo—I beg pardon, sir, for forgetting myself—a reg'lar flash, bullying pig of a fellow, with us that trip. He put on as many airs as if he owned the whole blooming Pacific. Well, one day he was straightening up his trade-room, and calls for a couple of hands to help, and the skipper sent Sarréo and another native sailor to him.

"We were then lying at anchor in Marau Sound, in the Solomons, at the time, and the sun was hot enough to cook meat with, and presently the supercargo comes on deck and slings his fat, ugly carcass into a deck chair under the awning and says:

"'That's a smart fellow, that Sarréo, Potter. Where does he come from?'

"Now I didn't know, and said so; so Mr. Supercargo grunts and says that he'd ask him himself. Presently up comes Sarréo and the other native—they were going for'ard for their dinner.

"'Here, I say you,' said the supercargo to Sarréo, touching him on the calf of the leg with his foot as he was passing, 'what island you belong to, eh?'

"Sarréo turned like lightning, and I caught a sight of his face. He had dark, deep-set eyes, and they seemed to spit fire at the fat brute in the chair, and his two brown hands shut tight; but he said nothing, not a blessed word, only looked as if all the rest of his body was turned to stone. He stood like that for about ten seconds or so, then he bent his head close to the other man's face and put his two clenched fists out behind him.

In less than a couple of minutes Sarreo had the supercargo by the throat.

"'Here, Sarréo,' I says, collaring him by one arm, 'what's all these gymnastics? What's the matter?'

"He pushed me aside as if I was a feather, then he straightens himself up sudden, and, lookin' at the supercargo, spits on the deck at his feet.

"'You dog,' he says, 'when we get ashore I will fight you!'

"Warby, that was the supercargo's name, was no cur, whatever else he was, but though he seemed mighty sick when he heard Sarréo call him a dog, he jumped up at once.

"'You beastly Kanaka swine! You're drunk! You've been sneaking a bottle of gin in the trade-room, an' I'll give you a pounding,' he says.

"Then before any one could interfere they were at it, and in less than a couple of minutes Sarréo had the supercargo by the throat, lifted him off his feet, and dashed him down on the poop. He lay there stunned, an' I tell you, mister, I was mighty pleased, for we all hated him for his beastly bullyin' ways, and his foul talk. So none of us rushed at him too violently to pick him up.

"Presently up comes the skipper and orders me to put Sarréo in irons, though I could see he didn't half like doing it. But it had to be done, and I had to do it. However, Sarréo held out his hands to me as quiet as a lamb, and I led him for'ard and told him to keep a stiff upper lip; the captain, I knew, would let him loose again the next morning. He nodded his head quietly and said:

"'All right, Mr. Potter. But when we get ashore I will kill that man.'

"'Why, Sarréo,' I said, 'you mustn't talk like that; you've nearly cracked his skull as it is. Don't you go on that tack, or it'll be worse for you.'

"He nods again.

Digitized by Google

"'I know. But I have been looking for that man for more'n five year.'

"'Why, do you know him?'

"'Yes, I know him now. When I see him roll up his shirt-sleeve in the trade-room, an' I see some tattoo mark on his arm, I know him.'

"Of course I asked him what the supercargo had done to him, but he wouldn't tell me any more. So, telling one of the hands to give him his pipe and tobacco, I went aft and told the skipper that there seemed to be an old grudge between the two men.

"'Like enough. That fellow Warby is the two ends and bight of a blackguard. He was only appointed to this ship at the last moment, or else I would have kicked against his coming aboard. He's got a bad name.'

"Warby lay in his bunk for the rest of the day, but in the evening he came on deck and said to the skipper roughly:

"'What are you going to do with that nigger?'

"'Keep him in irons for a day or two, I suppose. What more can I do?'

"Warby looked at him for a moment, then he says, with a sneer, that in some ships the captain would have tied such a fell w up and given him six dozen.

"'No doubt,' says the skipper, looking him full in his ugly face, 'no doubt, especially in the sort of ships you've sailed in. But nothing like that is going to happen aboard this boat.'

"The supercargo muttered something under his breath and turned away. Next morning, however, when we were at breakfast, he asked the captain how long he meant to keep Sarréo in irons.

"'Till after breakfast.'

"Warby jumped up in a rage and said that he protested against such a man being given his liberty.

"'Why, he'll murder me,' he says at last with a white look in his face.

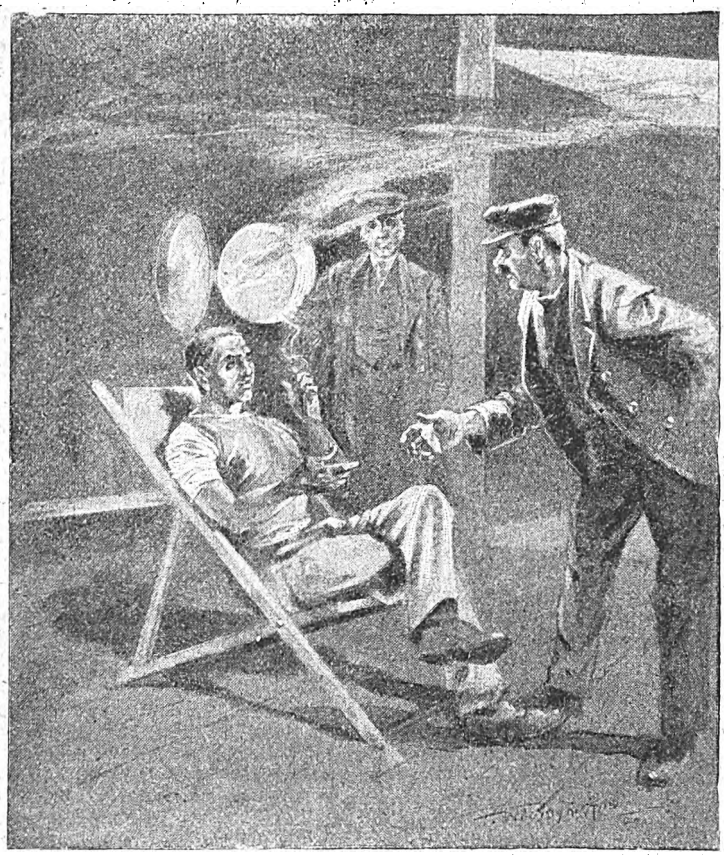
"The skipper laughed.

"'You make too much of the business, Mr. Warby. Why, he is one of the best and quietest men aboard. If you hadn't kicked him and then sworn at him, he wouldn't have tackled you. And I'm not going to keep him in irons—that's flat.'

"After breakfast I went up for'ard to take the irons off Sarréo. He was sitting against the windlass and smoking.

"'Here, Sarréo,' I said, 'I've come to take off your bracelets; but you must promise not to have any more rows w th the supercargo; if you won't promise, then the captain says he'll have to keep you in irons until we get to Fiji, and then send you to jail.'

"He promised, and from the quiet, soft manner in which he spoke I felt sure he was over his burst of passion, and was feeling a bit funky over it. However, he turned to very quietly, and was soon sent ashore with a watering party, he being in charge of the boat, which was manned by seventy native sailors.



Then Sarreo put out his big brown tattoed hand.

"When he came back with the first lot of casks he told me that the bush around the watering-place was full of pigeons. As soon as the captain heard this he said he would go ashore and shoot some, and Mr. Warby said he would like to join him.

"So off they went—skipper, supercargo, and Sarréo and his boat's crew. We on board soon heard the two guns firing, and were smacking our chops at the thought of pigeon stew for supper. I did not expect to see them back until about supper time, as the boat had to tow the casks off to the ship, which lay about half-a-mile from the beach.

"But about four o'clock I saw the boat pushing off in a dickens of a hurry, and then pull like mad for the ship. Knowing that there was no danger from natives at that part of the island, I couldn't make it out out, but in a few minutes the boat dashes up alongside, and looking over the side I saw that Sarréo was sitting beside the captain, in between him and Mr. Warby; his eyes were closed, and I thought he was dead at first.

"We had him lifted up on deck and then carried into the cabin in a brace of shakes, and I saw that he had a bullet wound in his shoulder; the ball had gone clean through. Then the skipper, who was never much of a talker, told me that Mr. Warby had shot the man accidentally. Of course I looked at Warby. His face was very pale, but his eyes met mine without flinching.

"It didn't take the captain long to dress the wound, and half-an-hour later, when I came below again, Sarréo was sitting on a chair down below smoking one of the captain's manilas, and looking as if nothing had happened. He smiled when he saw me and put out his hand.

I saw the rifle go off and the nigger topple over.

"'I'm all right, Mr. Potter,' he said; 'not going to die this time.'

"I was just about to ask him how the thing happened when Robertson, that was our skipper's name, called me into his room. He was as solemn as a judge. Closing his cabin door, he said:

"'Sarréo will get over it all right, but the business is an ugly one; to cut it short, I fear that it was no accident, but that Warby tried to murder the poor fellow.'

"Then he told me what had occurred. Leaving the rest of the boat's crew to fill the water casks, they set out to shoot pigeons; Sarréo went with them to pick up and carry the birds. About an hour later they saw a wild boar rush by them. Robertson fired both barrels at it and wounded it, but it didn't stop. Warby had one barrel empty. He at once loaded with ball, and the three men gave chase, Sarréo leading, Warby following him close.

"On reaching some high grass at the river bank Sarréo plunged into it; then, a few seconds later, Robertson heard Warby call out that he saw the animal lying down, and fired. The captain was a short distance behind, but he and Warby reached the spot together, and there, sure enough, lying in the long grass, was the wounded boar, and Sarréo beside it, with the blood pouring from his shoulder. He was sitting up, supporting himself on his left hand.

"The skipper assisted him to his feet, and Warby tried to help, but Sarréo turned on him and reviled him, and said that he (Warby) had tried to murder him. The supercargo said that he had not seen him when he fired, but further talk was cut short by Sarréo going faint through loss of blood, so they carried him to the boat. That was the story so far, and Robertson asked me what I thought of it.

"Now I had been shipmates with Sarréo off and on for a matter of five or six years, and I never knew him to tell a lie; but at the same time I couldn't think Warby would be such a brute as to try and murder the man in cold blood.

"The skipper, however, took a very black view of the matter, and told me that if we met a man-of-war he would put Warby in irons, signal for a boat, and hand him over on a charge of attempted murder. Then we went out into the main cabin and sat down, and Robertson told the steward to call the supercargo.

"Warby came below at once. He gave a quick glance at Sarréo, then at the skipper and myself, and sat down quietly. In less than a minute the captain told him of his suspicions and what he intended doing if we met a man-of-war.

"I thought Warby would bluster and blaspheme in his usual way; but he didn't. He listened in silence. Then he rose and put his hands on the cabin table, and said:

"'Before Heaven, I swear to you both that I am innocent. I did not fire at that man; I did not even see him again after he disappeared into the grass—as Heaven is my judge, I did not. I did mean to take it out of Sarréo for nearly breaking my skull the other day; but then I remembered afterwards that he had cause to hate me, and I was only waiting for a chance to ask him to make it up.

"'Sarréo, I did you a bad turn a long time ago; but I'm sorry for it now—I have been sorry for it ever since. But I did not know where to find you, and I would not have known you yesterday if you hadn't looked into my face and spoken. It's ten years since that day, Sarréo.'

"The wounded man looked up searching-like into Warby's face all the time he was speaking; then his big black eyes drooped again, but he made no answer. So then Warby went on again, talking to the lot of us.

"'I was supercargo on the Manola brig, and Sarréo here was one of the hands. One day, in Apia harbour, a bag of dollars was stolen out of my cabin. The steward next morning said he had seen Sarréo ashore at one of the dance houses spending money very freely. The captain and I burst open his chest, and we found about twenty Mexican dollars among his clothes. Now, in the bag which had been stolen there were nearly five hundred Mexican dollars.

"'Sarréo swore he had not stolen the money, and that all the money he had spent on shore was five dollars, which he had brought with him from San Francisco. But the skipper and I believed he was the thief, and to make him own up and tell us where the rest of the dollars were, we flogged him. Then we put him in irons and kept him in irons for a week. He still swore he had not taken the money, and I, believing he was lying, gave him another thrashing on my own account.

"'That night he got overboard and swam ashore, and we gave the money up for lost. Well, about a week after this, when the steward was ashore, the mate and I decided to make a thorough search of his cabin. We found nothing there, but we did in the pantry—we found the missing bag of dollars, all but the twenty which he had put into Sarréo's chest—stowed away in the bottom of half a barrel of flour.'

"As soon as Sarréo heard this, the poor fellow almost began to cry, and said:

"'I told you, Mr. Warby, I did not steal that money.'

"'No, Sarréo, I know you didn't—that is, I knew it when the steward owned up to stealing it; and told us afterward that he took twenty dollars out of the bag, and, seeing your chest lying open in the deck-house, he slipped in when no one was about and put the money among the clothes at the bottom.'

"Sarréo sighed, pleased-like, and then his brown face lit up.

"The big supercargo came a bit nearer to him, and then held out his hand.

"'Look here, Sarréo, the day before yesterday I was wrong, but you got my blood up, and I am sorry, very sorry, for the wrong I did you on board the Manola; but believe me, Sarréo, I did not fire at you.'

"Sarréo's eyes seemed to look right through the white man; then they turned towards the skipper and me.

"'I believe you, Mr. Warby,' said the skipper, coming aft and shaking hands with the supercargo.

"And I believed him, too, for he looked terrible distressed and cut up, so I shook hands with him, too.

"Then Sarréo put out his big brown tattoed hand.

"'And me, too, Mr. Warby.'

"The supercargo pressed it gently, so as not to hurt Sarréo's shoulder, then he almost ran past us on deck.

"Well, from that time out, that man changed, and he looked after Sarréo all the time he was laid up as if he had been his own brother instead of a Kanaka chap before the mast.

"After leaving Marau Sound we stood to the northward, being bound to Bougainville Island. It took us more than a month to get there, and by that time Sarréo was as well and strong as ever he was; and me and the skipper had got quite chummy with the supercargo, for we found out that he had a lot of good points about him.

"Just when we were about to brace up to round Bouka Island, and being about three miles off the land, we sighted part of the hull of a vessel ashore on the beach of a small bay. We stood in for a mile or so and saw that there was a native village at the head of the bay, and the vessel was a schooner of about a hundred tons. There were no signs of any boats, and she seemed to be stripped of both running and standing gear.

"We manned and armed two boats, one, with Mr. Warby in charge, being the landing-party, and the other as a covering boat in case the natives attacked. I had charge of the second boat and had four white sailors; Mr. Warby had Sarréo and four other natives. The skipper told us to have a good look at the vessel, then try and learn what the natives on shore had to say about her, and then come off and report.

"We pulled right in to the wreck as close as we could get, for it was low tide. Then Warby and I got out and walked over to it. We found that she was stripped of everything of value, even the chain-plates having been cut out, the decks were torn up and partly burnt, and the anchors and cables were gone; in fact, she was nothing but a shell.

"'Been looted by the niggers,' I said to Warby. 'Hope the poor chaps that manned her got away in the boat; better for 'em to drown than be eaten by these beggars about here.'

"We then walked back to the boats and pulled over to the village, which was about eight hundred yards away, Warby's boat, of course, going first. About thirty or forty natives came down to the water's edge and waited. They were all armed with bows, spears, and clubs, but seemed friendly.

"However, Warby jumped boldly out on to the beach, and telling his crew to keep her afloat in case he had to run for it, he went up to the crowd of niggers and shook hands with some of them, I and my men in the covering boat keeping our rifles out of view but quite ready.

"In about five minutes he sang out to me that it was all right. The vessel, the natives said, had parted her cables, gone ashore, and bilged on the reef in the night; and the hands, being too frightened to come ashore, had gone away next morning in two boats. Then he told me to wait a few minutes as he was going to the chief's house to look at the copper and other gear that the natives had taken from the schooner, and very likely he would buy it.

"We lay there, backed stern on to the beach, for about five minutes, looking at the house into which he had gone with the natives. Suddenly we saw him burst out of the house and fall on his knees, trying to draw his revolver, but in another moment he was being tomahawked and clubbed by a mob of yelling savages. Poor chap, he must have died very quickly.

"We opened fire at once, and they disappeared like magic, and then from every bush, tree, and rock they began firing at us in the boats with both muskets and arrows. One of my men was hit, and then, before I could stop him, Sarréo had jumped out of his boat and was running up the beach, rifle in hand, to where Mr. Warby's body was lying.

"He got there, I think, without being hit, just as a big native ran at him with a tomahawk. He hadn't time to put his Snider to his shoulder; but that nigger gave his last jump anyway, for I saw the rifle go off and the nigger topple over. In another five seconds he had lifted the supercargo up, thrown him over his left shoulder, and was running down to the boats.

"By this time I and two of my crew had jumped out of the boat and ran to meet him, firing as we went. We had just reached him when down he went on to his face in the sand—a bullet had smashed his hip.

"Dropping our rifles, we picked him and Mr. Warby's body up, and luckily managed to tumble into the boat together and push off, covered by the fire from the ship, which carried two six-pounders.

"Sarréo lived two days—he died the same morning that we were getting ready to take Mr. Warby's body ashore to bury on a little island between Bouka and Bougainville. So we made only one trip ashore. Poor chap! He was a good, simple heart, and almost his last words were that he 'was glad Mr. Warby wasn't eaten.'

"Ah, as you say, sir, the South Seas ain't no place for a white man. Good-night." LOUIS BECKE.

AN ALTERED SCENE.

JAMES DUNN, lessee and manager of the Pearl Theatre, sat back in his chair and surveyed his reflection in the mirror over the mantelpiece.

"It's no good, James Dunn," he remarked, shaking his pencil at the image in the glass, which naturally did likewise. "The plain truth is that you are too old for the part—and 'part' in this instance signifies a multitude of duties. It makes you wince to confess that you are on the wrong side of fifty and not so able-bodied as you used to be, but you've got to confess it!"

He shook his head at his reflection and nibbled the end of his pencil for a few moments.

"Yes," he sighed, "I must have some help. I am no longer able to be lessee, stage manager, actor, and general help. In a little place like this, the public are not so exacting as in a big town, but when the pit and gallery begin to chaff you because a twinge of rheumatism makes you draw up your leg when you are lying dead on the stage—when they tell you that you can't make up young enough for the gallant knight, then it's time to alter things or the show won't pay. I must get a young fellow to do some of the business.

"I'll insert a judicious advertisement. What shall I say? 'Wanted, a young man that can do everything' would about suit, but that's a trifle broad. But I've always been lucky enough to fall on my feet, so I suppose I shall get through it all right. Oh, come in!"

The interruption appeared inopportune, but the letter which was handed to him could not have come at a better moment.

"Is he waiting?" he asked the boy. "Yes? Well, show him in."

A young man about twenty-seven was shown in a couple of minutes later. Tall, well-built; a face that, in respect of good looks, would not have taken a high place, but which showed intelligence and will. He was clean-shaven, and not over well-dressed. The most noticeable thing about him was that from his dark eyes there came occasionally a gleam of light which seemed to thrill and fascinate you.

"So you are Jack Dawson's son, eh? And you wish to know if I can help you into a situation? My boy, honestly you look as if you wanted one! Sit down there and talk."

Arthur Dawson obeyed, but he did not do all the talking; and in the end he was engaged as assistant to the lessee and manager of the Pearl Theatre.

"I fancy you'll succeed," said Dunn. "You'll have to do something of everything, and mind, you must understudy the men's parts so that you can take up one or other if any actor falls ill!"

Dawson entered upon his duties at once. His coming was viewed with considerable disfavour by the chief actors and actresses, but his kindly, unobtrusive manner, his genial smile and willingness to be useful, and especially the expression in his eyes soon changed all that, and within a week he had acquired as firm a position as many another would have gained in a year.

He showed ability, too. He seemed to be able to learn the lines without difficulty, and he adapted himself with facility to all the small parts which fell to his lot—soldier, courtier, walking gentleman, policeman, footman, and what not, all came easy to him.

The leading actor, who sometimes was not so ready with his part as he ought to have been, accepted Dawson's "prompt" with condescension; the leading lady bestowed a soft glance upon him as a reward for little attentions paid to her comfort, and the second lady—who had none of the proud, haughty bearing of her sister actress—thanked him very sweetly for what he did.

Dawson had not been in his post for more than a month when a disturbing element arose. The star, as the leading man was generally called, began to think that Dawson was seeking an opportunity to show that he could play the part which he was understudying better than the star himself; and although his pride revolted at the thought that the young fellow could ever be as good an actor as he, yet he felt an occasional qualm of uneasiness, and turned against Dawson.

Miss Maggie Adair, the leading lady, continued to reward Dawson with a friendly smile until he answered that smile with one of those thrilling glances; then she drew herself up and murmured about "presumption."

Dawson merely smiled cynically when he discovered that he had offended Mason; but when Miss Adair returned his glance with a cold stare and passed him without a word, he started and turned pale.

There was one person in the company who had noticed this incident between the stage manager, as he was now generally styled, and the leading lady, and it was not the only thing she had noticed. Florence Graves, the second lady, had observed that Dawson was more solicitous about Miss Adair than about anyone else in the theatre; it could not exactly be said that he went out of his way and showed undue favouritism, but her keen eyes detected a fact which seems to have escaped the attention of everyone else, even Miss Adair herself. And when she awoke to this knowledge, Florence Graves went home and wept, asking herself why some despise a love which others crave and cannot get.

"Can't quite make out what has come over Dawson lately," mused Mr. James Dunn one evening, as he sipped at the contents of a glass just previous to going to bed. "He does the work all right, but he seems to be quieter than when he began. I suppose it was the newness of the thing that made him brighter at first, and now he has settled down to it, he goes about it in a more matter-of-fact way. Yes, that must be it. His father was just as cool, and it used to be said of him that it would take a strong charge of gunpowder to wake him up. On the same principle, the son would require nitro-glycerine!" and with a smile, the lessee went to bed satisfied.

As the weeks passed by, matters developed. Dawson's kindliness to everyone with whom he came in contact increased rather than diminished; he had a pleasant smile for the old and the weak, he would talk pleasantly to the children who played outside the theatre, and seemed to carry a sunbeam with him wherever he went, yet his face was always grave.

Only two people paid any heed to this; the lessee believed it to be the reflection of a cold nature and forgot that it did not accord with Dawson's warm heart, while Florence Graves felt a pang every time she saw it and remembered that it was the indication of unrequited love.

Miss Adair, to demonstrate her appreciation of Dawson's presumption, bestowed her smiles upon Mason, with whom in the ordinary course of business, she had to act the part of wife or sweetheart.

She would probably have been unable to explain why she had decided to "punish" Dawson by bestowing her favours upon a man for whom it had not occurred to her previously to entertain any affection; hers was one of those natures which act perversely at the slightest provocation and land the woman into the slough of misery unless they are awakened by some act of devotion or sacrifice—or by jealousy! For when the prize seems to be going to another, they desire to have it and are wakened to a knowledge of their real feelings.

Mr. Mason showed his appreciation of the course of events by returning Miss Adair's smiles and by making advances on his side, and in two or three weeks it came to be understood by the company generally that the couple would become man and wife. And in the meantime Dawson's face became even more grave, and Florence betrayed more nervous irritation in a week than she had previously shown in a whole year.

Whether Dawson was really waiting for his chance to take the place of the star for a night or two and prove his ability or not, the opportunity was long in coming. Mason was in the best of health apparently and was in his place every evening, although to the keen eye of the stage manager he was not always in good form.

A new play was produced. One of the chief incidents of the piece was a dialogue between two sisters; the younger alternately pleaded with and upbraided the other for her conduct towards a man whom she regarded as a traitor to a man with whom he pretended to be on good terms. The first man was envious of the other's position and of the fact that he was winning the affection of the elder sister; he was trying to supplant his "friend" in both ways—that was the notion that possessed the mind of the elder sister.

The younger sister believed that the elder was entirely mistaken and was giving her love to a man who was not worthy of it.

The part of the supposedly treacherous friend was the chief male rôle in the play and was naturally assigned to Mason. The female parts were both good, which rather displeased Miss Adair; she had her choice and fixed upon the younger sister, but the thing did not go well in rehearsal and the parts were changed, Florence Graves becoming the younger sister.

The author had to add more "fat" to the part of the elder sister in order to gratify the leading lady. Then the piece went well and Mr. Dunn looked forward to a successful and lengthy run.

The play was a decided success, but its result was not satisfactory to the leading lady and gentleman; for the critics praised Florence Graves more than anyone else.

They said that her acting was real, that she played her part to perfection—especially in the dialogue, and that she was destined to have a career.

Miss Adair blamed herself for not having kept to that part and she began to experience a feeling towards Miss Graves that threatened to develop into hate; this feeling of jealousy, for that was its real character, deepened when she observed that Florence made open advances to Arthur Dawson—unmaidenly advances, as she styled them. True, she had snubbed the man herself, but she did not like the turn that things were taking; Florence was deliberately trying to win Dawson, and he seemed willing to yield.

Miss Adair's bearing towards Dawson became more frigid than ever, but he never varied in his manner towards her—always the same coldly polite and deferential style, always ready to do anything that might be required.

"I think it is time that two members of this company were sent about their business," she remarked one evening to Mason, as he was escorting her home as usual. "Neither Mr. Dawson nor Miss Graves ought to be allowed to remain; the fact is, they are trying to oust us both! I have believed that of Dawson for a long time, and now he and this girl are too friendly and are working together."

It was a spiteful speech, and to tell the truth Miss Adair was half ashamed of it as soon as it was finished. But she had been particularly irritated that evening.

"Confound him!" said Mason. "I half believe that he worked those notices for her and left us in the background."

The vehemence of his tone startled her—scared her almost. And when she had left him she began to think very seriously. She had to admit that her remark had been almost on a level with his in point of spleen.

Maggie Adair felt that the fates were working for

Digitized by Google

Dawson and Miss Graves when, on the following evening, the leading actor did not put in an appearance and the young stage manager, as understudy, took his place.

Dawson threw his whole soul into the part, and the interview between Miss Adair and himself, where she called him a traitor and he indignantly protested, brought down the house. At the end of that act he was called before the curtain, a special honour that had not been accorded to Mason. His soliloquy after the girl's retirement from the scene, in which he spoke of his love for her, was voted grand.

In the next act the dialogue between the two sisters took place; it was enacted as it had never been before and never was afterwards. Had the author been in the house and heard the younger sister's impassioned speech he would have been as surprised as were Miss Adair and the rest of the company.

The elder sister completely lost her cues; she did not recognise the lines, and no wonder. Florence spoke as her heart dictated; the part came natural to her, it was all so much like the drama that had been played in private for months. She spoke of the worthiness of the "traitor," and of the unworthiness of his friend; she pointed out that the one loved her with all the strength of his being, loved her truly and honourably, while the other cared nothing for her in reality and would only marry her because he could make money out of her ability.

Then she went on with a passionate declaration—which was foreign to the part—that she had set herself deliberately to make love to the "traitor" in the most open manner in an attempt to bring her elder sister to her senses.

"I love him!" she concluded in a low tone that could be heard only by a few of the audience. "But I know that he loves you, and I have done this unwomanly thing, I have sacrificed my self-respect, my whole self, to make him happy. I believe you are good at heart; I know that he could be happy only with you. I feel that if you are awakened to this fact, you cannot but love him. Will you wreck his life and your own?"

By this time it had dawned upon both Dawson and the lessee that there was something wrong and they dropped the curtain. As it fell, Florence Graves sank to the floor in a swoon.

Luckily that was her last appearance for the evening. In the final scene, where the elder sister acknowledges her error and asks forgiveness of the "traitor" there was another piece of good acting, and the audience went away highly delighted with the play.

Arthur Dawson escorted the leading lady to her home that night. The next day there were two items of news for them; Mason had died suddenly in a fit, the cause of which was a clot of blood on the brain due to hard drinking, and Miss Graves was suffering from a severe attack of brain fever.

Florence was ill for a long time and never returned to the boards; she has a good typewriting business, with a staff of lady clerks, from which she derives a comfortable income.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Dawson are still acting the parts of leading actor and actress at the Pearl Theatre; they occasionally perform elsewhere, but they are warm favourites with the patrons of the old house, and cling to it.

Dawson is now partner in the business, and it is quite on the cards that when Mr. Dunn retires from the stage of life he will leave all his properties to the son of his old friend.

GEORGE KNIGHT.

HAVE YOU GOT THAT TEN POUND NOTE?

Thirty-five Ten-Pound Notes Going Begging!

YOU CAN HAVE ONE FOR THE ASKING!

THE latest scheme of PEARSON'S WEEKLY is unquestionably one of the most astounding that has yet been placed before the readers of any paper. Broadly speaking, the Editor places you in the position of getting ten pounds by simply asking for it.

The idea is this:

Thirty men are wandering about the country, each with a sealed envelope in his pocket. Each envelope is of linen, tough and unbreakable. No one but the Editor knows exactly what is in those envelopes, so the contents cannot be forged. Each contains, as a matter of fact, a letter signed by the Editor authorising the first person who asks for it to the sum of £10.

NOW YOU SEE HOW YOU CAN GET £10 FOR ASKING.

We don't expect you to rush out at once and ask every man you meet if he has the envelope. That would be foolish—a mere waste of time. Moreover, you would probably get a rebuff.

What you should do is to quietly watch everyone you come in contact with. If you think the man you see is likely to be one of these men, you can, in an inoffensive and quiet manner, simply say: "By-the-way, have you seen this scheme?" and show him this page. If he is not one of the £10 gentlemen he will say he hasn't seen the scheme, and will be interested, and thank you for putting the chance of making £10 in his way. If he is one of the Ten Pounders he will quietly and unostentatiously take out his pocket-book and hand you the sealed letter.

This you will at once post to us in a registered envelope, and WE WILL SEND YOU A CHEQUE FOR £10.

THE TEN-POUNDERS

Will travel by the train. Will wear ordinary clothes.
Will stop at all sorts of hotels. Will smoke and drink.
Will attend places of entertainment.
Will look in shop windows.
Will loaf about the beach or parks.

In fact, will behave just like ordinary mortals.

They will wander about our big cities, they will alight from trains at wayside stations, and walk about villages and small towns, and they will altogether give every opportunity to people to get those £10 notes.

If you are at this moment in the train one of these men may be opposite you, or sitting next to you!

Just casually show him this page. If he's one of them you'll get £10.

You will at once say: "Oh, yes, but I might ask a thousand people, and yet not get the right one."

Of course you might; but then, you might ask three, and the third might be the right one. Don't think because you simply move in a limited circle during your day's work that you're not likely to see the right man. All these men will intrude themselves unostentatiously into people's daily lives. They may converse with you on any subjects but those which will give you a hint regarding the ten pounds, unless you broach such subject yourself.

Don't think that you have to ask everyone you meet. Just show the page to a fellow passenger by boat or train, to a chance acquaintance on the beach or on the parade. No harm is done if he's not the right chap. You can both just laugh over it.

ALREADY FOUR £10 NOTES HAVE BEEN CLAIMED.

Two have gone to London, one to Southend, and one to Norwich.

Full details appear in Pearson's Weekly.

Every day the Ten Pounders will write to the Editor and tell their experiences—where they had breakfast, where they lunched, whom they sat next to, what those people were like, what they were talking about, and what they ate—in fact, will say just exactly what they have been doing every day. Some of this information will be published in the Daily Express every day and in Pearson's Weekly every week, so you will know just how things are going along.

Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXIII.—He Tunes His Own Piano and Thereby Saves £5.

It was after dinner, but instead of sitting down to his evening paper and cigar Mr. Bowser was prowling round the lower part of the house. Mrs. Bowser realised that "something was up," but she maintained silence until at length he paused before her and said:

"Last night while you were playing the piano I noticed that it was sadly out of tune. You must have heard some of the keys make a sort of ur-ur-ur as you struck them."

"I heard nothing of the sort!" promptly replied Mrs. Bowser as a dim idea of what he was up to flashed across her mind. "The piano was tuned only a month ago, and there are no ur-ur-urs about it."

"But I insist that there are," continued Mr. Bowser. "I have a keen ear, and I say that no less than seven different keys had the sound of an egg beater at work. It may have been tuned a month ago, but by whom?"

"By a first class tuner."

"That is, he of course claimed to be first class and charged you five shillings, but how do you know that he wasn't a carpenter or blacksmith? There's a piano which cost me £50. It is going to rack and ruin for the need of a little overhauling. To get a competent man up here will cost £5 whereas——"

"Whereas you can do the work in an hour yourself," finished Mrs. Bowser. "Well, now, you let that piano alone! You know no more about the works of a piano than I do about the kitchen of the Tsar of Russia. If there's anything to be done, I'll get a man up here."

"Madam," said Mr. Bowser as he stood before her with his hands clasped underneath his coat-tails, "there is an ur-ur-ur to that piano. It is out of repair; it is going to ruin. I can overhaul it in one hour and save £5. It will be a pleasure for me to do the work, and I also feel it is my duty to save the money which would have to be otherwise paid out. I shall proceed to tune."

"But you'll only destroy it. If you feel that you must tinker away at something, why don't you take the lawn-mower, the gasmeter or that old airgun in the garret."

"I do not ask you to remain in the room during the tuning process. You can put on your hat and go for a walk, or you can go up to your room and read a novel. When I have restored the tone to its original volume and sweetness, I will call you."

"But I beg you to—to——"

Mr. Bowser waved his hand to signify that nothing on the face of the earth could turn him aside, and as Mrs. Bowser went upstairs with tears in her eyes he got out his tool box and peeled off his coat and jacket to begin work. He met with an adventure at the very outset. He wanted room to work on all sides of the piano, and he therefore got behind it to push it out into the middle of the floor. He was heaving away with his shoulder against the case when his foot slipped on the carpet and he went down and rolled over with the weight of an elephant. He fell up against a chair and knocked that over, and he was still lying on his back when Mrs. Bowser came half-way down the stairs to call out:

"I thought the walls were falling in! What are you doing on your back on the floor!"

"I wanted to see the underside of the piano," he replied as he got up. "Should I find myself in need of your assistance I will call you."

As tools for piano tuning Mr. Bowser had a hammer, a hatchet, a tack-puller, a corkscrew, a screwdriver and a monkey-wrench. As he folded back the cover he saw the inside of a piano for the first time in his life. He had taken only one glance when he walked to the foot of the stairs and called to Mrs. Bowser:

"No wonder there was an ur-ur-ur when you hit some of the keys! What d'you 'spose your first class piano-tuner left among the wires?"

"He couldn't have left any of his tools?" she queried.

"No tools, but half-a-dozen strips of red flannel. He even wove them in among the strings. That's probably where my missing flannel shirt went to. He was probably some man from a woollen mill."

"Why, those strips are always put in," protested Mrs. Bowser. "I think the idea is to soften the sound."

"Well, I don't. I think the idea is to attract rats and mice, and out they come."

When Mr. Bowser finished pulling out the "rags," he very quickly discovered the method of tightening up the strings. With one hand he fitted the monkey-wrench to turn the keys, and with the other he started a tum-tum-tum on the keys, as he had once or twice seen a regular tuner do. He couldn't exactly decide whether all the strings had to be tightened or loosened and so he took the middle course and tightened and loosened half. The effect wasn't exactly magical; it was worse. Some of the keys piped and sobbed, and there were others which produced sounds as of a saw trying to eat its way into a crowbar.

"Good gracious! What are you doing now?" called Mrs. Bowser after three or four minutes.

"The girl I left behind me."

"Saving a piano from wreck and ruin," replied Mr. Bowser as two chills tried to gallop up his spine at the same time.

He hadn't quite hit it. He grudgingly admitted the fact to himself and then began anew. In a dim, uncertain way he seemed to remember something about "pitch" in connection with tuning. He couldn't possibly recall whether it was high pitch, low pitch or half-and half pitch, but he wasn't the man to hesitate. He began humming the air of "The Girl I Left Behind Me," and keeping up the tum-tum on the keys.

After a while he found a sound to agree with his hum, and he took that for a rallying point. It was what he called a so-so pitch, and after half an hour of playing up and playing down he got three keys which appeared to agree that some sort of a girl had been left behind somebody. The other strings were obstinate. They wanted to play "Ta-ra-ra," "The Sweet By and By," or "Linger Longer Lucy," and every five minutes Mrs. Bowser kept calling down to know if a strange cat had got into the house or if Mr. Bowser had got an attack of colic. He finally refused to answer her, but with teeth shut hard and a glare in his eyes he started out to bring those strings into harmony or break up the whole thing. He tightened ten, one after another, until they set up a humming, and then he mopped his brow and started to tum-tum the keys.

There were ten sounds to bring out the gooseflesh, but scarcely had the first shudder passed over Mr. Bowser when the wires began to snap. The end of the first one flicked his ear, the second one curled his hair and the third just brushed his chin.

He was moving away when four went at once, and one of them had business with his nose. Mrs. Bowser heard a yell and a sit down, and she came flying down stairs to find Mr. Bowser sitting against the wall with his nose in his hand. It was bleeding like a beer barrel with the bung out, and the skin had been peeled from end to base. His eyes were also weeping large tears, and his bald head had a welt across it.

"Well, you've tuned the piano!" said Mrs. Bowser as she looked down upon him.

"Who—who threw a cat in my face?" he asked as he realised her presence.

"It's a wonder you didn't say I did," she answered, "and then go and threaten a separation and all that. It was one of the wires that struck you, and you'll want court plaster on that nose for a month."

"Wo-man—wo——" he began, but she stopped him with a gesture, and said:

"It will cost several pounds to have that piano righted, but it shall be done to-morrow! You've got to the end of your tune, and now go upstairs and let me see how nearly killed you are!"

Mr. Bowser obeyed without a protest. More than that, he never said a word while she was crisscrossing his nose with six strips of plaster.

It was only after he was in bed that he growled unde his breath:

"It was a put up job to assassinate me, and you bet your life I'll make it cost somebody mighty dear!"

Promotion by Luck.

DURING a residence of some years in Paris I became acquainted with about a dozen members of the detective force, but only on one occasion did I ever get a story from one of them.

I suppose that was my fault; I am over-modest by nature, and did not like to ask them about their business, but I did summon up a little more courage than usual while talking with a detective outside a prominent café one cool evening in early summer.

"I say," I exclaimed, as though the thought had just struck me, "I have known you for a long time, yet you have never told me a story about any of the cases on which you have been engaged!"

Then I stopped, reddened, and wished I had not spoken. I thought he would regard it as impudence.

To my relief he laughed good-humouredly.

"Oh, I'll tell you one, if you like!" he replied. "I'll tell you about one of my earliest cases; it brought me promotion, but it was promotion by luck and not by merit."

Then he told the story, which I reproduce as nearly as possible in his own words. I have always regarded the affair as characteristically French.

"One afternoon, Dr. Berton heard a carriage stop before the door of his house in the Rue de Turenne, and curiosity prompted him to take a furtive glance from the corner of the window. It was a rather elegant affair; not a private carriage, he surmised, but that did not go for much. The hirer must be a person of wealth, and many exalted people, living in spacious flats, do not trouble to keep their own carriages.

"He saw two persons alight from the carriage and ascend the steps—a man and woman of middle age—while the third occupant, a young woman, remained in the conveyance.

"The doctor was a young man trying to work up a good practice and he felt greatly pleased; this visit would add to his reputation in the neighbourhood, and some recommendations among the upper circles. He wondered how he had contrived to attract attention, and came to the conclusion that it was through an article of his in a medical journal.

"In a few moments the lady was ushered into his presence; he wondered why the gentleman had not come with her, but he soon received an explanation.

"'Dr. Berton,' said the lady after the usual formal greeting, 'I wish to consult you on a matter of some importance and delicacy. I understand that you are a specialist in nervous complaints and mental disorders.'

"The doctor bowed; he was not aware that he had gained any repute in such complaints, but believed that he was as well able to treat them as the majority of medical men in Paris. He was not going to throw away a good chance.

"'I am the Baroness de Sollen,' continued the lady, 'and I wish to consult you about my husband. I have induced him to stay in the waiting-room until I have spoken to you. Oh, I am so distressed, and I hardly like to speak on this subject! I may fully rely on your professional confidence?'

"'Certainly, Madame!'

"The doctor was flattered; he did not know the Baroness, nor had the name occurred to him, but that was not an important detail. There were many titled people in Paris of German descent; their titles were German, although they were now French at heart. Quite close to his house was the Boulevard de Haussmann—that name was German enough!

"'My husband has been living at a high rate during the past year or so,' continued the lady in a low tone. 'I will not enter into particulars, but he has a kind of mania just now for jewellery and—er, actresses. The latest instance is that he wishes to purchase diamonds to the value of £2,000! It cannot possibly go on, we shall be ruined! I wish you to examine him and pronounce an opinion. He is suffering from an attack of some kind just now, and I have taken advantage of this to bring him here under the impression that you will hand him the money to pay for the gems. I am sure I do not really know how I have succeeded in deceiving him to that extent; perhaps he thinks I have brought him to his bankers. But he is here, and you will see him?'

"'Certainly!'

"'Then I will go to him and tell him to come in here,' said the lady, before the medical gentleman had time to say more. 'No,' she continued, anticipating what he was about to say, 'I must not be present at the interview. I will remain in the waiting-room. I will fetch him; your servant could not induce him to move, I am convinced of that. I will see you afterwards.'

"As the Baron entered, the doctor ran his eye swiftly over him; but he did not appear quite on a level with his wife, his bearing was not so suggestive of the aristocrat. Dr. Berton concluded that this was one of the results of his errac ic conduct during the last year or so.

"'Good morning,' said the doctor; he was on the point of addressing his visitor by his title, when he remembered that the patient might fancy he was coming incognito; at any rate, even at the risk of being thought impolite, he suppressed the title.

"'Good morning,' replied the visitor affably.

"The medical gentleman took out his watch and approached the patient.

"'Let me feel your pulse,' he requested. 'Keep quite calm.'

"'What the——'

"'Pray be calm!' urged the doctor. 'I merely wish to take note of your pulse. You might put out your tongue at the same time!'

"'Oh, come! I am not here to be examined,' protested the patient. 'I want the money for those diamonds. You know!'

"'H'm!' murmured Berton. 'I fancy this is rather a serious case; he seems to be suffering from mental derangement.'

"Then he continued aloud:

"'Yes, yes! We will talk of that presently; I wish to make a brief examination. Let me feel your pulse.'

"He caught hold of the other's wrist, but the visitor wrenched himself free and sprang to his feet.

"'What is all this nonsense about?' he shouted, his face reddening with annoyance. 'I came here for £2,000, the price of those diamonds.'

"Dr. Berton stepped back in dismay and placed his hand on the bell. The Baron was getting violent, and he began to fear that he had to deal with a maniac.

"'My dear Baron de Sollen,' said the doctor soothingly, 'I understand your case perfectly, and I beg of you to be calm. In the course of a few days I will relieve you from this attack. Never mind about the money; just take your seat again——'

"'Baron de Sollen!' shouted the visitor excitedly. 'Are you mad? I'm not the Baron! I am a jeweller, and I want the money for the diamonds which the Baroness brought here for your approval! You are robbing me!'

"Berton rang the bell to summon assistance. When the man-servant arrived, Berton and he forced the visitor into a chair.

"Berton had now come to the conclusion that something was wrong, so he asked his patient to explain. The man's story may be summed up in a few lines. His name was Jacques Baudet and he was a jeweller on the Boulevard des Ca ucins. On the previous day the Baroness de Sollen called at his shop in company with a young woman, and stated that she was one of the organisers of a charity lottery. She had been commissioned to select the chief prizes, and the first prize was to be a set of diamonds or something of that kind, in order to attract the wealthy classes and induce them to purchase a large number of tickets. She finally selected a magnificent diamond necklace, and had asked him to reserve it for a day until she had had an opportunity of speaking to Dr. Berton, who was at the head of the committee.

"On this particular day she had called again in her carriage and had asked him to go with her to Dr. Berton's residence, taking the necklace with him, so that Berton might finally decide. He had consented. When in the waiting-room, she had asked him for the necklace so that she might show it to Berton, and by her influence induce him to consent to the purchase. To this he had agreed.

"On returning to the waiting-room, she had said that Berton had the necklace and if he, the jeweller, went into the consulting room, the doctor would buy it and give him the money, but might want to beat down the price a little, to which she advised him not to agree. She would remain in the waiting-room, and leave him and the doctor to settle the matter together.

"'And now,' said the unsuspecting jeweller, 'give me back my diamonds, for it seems that the Baroness has been playing a joke on me for some reason or other.'

"'But I haven't seen the diamonds!' exclaimed the doctor.

"Then the truth burst upon both of them. Berton uttered an exclamation of rage and made a rush for the waiting-room, followed by the jeweller. As they both now anticipated, the Baroness was gone and her carriage had disappeared.

"It would be useless to attempt to describe the feelings of both doctor and jeweller at having allowed themselves to be duped in that way.

"Now comes the personal element, and it shows how strange is the truth and what a man will do to win the girl he loves.

"In the midst of the hubbub, a detective called upon the doctor and requested his attendance and that of the jeweller at the nearest police station. This was a new turn, and both gentlemen looked at the officer in amazement, wondering whether the wily Baroness had further complicated matters by bringing some trumped-up charge against them.

"The detective declined to satisfy their curiosity and requested their immediate compliance; he only knew one side of the affair—precisely that which was unknown to the two men—and he wished to observe how they behaved, as a clue to the truth.

"His attention had been attracted, not far from the station, by an open carriage, driven by a young man, in which were two ladies, both appealing to someone to stop the horses, as the driver was taking them in the wrong direction and would not obey their orders.

"He called to the driver to stop, but his command not being obeyed, he succeeded in climbing to the seat beside the driver at some personal risk. The young fellow insisted that he was driving the two ladies to the police station, as they had committed a robbery and had stolen a valuable diamond necklace. In the end, the detective decided that they had all better go the police-station and sift the matter.

"Of course, there was a great to-do. The ladies indignantly denied that they had committed any robbery and voluntarily agreed that they should be searched; nothing was found on them. The young man made an explanation which seemed too wild for belief.

"He had been an assistant to M. Baudet, but having had the presumption to aspire to become the husband of the jeweller's daughter, he had been dismissed. He had been forced to take up the situation of a coachman in the employ of a jobmaster. He and the girl were in love with each other and still met secretly.

"The girl had told him on the previous evening what her father had said at home about the probable purchase of the diamond necklace. He had not taken much notice of it, but in the morning she had purposely met him to implore his help; she had dreamt that something unfortunate was about to occur to her father through that necklace.

"She asked him to risk his situation by hanging about her father's shop and following the lady or her carriage. He thought it a wild affair, but the somewhat romantic girl pointed out that if he were by good luck to prevent misfortune to her father, that worthy would probably consent to their marriage and reinstate the lover.

"He had done as he was bidden, and had grown suspicious as he followed the course of events. He had beguiled the driver from the box and had offered to mind the carriage while the coachman went for a drink. Fortune favoured the daring lover; the ladies came out of Berton's house without the jeweller, and this confirmed his suspicions.

"Instead of driving them to the desired destination, he had taken them part of the way and then turned off towards the station, hoping that they might not notice where they were going until he got them there.

"It was a bold stroke to charge them with theft, seeing that he had very little evidence; but he had entered upon the undertaking and intended to carry it through at all costs—for lo e of Marie. Things looked bad for him when the necklace was not found in their possession, but he had no alternative — he must brazen it out.

"So he insisted that the doctor and the jeweller should be fetched, and ultimately, in spite of the protests of the ladies, this was agreed to. Naturally, the arrival of these two gentlemen put a different complexion on the matter, but there was still some mystery attaching to it.

"The ladies vowed that they had never seen the necklace; if the jeweller had brought it with him, he had retained possession of it. The jeweller declared that he had handed it to the Baroness, but there was no evidence to support this statement.

"However, there was no doubt that the Baroness had attempted either a robbery or a hoax. And the fact that she was no Baroness at all and could g ve no reason for playing a hoax, was evidence in favour of robbery.

"But where was the necklace? After some cogitation, it was concluded that she had thrown it away, but it occurred to the detective at length—it is his business, to think of everything—that it might still be in the carriage. And in fact it was found neatly hidden at the back of one of the seats.

"The Baroness and her accomplice received their just reward, the younger woman getting off lightly, as she appeared to have done very little. The young assistant is now the son-in-law and partner of M. Baudet.

"When that case was made public, it appeared in the papers in a distorted form, and the detectives got most of the credit. Frenchmen dread ridicule, and the 'personal element' was suppressed as much as possible. I have said that the Baroness received her just reward, but that is hardly correct. The case was not pressed against her as much as it ought to have been, which helped the prosecutor to keep the details about his daughter's dream, and so on, from the public. It would certainly have brought ridicule upon him and he did not relish that.

"That case helped me to win promotion; I have always felt a little ashamed, but I think I have deserved the promotion in other ways since then."

Allinson's Blunder.

No young fellow of twenty-five ever felt more pleased with himself and with things in general than did Frank Allinson as, one summer morning, he s ttled himsel. in a far corner of a railway carriage and prepared to make himself comfortable for a somewhat lengthy railway journey. In truth, he had reason to be pleased, for he was about to pay a visit to his lady-love, and there was no doubt that the said lady-love was looking forward to his arrival and that the romantic courtship would reach its proper climax during his stay under her father's roof.

The carriage did not fill up before the train started; there were only four passengers, one in each corner, so Allinson had plenty of room for the numerous newspapers and periodicals which he had brought with him to beguile the time; but, to the surprise of the other passengers who cast occasional amused glances at the pile of reading matter, Frank made no attempt to read. He folded his arms, crossed his legs, and gazed fixedly at the roof of the carriage. He was busy with his thoughts, and if we follow his reflections we shall gather sufficient information to enable us to understand the position.

"Romantic, that's just it!" mused Allinson. "It could hardly be more so—in a quiet way, of course. No battle or murder, no breaking of hearts or anything of that sort, you know, but just quiet romance."

And then he smiled complacently.

"This is how it was"—he imagined that he was communicating this information to some invisible friend—"so you can judge for yourself. I had to go up North for the firm on an important piece of business. I arrived early in the morning, did the business and intended to return by the night train, but I met with a slight accident which upset my plan about returning so promptly.

"I had three hours to spare, so I hired a bike and went for a ride in the rural part of the place. Just as I was enjoying the ride in a quiet spot, a dog ran out and got mixed up with the bicycle, and down I came a cropper. When I picked myself up, I found that I had cut my hand rather badly, to say nothing of the bruises in various parts of my anatomy.

"I felt much shaken, and the bike wasn't any the better for the spill. I looked round for that dog to give him something for his pains—and for the pains he had given me—and up came an elderly gentleman and apologised profusely for what his dog had done.

"Well, the upshot of it was that he insisted upon my going to his house and having my hand bound up. As we walked along, I explained that I was supposed to return by the night train. He said he would send a telegram for me, as he felt sure that I shouldn't be able to get back to the town for the train; when I told him the name of the firm, it turned out that he was a great friend of the senior partner! Mr. Haverill said I need not be at all uneasy as he would arrange the thing, and that I had better stay the night.

"I stayed at his house that night and left at noon on the following day. I saw her and the older lady at breakfast, and—I clean lost my heart to that girl! I tried to think that I was not so hard hit as I fancied, and I told myself that in real life a fellow doesn't fall in love with a girl right off in that way; but it was no good. Before I had been home a week I was getting desperate about it, so I decided to try my luck by letter.

"I wrote a letter, telling her respectfully of my admiration for her; that, although I had only seen her once, she had made an ineffaceable impression upon my heart, and all that sort of thing. In the letter I addressed her as 'Dear Miss Haverill,' but on the envelope I had to put 'Miss Janet Haverill,' otherwise it might have fallen into the aunt's hands. Phew!"

For a moment the serene look on Allinson's face vanished at the thought that his little scheme would have been upset and he would never have had a chance of winning Janet.

"Of course, she would have told her brother and there would have been no end of trouble. She was particularly nice to me, I own, but aunts can be awkward under such circumstances. Stroke her the right way and I should say that she is a really nice woman, that aunt. Still, I didn't want my letter to fall into her hands! I believe I only heard their Christian names once. It was lucky I heard them at all, or how on earth could I have addressed that letter to Janet?

"I received an answer which led me to think that I might go on. I believe in taking one's chances, so I went on and boldly addressed her as 'Dear Janet,' and since then the correspondence has continued. She has arranged, in response to a hint from me, for the old gentleman to send me an invitation to spend two or three days up there, and it won't be my fault if I am not engaged to his daughter before I come away!"

And as that is as far as we need follow Allinson's train of thought, we will leave him to his meditations and join him again on his arrival at the end of his railway journey.

Allinson found Mr. Haverill waiting for him in a dog cart.

"Here you are!" said that gentleman cheerily. "I had to come to town myself on an urgent matter, so I thought I'd wait for you and take you home. Jump in, and we'll be off."

Allinson thought this was a piece of good fortune; the old gentleman, as he styled him, was evidently in a good humour, and there would be a chance of working in some hint or observation which might show Mr. Haverill "how the land lay" and might also enable Allinson to discover whether Janet's father was favourable to the proposed engagement or only luke-warm on the subject. After a few minutes' drive, Frank decided to venture an inquiry.

"I trust your daughter is quite well, Mr. Haverill," he remarked.

He intended his manner to be quite easy, but he felt that it was awkward.

"Oh, yes! Bessie's in splendid health, thank you," responded Haverill heartily, as he deftly flicked a fly from the back of the horse.

"H'm! he must have misunderstood me," thought Allinson. "I'll try again."

Then, aloud, he continued:

"How is Miss Janet Haverill?"

He emphasised the Christian name.

"Quite well, thank you. My sister has been in remarkably good spirits lately. Shouldn't wonder if we meet her when we get nearer home; she is very good to the poor people, and this is one of her visiting days."

Allinson felt himself slowly turning pale and cold. What did this mean? He had spoken distinctly enough, and there could be no doubt that Haverill had not spoken heedlessly. A nameless fear began to take possession of Allinson; could it be that he had made a blunder in the Christian names of the two women! Horrible thought! If that were so, he stood practically pledged to the aunt of the girl with whom he had fallen in love.

While he was deliberating upon the best way to ascertain the truth, Haverill put an end to all doubt by remarking:

"Bessie goes with her aunt sometimes, but this afternoon she wanted to do something in her own piece of garden, so we shall find my daughter at home."

The words fell upon Allinson's ears like a death sentence, and a groan escaped his lips, causing his companion to ask, "Eh?" under the impression that the young man had said something.

It was true, he had made a mistake! What an idiot he had been! And how was he to get out of it—could he get out of it?

Miss Janet Haverill was much younger than her brother, but she was probably thirty-three; no doubt she was an agreeable woman—a good woman—but not the woman he would have for choice.

He understood now why her letters had seemed rather temperate; he had noticed this from the first, and it had restrained his own ebullitions.

Only about half-a-dozen letters had passed on either side, and Allinson had promised himself that he would make up for the comparative coolness of the written communications when he saw the girl again and "fixed up" the engagement. He had put it down to maidenly modesty; he was now inclined to call it old-maidenly modesty.

The difference between Allinson's feelings when he began his journey and his feelings as he finished it must be left to the imagination of the reader.

He scarcely spoke a word during the remainder of the drive; he was busily occupied in trying alternately to evolve some scheme for getting out of the difficulty and persuading himself that it would not be so bad if he did have to marry the aunt, as thirty-three is not a great age.

As they drew up at the door, Bessie appeared to welcome them; then Allinson set his teeth and made up his mind to try the plan which had occurred to him. It was risky, but desperate diseases require desperate remedies.

He was shown to his room as soon as the usual formalities were over, but there was no time to be lost. He made his way downstairs again and entered the drawing-room, where, to his delight, he found Bessie.

His joy was increased when she suggested that he might like to look at the garden—there was just time before tea.

He readily assented.

"I'm in luck!" he murmured. "I hope to goodness my luck will continue and get me out of this mess!"

It was a nice little garden, but Allinson paid little heed to it; he saw what appeared to be a quiet corner and directed his steps towards it, Bessie accompanying him as a matter of course.

When he reached the spot he found that it was even more secluded than he had supposed, and with a deep breath he began the attack.

"Miss Haverill—Bessie," he began boldly, taking her hand and looking straight into her eyes, "for three whole months I have longed for this moment! I loved you the very moment I first saw you, and my love has been increasing from that moment to this. Forgive me if I have been abrupt, and let the strength of my love be my excuse."

Taken by surprise, the girl stood motionless; her colour came and went, her breathing seemed almost to cease, but Frank noticed that she did not attempt to withdraw her hand. A fierce joy filled his heart, and he continued with a passionate earnestness that could not be mistaken. His boldness and sincerity were in his favour; there is some attraction in being thus taken by storm.

"Listen to what I have to say, and you will see what I have dared in order to win you," he continued. "And when you have heard, you will help me."

Still holding the girl's hand, still gazing stedfastly into her eyes, he spoke of the impression she had made upon him at their first meeting, and how his love had caused him to risk her displeasure and that of her father by writing to her. He went very fully into that part of the story, and he could see that the recital was pleasing to Bessie. Then, in a straightforward manly way, he briefly told her what had happened.

When he had finished, his heart seemed to stand still as he awaited some word or sign from Bessie; he knew that the position was a ridiculous one—one that might excite the laughter rather than the sympathy of the girl who stood before him. At that moment Allinson would have given a great deal never to have been born.

There was a conflict of sentiment in Bessie's heart; there was an inclination to laugh, yet she could not but recognise that the young fellow must love her deeply to have ventured upon such a step, and that the mistake was the result of his venture. She liked him, she was charmed by his open manner, and every girl is naturally pleased when a man risks something for her sake.

"It is a dreadful mistake that you should have written to Aunt Janet instead of to me, Mr. Allinson," she said demurely, yet there was just the slightest trace of a twinkle of merriment in her eyes. "I will help you, just to spare auntie—and it might make me look ridiculous——"

"You're an angel!" cried Frank ecstatically. "Then you do love me?"

"Oh, I didn't say so!" returned the girl archly. "It is just possible that I might——"

But she didn't have a chance to finish the sentence, for Allinson had her in his arms. And they were both perfectly unconscious that behind the shrubs was a woman with her hands pressed to her heart; Miss Janet Haverill had returned and had entered the garden in search of them, arriving just in time to catch enough of Allinson's story to realise the truth.

While Frank and Bessie were spending a few blissful moments, the mind of Janet Haverill was busy with a plan for cutting the knot. With lightning rapidity the thought flashed through her brain. How foolish she had been to suppose that this young man could fall in love with her while Bessie was there! What should she do? Most people thought her very prim and somewhat eccentric—why not take advantage of this reputation? It would not be acting truthfully, which was against her principles, but—

A noise behind the shrub made the lovers start and stand apart. Miss Janet Haverill stepped forward with a smile, holding out a hand to each.

"I have been guilty of a little plot in the interest of Bessie's happiness," she said with a smile and in a firm voice.

Her hearers did not know what it cost her to speak thus.

"Bessie has no mother, and I have to act in that capacity as well as I can. When I received Mr. Allinson's letter which was intended for Bessie, I resolved to find out, if I could, whether he was worthy of her. Hence my little plot and my request to my brother that he should invite Mr. Allinson here for a day or two. It was rather a peculiar thing to do, but I have a reputation for doing peculiar things now and then. Now I think I had better leave you."

And before the astonished young people could well understand what it all meant, she was gone. It was well for her that she did leave them, for she could not have kept up the part another minute.

"Well—I—never!" exclaimed Allinson.

Then he heaved a tremendous sigh of relief.

"It is very good of her to look after me," said Bessie slowly, "but it was a strange thing to do. She is a little eccentric."

There was a pause for a few seconds.

"But I wish she had let me do my own love-making—I mean my own correspondence."

"Yes, you mean correspondence. You can do your own love-making now, and the more you do the better I shall like it!"

"So that's why Janet wanted me to invite the young fellow, eh?" muttered Mr. Haverill, as he retired for the night. "She knew he was sweet on Bessie and wanted to bring them together! She mumbled something about having written to him. Fancy Janet turning match-maker! But you never can get to the bottom of a woman, they're too deep!"

Mr. Haverill would have been even more surprised if he had seen what was on the letters which his sister burnt that night in her room while the tears slowly fell from her half-closed eyes.

CHAPTER XII.

An Adventure in the Forest.

The side path into which Don Antonio led us was so obstructed by bush and bramble that the Zambo and the Indian had to go in front and broaden it with their machetes, which they did nearly as fast as they could walk, and in a few minutes we came to a place where the trees were wider apart and the undergrowth less dense. Here a halt was called and the lancer lifted from his horse and laid on the ground.

Bearing in mind Bonanza's warning I inquired in a whisper whither he had been and what had happened.

After listening intently and looking anxiously round, he answered, also in an undertone:

"I left you so suddenly because I fancied I saw through the trees the red plume of a dragoon, but thinking I might be mistaken, and knowing that if I gave a false alarm you would laugh at me, I went forward to get a better view and after a sharp run caught sight of a Spanish lancer as he disappeared at a bend in the trail. So the red plume was no illusion. Perhaps I should have returned at once, but at the same instant it occurred to me that it would be well if I could first lay the fellow by the heels and ascertain whence he came and what he was after. To this end I made through the wood, mostly on my hands and knees, and as the track thereabouts turns abruptly to the right got ahead of him, posted myself behind a bush and there awaited his coming.

"As shooting would have alarmed the lancer's comrades, if, as I conjectured, he had comrades, I drew my sword and, as he went by, sprang from my hiding place and gave him a stroke on the head that brought him senseless to the ground, fastened him to the saddle with his stirrup leathers and hurried back. Yet not before I had descried other red plumes moving, as it seemed, hitherward, though owing to the windings of the track and the closeness of the trees I may be mistaken. Anyhow they cannot be far off, and there may be more of them about, for which reason I turned in here and warned you to make no noise."

While Don Antonio was speaking we had been pouring aguardiente down the wounded man's throat, who soon so far recovered his senses as to be able to answer questions, albeit he was much weakened by loss of blood and appeared to be almost at the last gasp.

He said he belonged to a regiment stationed at a place called Vargos, whither, early in the morning, a scout had brought word that Bolivar and two British generals were at Marco (where we had spent the night) on which a squadron was dispatched thither to take us, dead or alive; but on finding we were gone they rode on, hoping we might land again, their scouts meanwhile keeping the boats in view from the river bank.

The man said further that he formed part of a sergeant's guard, which had been ordered to scour the wood, that the main body were in the neighbourhood, and scouts everywhere.

"You are surrounded and cannot escape, my death will be avenged," he added faintly, then fell back and spoke no more.

This was alarming intelligence indeed, for though well armed we were only four, and escaping the hundred men, which was probably the strength of the squadron, seemed almost past praying for. If our retreat had not already been cut off it soon would be. Returning by the cattle track was impossible. It was the way our pursuers would take. Equally impossible to stay where we were, we could be tracked by the dead lancer's blood and the hoof prints of his horse.

Our only chance was to take to the forest and make for the river, an undertaking that would involve a path in some places and crawling in others. Moreover, we might encounter vegetation so dense as to be absolutely impassable, while if we did not keep within easy reach of the trail, we should lose ourselves in the mazes of the forest. But we had no choice; successful or unsuccessful, the attempt must be made, and quickly.

Don Antonio tethered the horse to a tree and gave the dead trooper's carbine, pistols and ammunition, to the Zambo, who had only his machete. Then we crept under the bushes, and lest the Indian should desert, or fall into the hands of the soldiers and tell them which way we had gone, we made him go first.

This was, as we thought, a necessary precaution, though it almost proved our ruin, for shortly afterwards we heard voices and the neigh of a horse, and through the network of brambles and branches espied the nodding plumes of half a score helmets, whereupon the Indian, frantic with fear, uttered a loud yell.

Bonanza knocked him down and grasped his throat, but too late, the Spaniards had heard the cry and came on with exultant shouts, we on our part kneeling behind two prostrate trees, which having fallen crosswise, made a serviceable breastwork. When they had got as close as the thickness of the timber and the nature of the ground permitted, our assailants called on us to surrender, and, receiving no reply, opened fire with their pistols and carbines, but being well sheltered, none of us were hit.

On the other hand, to remain where we were and let these fellows stand by till the others came up would be fatal.

"Let each take his man from the right, then retreat to the left. If we shoot straight we may kill three or four of them," whispered Santleo.

Which we did, aiming so true that the discharge emptied four saddles. On this the Spaniards, wild with rage, made a desperate attempt to reach us, but the efforts of the loose horses to break away, and the refusal of the others to face the thorns and leap the logs, threw them into confusion, an opportunity by which we profited to fire a volley with our pistols that emptied two more saddles and wounded a horse.

The Zambo cut the nearest Spaniard down with his machete.

We were now equal, four to four, and seeing that the troopers had dismounted we sprang over the logs and charged; the Zambo, who was as nimble as a cat and as fleet as a deer, leading the way and cutting the nearest Spaniard down with his machete. Whereupon the remainder bolted, and we were beginning to breathe again when, to our dismay, ten more lancers, who had no doubt heard the firing, came down the trail at a gallop and burst into the thicket.

These were joined by the three fugitives, and it soon became evident that the combined force would make another attack, and as they imagined that Bolivar, on whose head a great price had been put, was almost within their grasp, it was likely to be a resolute attack.

And they were thirteen, we four!

Moreover, the Spaniards being mounted and in possession of the trail our way to the boats was barred, and with thirteen men close at our heels we could escape neither by crawling under the bushes nor cutting a way through them.

Nevertheless they seemed to hesitate and Don Antonio, ever fearless and alert, went forward on his hands and knees to make a nearer reconnaisance. Returning in a few minutes later he reported that the Godos were considering whether they should attack us on horseback or on foot.

We hoped it would be on foot, plumed helmets, cavalry boots and spurs being ill adapted for fighting in a tropical jungle.

The troopers appeared to be of the same opinion for they presently rode along the path cleared by ourselves, the three dismounted men clearing it here and there with their swords, but keeping too well in cover to give us a chance of getting a shot at them.

In the meantime we had taken up another and, as we thought, a stronger position. A sort of semi-circle it was, fronted by a tangle of fallen branches, between which we could see what went on without showing ourselves, our flanks and rear being protected by thickets that neither man nor beast could pass. So we had no way of retreat, which in ordinary circumstances would have been a serious drawback, but as with the possible exception of Don Antonio we had almost abandoned hope it made little difference. Retreat being in any event impossible all we could do was to sell our lives as dearly as might be.

A further disadvantage and cause for discouragement was the want of suitable ammunition. Our guns had two barrels, one (rifled) for bullets, the other for pellets, and not expecting to encounter either big game or enemies we had brought with us only one ball for each pull, and these having been expended, we had nothing left save small shot, of the sort used for bird and monkey killing. Neither had we any more pistol cartridges and the few found in the fallen lancer's pouch were too large for our barrels.

So there was nothing for it but to load with shot, putting two charges into each barrel, well rammed down.

Our plan was to lie perdu until the troopers were within a few yards of us, then let fly at their faces with both barrels, each of us taking two men from the right, and keep them at bay with our pistols and swords so long as we might.

Meanwhile, they continued their quest, but being bewildered by the dim light of the forest, which, to men fresh from the brilliant sunshine was semi-darkness, slowly and with frequent halts, from which we inferred that they had not yet detected our whereabouts, though the trail was plain enough to anybody with eyes.

By this time most of the lancers were on foot, slashing at the lianas and pendant vines with their swords; and closely examining the bushes as though they feared an ambuscade.

"Caramba! I believe the fools are going to miss us, after all," whispered Don Antonio. "If they go much further in that direction we shall be able to rush out and ride off on their horses."

But this new born hope was speedily quashed. A frightened yell told us that the Spaniards had unearthed the Indian, who, thinking he would be safer alone, had given us the slip and crawled under a bush.

We could hear the poor fellow's pitiful appeal for mercy, which was granted on condition of his showing them where we were hiding, and he presently appeared in front of our lair, between two lancers with drawn swords.

"There they are, behind those boughs," he said.

On this all the troopers, save one who was left to look after the horses, were formed in line and the sergeant, stepping forward, summoned us to surrender. To which, as surrender meant immediate execution, we naturally made no answer.

"A hundred thousand devils! I doubt whether they are there after all. I can neither hear them nor see them," he exclaimed. "If they are not, I'll have you hanged" (to the Indian).

"They are, they are, I saw them go there and they cannot have got away, and I heard them say they had no more cartridges," replied the trembling wretch in an agonised voice.

"We shall soon see. Advance men, and give 'em a volley."

A shower of bullets rattled among the branches, but as we had heard the order and ducked betimes we took no harm.

"Shall we destroy the dispatches?" said Don Iago in a whisper.

"How would you destroy them?" I asked.

"Tear them up and drop them into the hollow of this tree. The ants will do the rest."

"Not yet, I think. But if either of us falls the survivor had better make away with them at once."

"That is agreed, then?"

"It is, and if we both fall Don Antonio will perhaps do what is necessary."

"If that happens, I shall. But it won't," quoth he cheerily. "You are worth a good many dead men yet, señores. We are in a tight fix, I admit, but I have not the least doubt of our getting out of it. Cock your guns, gentlemen, the Godos are coming, only don't let us fire until we can see the whites of their eyes. Hark! The sergeant is giving an order."

"The rebels are either not there, or they have no cartridges," he was saying. "We will take Bolivar alive if we can, but remember that dead or alive he is worth ten thousand reales to us, and we are three to one. Another volley, my lads, then at them with the cold steel."

"Good Heavens! I believe the sergeant is a bit afraid, though they are three to one," whispered Don Antonio, with a smothered laugh.

"To your post! We are too near together," I answered, and he moved away.

The volley was given, hurting us no more than the other had done, for the same reason, and the troopers, responding with a cheer to their commander's "Forward, my lads!" came on, but being hampered by their boots and spurs and impeded by the boughs, some of which were as big as small trees, slowly and clumsily, and with many a slip and tumble, while we, unseen yet seeing everything, awaited the onset silently with our fingers on our triggers.

Notwithstanding their difficulties the men kept well together, the sergeant bringing up the rear and encouraging them very energetically with his voice, but very little by his example.

While this went on we lay low, making no sign which might give the Godos a clue to our precise whereabouts, yet vigilant withal. When they were quite close, so close that we could hear their laboured breathing and muttered curses I gave a low whistle, on which we all sprang to our feet and let fly with our seven barrels at as many heads. One man fell to the Zambo's carbine. The other poor wretches, peppered with our shot, whirled round, howling with anguish, for the pellets having scattered all were hit. Loudest of all screamed the sergeant, who had got one or two in his eye.

Their faces streamed with blood, they tumbled about in all directions, blaspheming and exclaiming, falling among the branches and running madly, they knew not whither. Several were blinded, and of the three who came off scatheless the Zambo cut down one and the others fled.

We might have killed them all, but escape, not slaughter, being our object, we ran to the horses which were tethered in a glade near our first hiding place, and when the lancer who had been left in charge of them saw what had happened he mounted and made off.

"Run! Quick and double quick! There are more coming. I can hear the jingle of their accoutrements and the tramp of their chargers," cried Don Antonio, whose ears were as sharp as his eyes.

We responded with a will, and five minutes afterwards were mounted and away.

None too soon, for on emerging from the wood we perceived a long line of lancers pacing down the trail, happily to our left, else had our retreat been cut off.

The leaders, catching sight of us, gave a loud shout, and we knew that we should have to ride with death behind us, and the off chance of being intercepted, or not finding the boats where we had left them.

I was the last. Accident had given me the place of honour, an honour, however, which I had gladly been spared. But the track being too narrow, except in a few places, for horses to pass each other or for two men to ride abreast, there was no possibility of changing the order of our going and my pride prevented my making the attempt.

As we had only a short start, everything depended on the speed and stoutness of our horses, and John Ready being on the alert. At the best, we could not count on having more than three or four minutes to embark and put a few yards of water between our pursuers and ourselves.

The trail, as I have already remarked, was narrow, a mere cattle track, rough, uneven, and slippery, and so tortuous withal that it was seldom we could see more than two or three hundred paces either backward or forward, and there were so many impending branches that it was almost as much as one's life was worth to look backward. On the other hand, and for these very reasons, the leading lancers would find it difficult to use their pistols with effect, so that I had little fear of being shot from behind.

My horse was a good sort, fleet and strong, and well up to my weight. He could have gone faster, only the Zambo's which was immediately in front of me, could not, and I had to regulate my pace by his. The two Dons could also have gone faster, and I asked them to do so, but they refused point-blank, Santleo indignantly, Bonanza with a laugh.

Fortunately for us our pursuers were under a similar disadvantage, which was to our advantage. The main body had to accommodate their speed to that of the first man. If they could have put their fleetest chargers at the head of the cavalcade it had been a poor look out for the Zambo and me. Even as it was I had serious misgivings, which were not long in being realised.

Despite the risk of breaking my head thereby I often looked backwards, but owing to dips in the ground and the windings of the trail it was not easy to make sure whether the enemy were gaining on us or we on them. Now and then I got a glimpse through an opening in the trees of a long chain of dancing plumes, now and then sighted the first man who when he saw me shook his lance fiercely, at the same time gesticulating and shouting to those behind him.

After a while, a very short while, I began to see more of this gentleman than I liked. He was gaining on us, when we presently came to an exceptionally straight bit of road. I perceived that he was considerably ahead of the others, from which I concluded the next man's horse was no better than the Zambo's and that if the first man were disposed of we should stand a better chance of making our point. As might seem, however, he was more likely to dispose of me. I could not always be casting backward glances, and as often as not he was invisible, hidden by intervening trees and bushes. He might overtake me without my knowing it, and have his lance into me before I could turn round.

What should I do? How make head against this new peril from which escape either by stratagem or speed seemed impossible.

To turn round and face my pursuer was simply to insure my capture by his comrades. Taking aim with a rifle from the back of a galloping horse at something behind you is an impossible feat, and my rifle was empty. But my pistols, double charged with shot and primed, were within reach of my hand, and in the circumstances pellets were likely to be more effective than bullets.

But as it was clear that I could not look backward, hold my pistols, guide my horse and dodge the branches at one and the same time. I told the Zambo to look for me, which he did very keenly.

We were in a narrow section of the trail and had just rounded a sharp bend when the Zambo signalled that the enemy was in sight.

I glanced backward. He was close behind, coming on with his lance couched as fast as his horse could gallop, and drawing nearer at every stride. In another minute the point of his lance would be within twenty paces of my back.

I looked before me, dodged a branch, cocked my pistols, counted sixty, then turning as far round in my saddle as I could, fired one barrel at the lancer's face, the other at the charger's head. Both shots went home; the man dropped his reins and his lance, and the horse, after giving a tremendous buck jump which sent the trooper flying over his head, wheeled round and galloped back.

All of which was highly satisfactory. I had got rid of an awkward customer, and the loose horse, maddened with pain would of a certainty throw the leading lancers into confusion and retard their progress. And a respite was needed. The Zambo's horse was showing signs of distress, and all were beginning to flag, so after turning the next bend we drew rein, and being unable to see more than a few yards either to our front or rear, listened.

I could hear only a confused murmur, mingled with a faint metallic din, which seemed a long way off, but no trampling, for the ground was soft and the horses were unshod.

"We are gaining on them," I remarked to Don Antonio, who was next before the Zambo.

"Yes, though they are nearer than you think," he answered. "The trees deaden the sound. But, fortunately, we have not much further to go, the worst is over."

And then, our panting steeds having recovered their wind somewhat, we pushed on again, and coming shortly to a part where the trees were less dense, got another glimpse of the chain of red plumes.

Bonanza was right, they were nearer than I had thought.

A few minutes afterwards we descried the creek, and gladdened by the sight, galloped merrily forward. The stress was over, the goal well nigh won We should have time to embark and get away before our pursuers could spit us with their lances or reach us with their bullets.

"Mira (Look)!" cried Don Iago, pointing to the water, and then, as it was no longer necessary for us to keep together, he went ahead, closely followed by Bonanza.

When I came up with them they were at the creek. Bonanza turned to me with a look of dismay.

The flecheras were not there.

"What can have become of your servant?" he asked.

Turning as far round in my saddle as I could I fired one barrel at the lancer's face.

"He had strict orders to wait in the creek till we returned. In a few minutes the Godos will be here and without boats, escape is impossible."

"What has become of him I know no more than yourself; but I am sure that if John Ready is alive he is not far off," quoth I.

"Let us ride further, and if we do not find him we shall perhaps find a boat," said Don Iago quietly.

Which we did, following the creek, and coming presently to the river saw the two boats standing off and on about a hundred yards from the bank, to our great relief, as also to our surprise, for we could not tell what on earth it meant.

"What a fool that fellow of yours must be," said Bonanza. "Why does not he come? Sliout to him."

"Come hither and take us on board at once," I sang out.

Ready answered that he could not, and beckoned to us to go to h m.

"Madre de Dios! The Godos are on us!" exclaimed Bonanza looking backward. "In another minute twenty lancers——"

"To the river! We must swim for it," cried Santleo, and with that plunged into the water, an example we all followed, for the Spaniards were at our heels.

As soon as the horses were out of their depth we slipped from their backs, holding on to their manes with one hand and guiding them with the other.

By this time Bonanza's twenty lancers, and as many more, were close to the river, and after a moment's hesitation a full half of them took to the water and made after us without dismounting.

The others unslung their carbines and prepared to shoot. So did John Ready and the Zambo, and as we came alongside, gave our pursuers a volley that sent several of them to the bottom and the rest to the right about.

We were no sooner aboard than the Indians paddled away with frantic energy, sail was made and we went up stream faster than we had ever gone before.

"Why did you leave the creek, John?" I asked Ready.

"Could not help it, sir. The Indians who returned from the funeral reported that there were Spaniards about, which so frightened the cowardly beggars that if I had not let them pull into the river they would have deserted, every man jack of 'em; and it was only by threatening to shoot the patrons if they moved further away, that I kept the boats where you found them. But good gracious, sir, you are wounded! Your head is bleeding."

"I daresay. I felt something sting me as we took to the water, but it cannot be anything serious or I should be there yet. Only a scalp wound," I said laying my hand on the place.

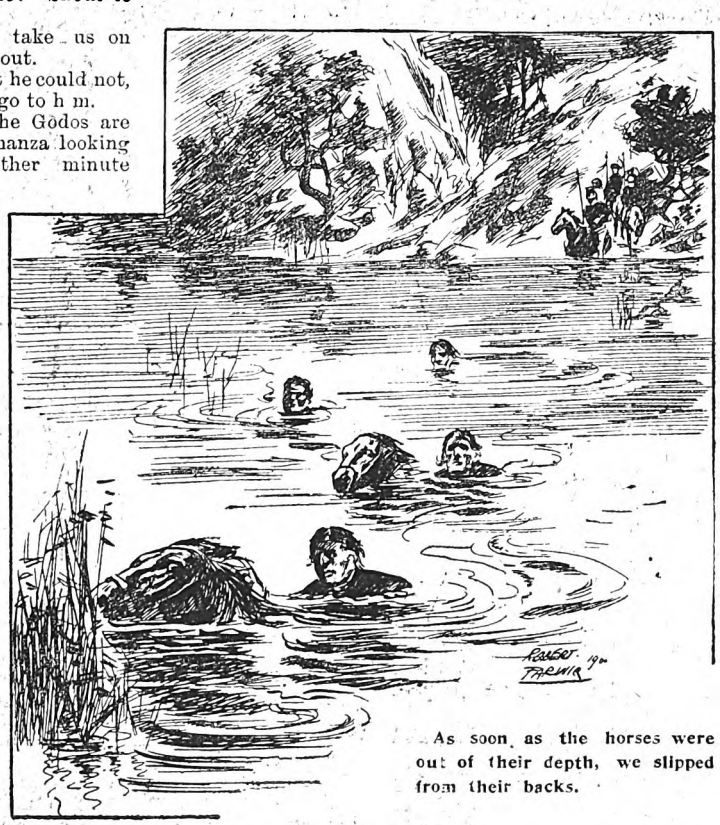
"Don Iago, too. See how he is bleeding!" exclaimed Ready.

I looked at Santleo. His coat sleeve was reddened and drops of blood were oozing from the fingers of his left hand.

"I don't think it is much," he said quietly. "I felt a bullet strike my arm when we were half way to the boat."

"Let me examine you," put in Don Antonio briskly. "As I was destined for the medical career and studied surgery for six months at Caraccas I am a bit of a doctor. Now, Señor major."

"Don Iago first. He is worse hurt than I am," quoth I, on which Bonanza slit open Santleo's sleeve with his knife.



As soon as the horses were out of their depth, we slipped from their backs.

"Ah, the bullet went through the fleshy part of the arm, just above the elbow. No bones broken, thank Heaven. I will bind it up and you must carry it in a sling for a few days."

We had brought with us a few simple surgical appliances, and these being produced, our "bit of a doctor" deftly plastered my head and bandaged Don Iago's arm.

"It might have been a good deal worse," he observed pleasantly. "Had one bullet gone a shade more to the left the bone of Don Iago's arm would have been smashed; had the other gone a shade more to the right, Señor Wyvenhoe's skull would have been smashed."

"All's well that ends well," said Santleo pensively in English.

Don Iago quoting Shakespeare in Shakespeare's own language! I could hardly believe my own ears.

"You know English, then," I exclaimed, as soon as I could speak.

"I saw the words in a book and inquired their meaning; they have dwelt in my memory. Striking phrases are apt to dwell in one's memory, you know."

"But your pronunciation is perfect."

"That is just a chance, or because I happen to have a good ear and a retentive memory; but we had better get out of these wet things, or we shall be having fever and ague."

(To be continued.)

BROWN: "You know I'm quite a near neighbour of yours now, Mrs. Golightly. I've just taken a little house on the river."

Mrs. Golightly: "Oh! Well, I hope you'll drop in one day."

One for the Girl.

A FRIEND of mine last month went to an East Coast seaside resort, and, wishing to let me know of his safe arrival, he went into a sub. post-office and inquired if he could send a telegram direct to London, and how long it would take.

The young lady, who was inclined to be snubbish, cut short his inquiries with:

"I am not paid to answer silly questions."

Her face blanched wonderfully, however, when she found herself compelled to wire the following message:

"Arrived safe. Girls here ugly and bad-tempered."

All Were Welcome.

IN Blackpool, where I was spending a holiday last week, I witnessed a good joke one morning.

At this favourite resort there are a number of auctioneers' shops along the promenade where you can purchase anything from a solid (rolled) gold watch to a pair of bootlaces.

The bidding was going on very slowly, when a fashionably dressed young man walked up to the auctioneer, and, catching him by the arm, inquired if he could bid.

"Certainly," said the knight of the hammer; "just what we want."

"Then I bid you good morning," said the joker, and retreated.

Off Their Bearings.

Two Sheffield grinders who had not been at the seaside since they were children made up their minds to have a day at Blackpool.

As they usually frequented the slipper baths when at home they thought it would be a great treat to have a dip in the briny.

Engaging a machine they were soon wading and splashing about. One of them, turning to see how his mate was getting on, saw him fumbling at the bottom as if to find something.

"What's the matter? What are ta feelin' daan in t' watter like that for?"

"What's t' matter?" replied the other. "What's ta thinks t' matter? I'm feeling for t' plug to let t' watter off."

Mr. Bowser at the Seaside.

MR. BOWSER had taken Mrs. Bowser to the seaside for a week, and as he sniffed the breezy, briny ozone of Slumpton-by-the-Sea, he said:

"Now, my dear, be sure and take all the sea air you can inhale, for this is the last holiday I can afford."

"All right, Mr. Bowser," she replied, reflecting on his past unselfish nature; "keep your mind easy, there'll be precious little left after you get your share."

Caught.

ONCE, while on a fishing tour in Scotland, a gamekeeper whom I knew, took me along the banks of a stream and showed me a place, where, said he, if I waded out to yon muckle stane, I would be sure to catch something.

Drawing on my long waterproof fishing boots, I waded over to the "muckle stane" and promptly slipped into a hole which brought the water up to my neck.

Gurgling and spluttering I turned and began to anathematise the gamekeeper, to which he coolly responded:

"Hoot awa, mon, didn't I tell ye it was a grand place tae catch things, you've just copped a crab the noo and ye'll be catchin' the cauld if ye dinna hurry oot o' that."

Scottie Again.

AN English gentleman on holiday in Scotland happened to meet an Elder in the "Auld licht Kirk" who was very severe in his denunciation of what he called "deesecreetion o' the Sawbath day" and more particularly against the crime (?) of fishing on Sunday, to which the Englishman was rather given.

The Englishman resolved to test the Elder's genuineness and, if possible, get even with him at the same time.

One Monday he turned up at the Elder's house with a particularly fine basket of trout and presented a goodly portion of them to the Elder.

After the gift was duly accepted he casually remarked:

"But, Elder, I clean forgot to tell you that these trout were caught yesterday, Sunday."

"Weel, sir," replied the Elder, gazing at the trout, "I dinna see that that was ony fau't o' the troots."

The Englishman departed, his purpose unaccomplished.

Queer Botany at the Hub.

There is a man in our town who is not wondrous wise, although he makes heroic efforts to keep up appearances. He has recently acquired wealth, and has lately added a well-stocked conservatory to his establishment. This he was not long since exhibiting to a party of visiting friends with pride.

"What is that?" asked a lady, pointing to a certain plant.

Mr. P. was nonplussed for a moment, but, quickly recovering, he answered with much gravity:

"That, madam, is an exceedingly rare specimen of the Encyclopædia Britannica." J. C.

A Girl Without Gumption.

A good story was heard in Hull the other day. A well-known resident, whose name, for obvious reasons, is not disclosed, had a daughter taking pianoforte lessons.

She did not progress very fast, so the father went to ask the tutor how it was.

"Well, you see, she doesn't appear to have sufficient gumption."

"Eh, what! Not sufficient gumption. Why didn't you let me know before. Buy her some immediately, and send the account in to me. The idea, letting my daughter go on practising all this time and no gumption. If this occurs again, young man, I'll get her a fresh tutor."

A Different Kind of Bull.

Lady Cyclist (to yokel on horseback): 'Have you seen my husband, my good man? He was wearing a straw hat and riding a bicycle."

"Lor', mum," replied the yokel, "I 'specks he's the gent I seed run into the black bull jest now."

"Oh, dear, dear! Poor John! Did—did it kill him?"

"Lor' bless ye, mum, I don't specks so; but the beer ain't very fust-rate neither."

And then she realised that the "Black Bull" was a public-house. H. E. L.

The Mummy Died.

Several weeks ago an honest countryman, anxious to explore the wonders of the British Museum, obtained a special holiday for that purpose.

Taking with him a couple of lady friends he presented himself at the door for admittance.

"No admission to-day, sir," said the keeper.

"But I must come in; I've a holiday on purpose."

"No matter. This is a close day, and the museum is shut."

"What!" said John, "ain't this public property?"

"Yes, but its like this," whisp-red the keeper. "One of the mummies died a few days ago, and we are going to bury him."

"Oh, in that case we won't intrude," said John.

So he returned M. E. L.

Missing.

I witnessed the following amusing incident at Southport the other day while on my holidays.

A raw countryman, having been just enrolled as a member of the "A" Division of the County Police, was stationed on night duty near the gasworks with instructions to take particular notice of everything on his beat, and, if he found anything to be missing, to report the same to his sergeant.

It appears that during the night one of the large gasometers had been emptied, and sank into its basin.

On the arrival of the sergeant, the new "Robert," who was found in a state of excitement, pointed to the empty framework of the gasometer and said:

"Well, I don't know whether it's all right, sir, but one of them 'ere things has gone." A. Y.

"Up Yer Gits!"

At a popular seaside resort the other afternoon a party of trippers had decided on a donkey ride, but one particularly stout old lady had some little difficulty in securing a mount.

When she essayed to 'clamber into the saddle the long-suffering brute turned his head round—apparently making a mental calculation as to the weight of the fair one—and then deliberately edged away.

"It's no go, missis!" grinned the lad in charge, "e's seen yer. We'll hev to try another moke!"

Approaching the row of donkeys, the urchin selected one, threw his coat over the animal's head, and thus led him forth.

"Quick, missis!" he said to the astounded lady. "Up yer gits! If 'e once gits 'is 'ead loose an' spots yer, yer'll get no ride! 'E wor asleep when I caught 'im, or 'e wouldn't 'ave come out!" A.N.O.N.

CHU-SE.

A Romance of Hong Kong.

CHU-SE, the laundress, and well-known to nearly every seafaring man, from skipper to deck hand, casting anchor in the harbour of Hong Kong, was a dainty specimen of the almond-eyed Celestial beauty. Piquantly small, daily did she toddle lightly on her little "golden lilies," to and fro between her abode on the frontiers of Tai-Ping-Shan and the Bund, where she found her sampan, with Oh-Yet, its presiding genius, ready to waft her on her round of visits to the ships in the bay.

Viewed from a Western standpoint, Chu-Se's history was strangely sensational. She was a lady with a past. This statement must not be taken in any way as invidious, for the little woman was so bright, so smilingly innocent, so lovable, indeed, that, although this same past of hers every now and again cast its shadow on her path, men adored her.

Men, mark you, not women. The Chinese beaux of her own quarter besieged persistently the little widow. Ay! Widow! That, at twenty-two, was her social position.

When but a mere child of a girl, and in obedience to parental command, she had wed the dashing Ah-Fong, with the result that the gentleman, for his piratical sins, suffered the "extreme penalty," in less than three months after his marriage day. Wooed again, and won by an enterprising ship's "comprador."

With a mate of such approved respectability and standing the lady might naturally look for a fairly peaceful marital experience. Alas! Sam-Ching was detected in fraudulent endeavours to over-reach the Revenue; this, together with the fact of the dead body of a native Custom House officer being found, head downwards, in the water-butt in Sam-Ching's back-yard, it is not surprising that that sharp-witted individual went under.

And so it was that Chu-Se, tired of her loneliness and all-undeterred by sad experience, ventured yet again upon the sea of matrimony. To sum up, six husbands did she, at short, very short, intervals take, cherish awhile, and anon incontinently bury.

As has been intimated, two out of the half-dozen met their end by an act of State; the remaining quartette—well, just faded out of life. Perhaps, who knows, Chu-Se was jealous. It is hard to say.

Anyway, they died, and the young and beautiful relict was left to pine for a venturous number seven.

It is at this particular point in the life-story of the fair Chu-Se that the extraordinary incident occurred which a certain officer of the Mercantile Marine will remember while terrestrial existence shall last.

* * * * *

The sun was vertically aggresive that day, reaching down, blazing hot, upon deck and sea.

The melted pitch in the plank seams bubbled and ran like to little black rivulets. Life was a burden, only to be made barely tolerable in the awning's shade, and with an ever-filled beaker of iced liquid at the elbow.

Jimmy Gatacre, second officer of the Island Queen, full of business watching the devious ways of John Chinaman as he boarded the vessel in shoals almost before she came to her moorings, at last gave up charge of the deck to the "third," going "below" to a well-earned rest.

Washed, pyjama'd, and comparatively comfortable, Jimmy's thoughts inclined to turning-in.

"Me so muchee glad, lily boy!"

Jimmy turned his head to behold a vision. A smiling mouth, and pair of sparkling black almond eyes, set in a little round face of the pearliest complexion. Small, very small, she held the door half-open, one baby foot upon the sill, and looked in upon the big Englishman with a winning confidence as disconcerting as it was bewitching.

He thought, sim le-hearted giant as he was, that it could be none other than a princess at the very least. The red umbrella she carried coquettishly over her shoulder, and which made a charming background to her head, formed a gorgeous medium for the sunlight which through it cast a roseate glow over her dainty little person.

"Beg pardon, I'm sure," said Jimmy, stammeringly. "Can't very well ask you in, you know. Hold on, though. Here, Jack! Carstairs!"

From the cabin on the other and port side of the steward's cuddy came an answering shout:

"Hulloa! What's up?"

"Half a minute, Jack, just come over here for half a minute. I'm in a bit of a hole."

Meanwhile the fair visitor, closing her umbrella, had quietly slipped inside the cabin, and deliberately perched herself upon the nearest chest-top.

"Who's your friend, Jimmy?"

"I don't know who she is, from Adam,—or Eve rather; but it's a bit awkward, you know."

"Me muchee glad, lily boys," she said again. "Me wash you one dolla, alle same ten piecy."

A laundress! Jimmy collapsed. His princess had taken wing with a vengeance, while Carstairs roared again till the tears ran down his weather-stained cheeks.

"Jimmy, you'll be the death of me yet. Why, I remember her now. Of course, this is your first cruise in Chinese waters, so you wouldn't know her."

"Ah! Me sabe!" chirrupped Chu-Se, nodding her head energetically, looking knowingly from one to the other, and still smiling. "Me sabe! Me m'lember you! You m'lember me! Me washee you long time! Alle same, velly good."

But though addressing herself to Carstairs, Chu-Se's eyes were fixed upon Jimmy Gatacre. He seemed to possess some sort of fascination for her.

Jimmy was uneasily conscious of this, and eagerly desired to get rid of his visitor.

"You don't want me any more, do you?" said Carstairs, chuckling audibly.

"Yes, I do; don't go away, man, for Heaven's sake! Can't you see?"

"No; I'll be hanged if I can. If you've got any washing for her, give it her, and she'll go away as happy as a princess."

"That's just what I thought her to be," ruefully replied Jimmy.

"Well, I always thought you to be a bit of a softy, my son; but to take a laundress for a princess, ha! ha! that's a little too, too, isn't it?"

Chu-Se now began to think it better for her to retire.

"Me come soon, alle same uller day. Chu-Se velly glad."

She tripped outside as she had tripped in, put up her umbrella, and with a smile and a nod was gone.

"Pidgin English," said Carstairs, sententiously, "isn't the best of linguistic mediums, is it? She's a rum sort—had six husbands, they say, and she's only now about twenty-two or three. You'd better look out, Jimmy, or she'll be falling in love with you, and then, the last state of Jimmy Gatacre will be worse than the first."

"Don't be an ass, Jack; and now get out, for I want to sleep. I'm as tired as a dog."

Nothing was seen of the little laundress on board the Island Queen for several days. One evening, the day's work done, Jimmy was in his room writing a letter. Then he thought he heard two timid raps upon the door.

"Who's there?" he growled—he hated being disturbed when writing letters. "Who is it? What the dickens do you want?"

Getting no reply to his polite inquiry, Jimmy rose and opened the door. What he saw staggered him for the moment. Huddled up in a bunch upon the deck outside his cabin door sat Chu-Se, her face supported by her two hands, and with her eyes wistfully fixed upon Jimmy as he stood in the open doorway.

"What's up, Chu-Se? Anything I can do for you?" asked Jimmy.

And then she told him how that she was sick of living a lonely widow's life, more sick still of the unwelcome attentions of the gilded bachelor youth of Tai-Ping-Shan and its vicinity.

She had "plenty dolla" she said, which she was only too wishful to bestow upon Jimmy himself if he would only marry her and become the virtual head of the most prosperous laundry business in all China.

Only that it was too serious a matter to take in a ridiculous sense, Jimmy would have laughed outright. Then, too, there was this earnest-eyed little Celestial regarding him with almost worshipping wistfulness.

For the life of him he could not be aught but sorry for her. Angry? Certainly not, her very evident sincerity and trustfulness forbade that.

Very gently he explained to her the impossibility of such an arrangement, in that in his own country he had a sweetheart who was watching and waiting for a life with him of love and happiness.

She seemed to acquiesce in this, and at last came to see that her castle in the air had fallen into ruins, and that for her this thing might not, could not be.

Jimmy accompanied her to the gangway, saying to her as she stood at the head of the ladder:

"Cheer up, Chu-Se, you'll get a husband by-and-bye, and then you'll forget all about this silly fancy."

"Chu-Se never forget—never—alle same die."

"Nonsense!" Good-night, you foolish little woman."

Her eyes took a sad look, which touched Jimmy to the quick, for he knew he was the cause. He would not have believed that any woman not of his own race could have loved like this. It upset all his preconceived and life-long ideas with regard to the other and the weaker sex.

And now she was descending the ladder, and Jimmy says that the look she gave him, as she paused midway a moment, lifting her face up to his, will haunt him to his dying day.

* * * * *

Jimmy is a grey-headed man now, with a stalwart son of his own; the log will soon tell of the voyage done. But often, in the quiet hours does the pleading face of Chu-Se rise before him, and he hears her again say that she will "never forget—never—alle same die."

Jimmy Gatacre himself never heard anything more of the little laundress, for it was his first and last visit to those seas. Yet her ultimate future is not altogether a mystery; whispers hint at another and, let us hope, a more fortunate and enduring union with one of her own race.

It is satisfactory to know this, and no heart-breaking dying-out-of-life was the fate of the much-married little woman.

* * * * *

The issues of life are great, but they oftentimes hang upon a thread. Beyond a doubt, there was just a chance, other conditions being favourable, that Chu-Se might have been Mrs. Jimmy Gatacre.

RALPH ENDERBY.

VISITOR: "Well, baroness, so you have returned from your Italian tour. Now, you must tell me all you did in Rome."

Baroness: "Rome! Wait a moment." (To her daughter): "Emma, my dear, wasn't it in Rome I bought that beautiful dress improver? Yes, I thought so."

"WHAT can you say of the second law of thought?"

Student: "It cannot both be and not be. For example, the door over there must be either shut or open; it cannot be both shut and open."

Tutor: "Give another illustration."

Student: "Well, take the case of another door."

"I THOUGHT you took instantaneous pictures," said the man in the photographer's gibbet; "but I verily believe I've sat here ten minutes."

"You shouldn't be impatient, sir," replied the camera fiend. "Instant, you know, means the present month, and the month is only half gone."

"YOU'VE got my seat, sir," said a man in a train who had left his seat for a moment.

"There is nothing to show that you have retained this seat."

"Look up there! There is my hat-box on the rack over this seat."

"Well, then, you sit up there on your hat-box if that's where you have retained your seat."

"I'VE lost a patient," said a doctor, sitting down to a boarding-house dinner table, with a frown on his face as dark as a gunpowder poultice.

"I am sorry to hear it. Man or woman?" asked one of the boarders.

"Man."

"When did he die?"

"Die? Hang him, he's not dead. He stopped taking my medicine, got well, and ran away without paying the bill."

MY EMPTY HOLSTER.

A Prairie Adventure.

"Buenos noches, amigo," cried the station-master of Frayle Muerto, bidding me "good-night," as I mounted my impatient horse, to set out for my lonely "rancho," some leagues distant over the wild prairie-land.

Frayle Muerto, or in English, the Dead Monk, was a small village at that time, and had just been honoured by the erection of a railway-station, containing a substantial refreshment bar; it being the midway stopping-place on the new line of railway, recently completed between the towns of Rosario and Cordova, situated in the Argentine Republic of South America.

My friend, Mr. Thompson, had been appointed station-master there, and feeling very lonely in his comparatively isolated condition—there was only one train daily—he was delighted to receive a visit from a fellow-countryman.

His neighbours, very few in number, were mostly natives of these parts. They are a rough, half-civilised lot, having more Indian than Spanish blood in their veins, and all the vices of both races in their hearts. In their manners and customs they are, to put it very mildly, unrefined, and the language they use is what might be called "vulgar Spanish."

The manager at the solitary railway-station did not, naturally, consider these natives to be very congenial or desirable companions. Mr. Thompson was loath to let me take my departure, although it was high time to do so, as we had sat in his little station-box chatting about old England till nearly midnight.

The moon was shining clear and full as I set off on my homeward journey; but my horse required neither light nor path, as it started at full gallop over the desolate prairie, knowing instinctively the shortest route to my estancia, or farm.

As we crossed over the long unbroken line of rails, gleaming in the moonlight as they stretched without curve or incline far away into the distance, we passed under the single line of telegraph, causing me to remember a good laugh Mr. Thompson and I had that evening over the remarks of two natives upon that scientific means of communication.

Neither of these two worthies had ever heard of such a thing as a telegraph, much less had they seen anything of the kind. The nearest approach to any such contrivance within their limited knowledge was a few wire fences some enterprising foreigners had put up round their fields.

Riding close to the railway, the couple of natives gazed in dignified amazement at the wire stretched high on the telegraph poles; then, shaking their wise heads, one of the philosophers addressed his companion, as they rode solemnly underneath the telegraph, saying:

"What incomprehensible idiots these railway-making English must be, to erect a wire fence only on one side of the railway, and at such a height that a man can ride under it on horseback!"

"Why," replied the other Soloman, "their ignorance is only equalled by their courtesy, as we cannot only ride under the fence, but it is raised to such an altitude that we need not even inconvenience ourselves by stooping while passing underneath!"

The natives of these parts, or "paisanos" as they call each other, are not only very ignorant, but they cannot conceive strangers, or rather foreigners, to be any wiser than themselves; and it was a countryman of the two wire-fence individuals who, having just been engaged by my friend the station-master at Frayle Muerto, inaugurated his intelligent services by attempting to stop a loaded truck, that was being slowly shunted on to a siding, by placing one of his feet before the advancing wheel, thereby causing him to retain possession for the future of only one foot, which, it need scarcely be stated, he never used for a similar purpose.

My horse was far too impatient to go round about the several colonies of "biscacho" holes we encountered on our short cut across camp, but bounded over them, taking many a leap that would have gratified the highest vaulting ambition of any horse-fancier. These biscachos are like our home rabbits, only they are a little larger and much more fierce. Their warrens are very similar, however. They are most destructive to vegetation and impudently tame. Hobbling off to the mouth of their holes on the approach of any one, they will turn round and stare him out of countenance, uttering a most tantalising mocking cry, which has such an incongruous sound, that any attempt to spell it on paper would be simply absurd. In fact, I only met with one man who could give anything like a correct imitation of their cry, and when doing so, his jaws were worked into such fearful shapes, that I used to wonder if they ever could assume their normal condition again.

These warrens are generally guarded by little owls, who, ever on the watch, give timely signal by their weird cry to the biscachos should any stranger appear. The owls, although very small, are not deficient in courage, as I found out once when passing one at its usual post of sentry.

Being amused at its supreme gravity, I tried in various ways to cause it to relax its seriousness a little, when to my astonishment, the bird flew after me, and made such vigorous attempts to get at my head, that I was obliged to beat it off with my riding-whip.

This was the only instance I ever met with, however, of an owl losing its centre of gravity, although occasionally I did not resist attempting to provoke their serene composure.

Part of my way home lay along a track used by caravans of bullock waggons on their journeys to and from Rosario: and it was while on this road that I met with an obstacle, or rather two obstacles, which nearly prevented my reaching home that night, or perhaps any other night, for that matter.

My horse, suddenly pricking up his ears, caused me to look ahead; and well in front I perceived two horsemen, proceeding in the same direction as I was, but at a much slower pace.

It did not take my horse long to get close up to them, and I then saw that they were "gauchos," or wild natives, having no home or calling, but moving about from one district to another, robbing what they could, alike careless of life and property, and having a special aversion to foreigners, or "gringos," as they called them, an expression meaning both insult and contempt.

That I was a gringo they would soon discover by my European costume; and that they would not only resent my being such, but make an attempt to deprive me of any valuables the said costume might contain, was pretty certain, even if they did not proceed to further extremities, which was not at all improbable, as they thought no more of murdering any one to obtain what they wanted than a good housewife would think of "squashing" a cockroach to insure a clean pantry. In fact, I have dined with gauchos who openly boasted of having killed from half-a-dozen to twelve men, and were accorded special respect from their less fortunate comrades, who, perhaps, could only boast of two or three little affairs of a like calibre.

I was not going to turn out of my way unless compelled to do so, for both myself and my horse were impatient to get home; so I rode on, and as I passed bade them good-night after the Spanish fashion. They, instead of saluting me, as all good natives would have done, spurred their horses after mine, and demanded to know where I was going. The only reply they got from me was a question (I am a Scotchman).

I asked them where they were going. "Por alla," was the response from one of them, which, meaning "over yonder," was somewhat vague. I now got a good view of the fellows, and they certainly were not beauties. They were, without doubt, very tall and well built; but the ill-looking and vicious expression of their countenances would have made the fortune of any villain in modern melodrama.

The sombreros, though broad-brimmed, did not hide the coarse matted hair that hung down over their temples; while the shaggy eyebrows, thick whiskers, and heavy beards did their best to conceal the ingrained dirt on their swarthy faces, which, I suppose were never washed unless, it might be, by some passing showers. The costumes they wore were in keeping with their appearance. Over the large Spanish hats were gaudily-coloured handkerchiefs, which, being tied under the chin in fanciful loop-knots, formed the triple purpose of sunshade, ribbons, and necktie.

Ponchos, or cloaks, hung loosely over their broad shoulders, and immense top-boots, reaching above the knee, impressed on the bright leather with strange, green-coloured devices, carried on the heels conspicuous spurs, with rowels of great size and cruel shape. Besides the well-known "lasso" each gaucho had the "bolas" ready to hand.

This latter weapon consists of three pieces of strong, untanned hide fastened together, each about a yard in length, and having attached to them large wooden or leaden balls, which prove very effective if used skilfully.

The natives, when chasing wild horses and cattle, use these bolas by swinging them round and round, then letting them go straight for the legs of the animal they are after. The balls, by their weight, twist the thongs round the legs of the galloping beast, causing it to come to the ground, generally head over heels.

These balls are also frequently used by the gauchos to trip up the horse of any rider they may wish to catch, sometimes throwing them at the horseman himself, whom, if they hit, they are sure to stun, and sometimes kill outright, should the heavy balls come in contact with any vulnerable part.

I saw both gauchos were getting their bolas ready for action; but still they appeared to be unwilling to proceed to extremes, perhaps hoping that I would quietly surrender, which, however, I had no intention of doing.

My horse, whether aware of any danger or not, was certainly becoming almost unmanageable, in its impatience at the restraint I was putting on the pace, as I was not willing the men should imagined I intended bolting from them.

The clear moonlight shone brightly on the polished steel handles of their large knives, which the gauchos had in short sheaths attached to the broad belts they wore round their waists.

In lieu of buttons, coins of various descriptions are utilised as fastenings for these belts; the coins being of all dates, and sometimes of considerable worth, their owners taking considerably greater interest in the relative value of the buttons than they have in any other portion of their apparel, unless it be their spurs and bridle-bits, of which articles they are inordinately fond.

The two gauchos were, by this time, riding only a few yards behind me and asking me several questions, the exact text of which I cannot now remember; but the purport was as to why I should go about at night alone and unarmed, and—as they would surmise—with articles of value about me.

No wiser were they by such replies as I chose to give them, and they soon ceased questioning me, commencing to speak in undertones together, apparently consulting as to what they should do.

My great object then was, while taking care to keep a few yards of distance between us, still not to let the gauchos think I suspected them of having any designs of attack upon me.

After proceeding for some time in this uncomfortable mode of progression, I came to the spot where my quickest way home was by a small sheep-track, which here led over the camp at right-angles to the road on which we were travelling.

Not sorry to leave my two companions, I now bade them farewell, remarking at the same time that this was my road; and giving the horse full rein, it galloped along the sheep-track. The gauchos, however, heedless of the good old adage that "two's company, but three's none," insisted upon keeping up the "triple alliance" by hurrying after me, shouting out that their road, fortunately (?), lay that way as well. I knew this statement was untrue, as the track led "nowhere," losing itself in the prairie not far from my estancia.

However, it would have been useless to get up an argument with them about the matter at that time and place, while it would be equally futile to try and convince them of the culpability of saying a thing which "was not." But I remember well crying out to them that I could travel alone nicely.

The two horsemen, however, came after me at full gallop; but it so happened that my horse was at "fuller gallop," if the term may be used; for the animal had taken the bit between his teeth, and consequently would suit the pace to his own mind, and he did so with a vengeance; the speed was terrific.

Although sorry to think of how the gauchos would conclude they had frightened me into running away, I did not put myself much about while in the open camp, being quite confident my horse's speed would equal, if not exceed, that of my pursuers; but what soon began to give me great uneasiness was the fact of our having to pass right through a wood, which now was not far off.

To be carried through a small forest on the back of a horse whose sole ambition, for the time being, was to exceed the speed of lightning, and not leave different parts of my body on various outstretching branches, seemed to be an utter impossibility. Of course the gauchos would then, besides my personal effects, have my body to share between them; "a leg to you and an arm to me, and so on;" but I never had the least ambition to undergo the process known as amputation, more especially in such a wholesale fashion.

All sorts of plans I tried to pull up my horse. Standing, for instance, in the stirrups, and getting one end of the bridle round me, I lay back as far as possible, thus making a lever of my body, and drawing the horse's head against my knee. This mode of procedure on my part made little difference in the mode of procedure on the horse's part, only causing it to deviate slightly from the straight course, while it gave the gauchos considerable gain on me.

There was no help for it; into the wood we must go. I made myself as small as I could, wondering how much less I should be when we got out on the other side. Although by this time I had made my horse make a considerable detour. I could not compel him to avoid the trees; and as my steed dived in amongst them, I took the strain off the bridle, giving him a fair chance of steering clear of the branches.

I think my horse had been rendered giddy by running so far with his head looking behind him, as his course was for a while very unsteady, thus making it much worse for his hapless rider, who never knew on which side of a tree he would be hurled past.

Yes, the position was very exciting, but intensely uncomfortable, and the marvellous twists I was obliged to give my body in trying to avoid hosts of protruding branches from different directions at the same moment, and still retain my mounted position, would have astonished any boneless acrobat. One instant a low-lying branch would cause me to flatten myself on the horse's back, and the next my body would be stretched at extreme right-angles from the saddle to avoid an immense limb of a tree on my left.

The speed was so great, and the turns so sharp and unexpected, that I knew it would only confuse my steed

BRONCHIAL ASTHMA (Two Years' Standing) CURED.

Before I underwent your treatment my health was far from being good—chills often, also the feeling between my shoulders of cold, which really no thick covering could give the desired warm feeling which I now possess. My chest got so weak that I had begun to stoop when walking. I have lost entirely that feeling, and I feel strong. When in bed I could not have my head but so high that it was no comfort to lie down, having a feeling of being suffocated. I can now lie right down into the pillows with perfect comfort. Life was hitherto a burden, now a pleasure. Can enjoy my food, do my work with ease; scarcely troubled with those cold perspirations which, being before my having your cure, were my daily company. No cold weather tries me now. Going up hill was a trial. My breathing would be quite loud during summer. I have with the children taken delight in running up hill. No furs now; health better than they. I feel indeed quite another creature. If anyone tried with Asthma won't try this real cure I am indeed sorry for them.

were I to attempt to guide it, and I let the bridle hang loose over its neck.

So on we flew in a manner jerky enough to have suggested to any observant navigator the impression that I and my horse were attempting to arrive at every point of the compass at one and the same time.

I soon got so giddy and confused that I found myself obliged eventually to crouch down in the sadddle, trusting to luck and branches obligingly growing high enough to allow of a free passage underneath. As we passed out of the wood at last into the open camp again, I commenced cautiously instituting a search as to how much of myself was wanting; and I was greatly relieved to find that, while several rather necessary parts of my garments had been left behind, my body was still intact.

Evidently a little depressed by the innumerable forms of the letter S he had made during his short but painfully circuitous route through the wood, my horse quieted down considerably; and allowing me to get the bit properly adjusted, set off at a respectable canter.

I could not see any signs of my late pursuers, and was greatly annoyed thereby, being naturally anxious to explain that it was my horse, and not myself, who had run away from from them. Surely, I thought, they would never be so mean as to have remained behind in the wood, disputing over such insignificant parts of clothing as had marked the course of my wild career? One piece of coat-tail and a few miscellaneous shreds from various portions of my wearing apparel would be comparatively useless to them. And then there was the time they were losing.

My conjectures were soon arrested by the sudden appearance of the two gauchos, who came riding round some outlying trees not a hundred yards off.

They had taken a straight run through the wood, while my horse had been serpentining about it, thus overtaking me easily. I could see the gauchos now meant mischief.

Although they did not evidently wish to come to close quarters, they had the bolas unstrapped. These weapons are more effective when thrown from a little distance, as they thus gain a good impetus.

I would have taken out my revolver now and fired, giving my two enemies a few chambers each if necessary; but, unfortunately, I had left that useful little instrument of warfare at home, and my only weapon of defence was a small penknife.

There was yet time to gallop off away over the wide camp-land. I had occasion once or twice before to put this same horse which I now rode to the test of speed and endurance, and the faithful animal had proved himself well worthy of my confidence. I was determined, however, that running away should be my last resource; so, facing the gauchos, I cried aloud in their own language to them to get out of my path and let me pass by. Their only reply was a demand that I would immediately dismount and let my horse loose.

They appeared to be so confident of my compliance with this modest request that they reined their steeds closer to me, thus showing they already surmised my want of firearms, of which, by the way, they have a great dread. I wonder now I felt so cool at the moment when the gauchos, enraged at my paying no heed to their orders, advanced nearer, swinging the bolas, which the next instant they might let fly at me.

It was hopeless attempting to escape now, their lassos and bolas would soon have put an end to my flight. While doing all I could to nerve myself against a strong despair that was crushing down upon me in this great emergency, I suddenly hit upon a likely means of rescue, which I at once put in execution.

Although I had forgotten to bring my revolver, its holster was, as usual, suspended to my waist-belt. Being well aware of the horror and fear gauchos have of any firearms, I now stood up in my stirrups, and raising my coat with one hand, placed the other to my empty holster, and cried to the advancing highwaymen:

"Another whirl of your bolas or another inch nearer, and I shall fire!"

The moon's rays fell clear upon my revolver's sheath; the gauchos stopped suddenly, looked at each other, and then without a word turned round and fled from me, lying over their horses' necks as they did so, doubtless expecting a few bullets to be sent after them.

My horse and I jogged quietly home; and as I was retiring to rest I could not help smiling when I looked at my revolver, snugly lying under my bed-pillow, where I had unthinkingly left it that morning.

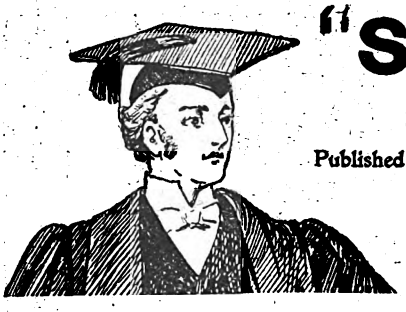
A BOOK WORTH MANY POUNDS!

Professor Boyd Laynard's Great Work:



"SECRETS of BEAUTY, HEALTH, and LONG LIFE."

Published by HAMMOND, HAMMOND, and CO., 19, 21, and 23 Ludgate Hill, London.

The publishers have much pleasure in announcing the issue of the popular edition of Professor BOYD LAYNARD'S great work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE."

This remarkable handbook to the three subjects embraced in the title has been a long period in preparation by the author—being, in fact, the labour of many years of diligent research and earnest investigation. The work is arranged in TWO BOOKS, FIFTEEN PARTS, and 127 CHAPTERS, the whole of which (in the popular edition now offered to the public) is bound in ONE VOLUME.

The book, although published at Two Shillings, will, if ordered direct from the publishers, be forwarded, carriage paid, to all readers of this paper at the low discount price of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE

This is to secure for it a place in every home, by bringing it within the reach of all.

Amongst the numerous subjects dealt with in Professor Boyd Laynard's Work, the following are but a few (a complete syllabus, showing the contents of the whole of the 127 chapters, enumerating upwards of 500 subjects and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the publishers) :—

Analysis of beauty—Beauty a possible attainment—The way we make our own faces—Secrets of face transformation—Changeableness of beauty and its causes—Metaphysical secrets of keeping young and preserving a youthful appearance—Wonders of the skin—Relation of the skin to beauty—Effects of mental emotions upon the skin—Bad complexions and their causes—Diet that spoils and diet that improves the complexion—General care of the complexion—Construction, growth, and wonders of the hair—Why hair falls out, and its remedy—Premature greyness: its causes and prevention—General care of the hair—Superficial hairs—Wrinkles, and how to treat them—Freckles, tan, and blackheads—Oily skin, dry skin, and loose skin—Undesirable noses and their transformation—Protruding ears and their treatment—Offensive breath—Anatomy of the teeth—Why teeth decay—General care of the teeth—Tallness, and how to attain it—Round shoulders, and how to cure them—How to acquire a full chest—Perfect form and figure: their proper proportions—Thinness, and its treatment—Excessive stoutness—Care of the hands—Care of the feet—Physiognomy; or, the art of reading character from the face—Mental influence upon health—Power of the mind over the body—Influence of the mind in curing diseases—How the mind can induce disease—How violent passions injure health—Laughter as a medicine—Wonders of digestion—Relative value to our bodies of the principal articles of food—Fruits and vegetables as medicine: their various influences upon the physical system—Health-preserving diet, and its consistency—Diet favourable to mental exertion and intellectual culture—Influence of various foods upon our passions and propensities—Some perilous articles of food—Light, and its influence upon health—Exercise and its relations to health—Baths and bathing: their influence upon health—The way we breathe, and how it affects our health—The marriage state, and its influence upon health—100 professions, trades and occupations: their respective influences upon health and long life—Sleep, and its relation to health—Conditions for healthy sleep—Insomnia—The eyes, and how to preserve them—The ears and hearing: how to prevent deafness—The voice: its cultivation and preservation—Memory, and how to improve it—Stammering, and how to cure it—Prevention of disease—Colds: their nature, prevention and treatment—Indigestion—Constipation—Neuralgia, Rheumatism—Nervousness—headaches—That rebellious organ, the liver—Blushing: its physiology and treatment—Rules of life for attaining longevity—Things that shorten life—Things that prolong life—How to live to a hundred—Premature old age and its causes—Short biographies of 80 modern centenarians, whose ages range from 115 to 185 years—Attainment of long life under physical disabilities.

WHAT THE PAPERS ARE SAYING.

The Christian Globe (August 9th) says: "Professor Laynard writes well on a subject he has evidently studied deeply. As a guide to good looks, health, and longevity this book differs entirely from ordinary works on the same subjects. It is more thorough and at the same time more practical. It is safe to say that anyone who ordered his or her life on the rules laid down in this book would certainly profit both physically and materially."

The London Journal (August 4th) says: "Throughout the whole 127 chapters it is practical and sensible. It contains an immense amount of valuable advice, and, moreover, it is written in such a bright style that it is as interesting as a novel. Apart from the general usefulness of the work as a complete handbook to beauty, health, and longevity, it possesses an additional value to those requiring reliable advice upon specific subjects. For example, the chapters treating upon the skin, the complexion, the hair, the teeth, the eyesight, the voice, deafness, sleeplessness, nervousness, memory, stammering, diet, indigestion, and other important matters too numerous to mention, are each worth a physician's fee to particular readers, as they are based upon the pathologies of the highest medical and scientific authorities."

ORDER FORM.

To be cut out.

TO HAMMOND, HAMMOND & CO., 19, 21, and 23 LUDGATE HILL, LONDON.

Please forward me Professor Boyd Laynard's complete work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE" (carriage paid), for which I enclose the sum of One Shilling and Sixpence.

The Editor of THE LANCET, June 16, 1900, says:—

"We are glad to find that Messrs. Cadbury draw attention to the fact that there are strong grounds for objection to the addition to cocoa of certain foreign substances. No. 612. ONE PENNY

For the Week Ending Sept. 22nd, 1900.

A MODERN GALATEA.

My condition, at last, became alarming, and I was afraid of myself. The cause of it—ah, that was something. Had it been a matter which an honourable man might discuss with a friend, I could have had the healing consolation of sympathy; but at the very core of my affliction lay the obligation of silence. Let us suppose a case.

Once there was a very beautiful woman, married happily, and a mother. Her husband had a friend—a man of the world. This man discovered in his friend's wife an accumulation of all womanly graces; he saw in her the ideal woman in all the world, the only one he could have loved and courted, fought for and died for.

Yet she was wholly inaccessible, even in dreams. She was as good as she was beautiful, as true as she was winsome. Even had she not been so his hands were tied by loyalty to his friend. Some of you will laugh at that. Well, if a man's honour fails him in one direction, I will not trust it in another; for a man is a whole remainder after subtracting all his evil from all his good. But "the flesh is weak." That is the villain's only plea for mercy.

The friend could not conceal it from the wife. Could not? I must be careful in my choice of words. Is there anything in the line of right that a man cannot do in such a case? The world is wide—he could have gone away—but she was so beautiful and winsome. Nor, as he had not declared himself, could she presume to send him away?

He thought he saw in her eyes something of pity, something of warning, something of everything. The suffering wore him out.

But I must return to the beginning and resume my story.

I was much prostrated in mind and flesh, and the services of a skilful physician were imminently needed.

With that idea I went to see a famous man, Dr. Brownell, a specialist in matters of the nerves.

It may be thought a little peculiar that I went to consult this particular man; but it must be considered that besides being a very skilful physician, he was my friend. There might have been certain reasons why I should not consult him, but we need not discuss them now. His wife was a beautiful woman, and I knew her well; but what in the world has this to do with my visit to her husband?

"Why, I am glad to see you," he said, taking my hand.

Brownell was a peculiar man. Though he was the best friend I ever had, there was not a very close intimacy between us, and yet I was nearer to him than was any other of his friends. He was much older than his wife.

A kind heart, given force and direction by great wealth, had been exercised by him on my behalf with so intelligent a purpose that I was become a man of a little importance in the community.

The physician lived in a fine old house of great size. Not all of it was occupied. He was a tireless collector of curiosities, and had expended a fortune in that pursuit. Few of these were ever shown to his friends, and he never spoke of them, but kept them in out-of-the-way places in the great establishment.

He was a reticent man, and many feared him; but I saw in him nothing but goodness, and a marvellous skill. So it was upon Doctor Brownell that I called formally as a patient.

His consulting rooms were on the first floor, and consisted of two rooms—a handsomely-fitted reception-room, and back of it one in which his patients were generally treated. Both were very large.

Al hough I had called and visited very often at his house, I had never been in these rooms before.

When I entered he was just ready to go out, but he welcomed me with his old-time cordiality.

"Why, I am glad to see you," he said, taking my hand. "Come in and rest awhile. You surely haven't come to see me professionally?"

He looked closely at me as he asked the question.

"Yes," I replied; "I fear I am in rather a bad way."

His face showed much concern.

"You do look a little shaken," said he, removing one of his gloves.

Then he began in a deliberate fashion to make a scientific inquiry into my case.

While he was occupied thus, a messenger, all out of breath, arrived to call him to a case of great urgency.

Dr. Brownell, seeing the need to hurry, asked me if I could come as well on the following day. Of course I released him.

He hurried away, saying:

"I am very sorry to leave you, but it can't be helped. Step into the house and see Mrs. Brownell. I am sure she will be glad to see you. Go through that door—it is the nearest way. You will find the hall a little dark; but go straight ahead and you will be all right."

Then he hurried away, and in a moment was gone.

I went to the door which I understood him to have pointed out. I discovered that there were two doors close together. I selected the left-hand one. I turned the knob, and pulled the door open. The hall beyond appeared to be quite dark, but I remembered what he had said about that, and I felt safe.

I stepped into the hall; and instantly the door, which was a heavy affair made of oak, closed upon me, pushing me out of its way into the hall.

Then I discovered that I was in absolute darkness, although there was a bright day without. Nevertheless, recalling Brownell's instruction, I went ahead with much confidence.

Suddenly, to my infinite amazement, the ground seemed to open, and I plunged headlong downward into a suffocating darkness, at every instant striking cruelly upon hidden obstacles along the way.

At last, after having taken what seemed to be a great flight, I came heavily to a stone floor, where the darkness was as dense as ever before I fell. Fright was my first sensation, and indignation my next; for was it not likely that Brownell had played some ugly trick upon me; I sat perfectly still for a little while, doing much wondering.

There was nowhere the smallest glimmer of light; the darkness was ponderable and terrifying. With it was a silence so vast that the ordinary roaring in my ears became an obtrusive presence.

A little reason at last found exercise in my disordered faculties. I reflected that the abyss into which I had fallen was an unguarded flight of stairs, into which I had walked in the darkness. A cautious hand-survey verified the belief, for there I lay at the bottom of the stairs.

A moment later I remembered that I had seen two doors, one beside the other. It was very clear that I had made a mistake by choosing a door leading to the cellar.

It then was no serious matter at all, and I laughed at myself for my terror. All that was necessary was to ascend the flight, open the door, and emerge by the other.

Without any waste of time I went about putting this plan into use; but when I had clambered up the stairs and found the door, I discovered that I was securely locked within this dismal place! There was no nob on the inside at all. My first intention was to get relief by knocking on the door, but there quickly arose two reasons why I should not—no one was within; and besides, even if I should summon attention, how could I explain my ridiculous plight?

My clothing had been torn by my fall, and I knew by the token of a warm, sticky sensation about my face and neck that I had been hurt and was bleeding freely, I was satisfied there must be some way of escape from the cellar without alarming the household, and, though my prison was darker than night, I determined to exhaust this resource before trying the other.

Accordingly, I descended the stairs, and, by keeping my hand on one of the walls, began to creep forward, with the careful guard upon the possibility of another flight of stairs. Presently, I found a turn in the passage and followed it on. Then I came to a transverse passage, and was in doubt which way to turn.

Meanwhile the darkness did not relax in the smallest degree, and absolute silence surrounded me. I turned to the right; and in that direction, not far away, I saw an exceedingly thin line of light, which I surmised issued from the bottom of a door.

I went towards this, and was about to put my hand upon the door, when it occurred to me that caution sometimes was a valuable exercise. Thereupon I knelt and examined the line of light more closely; and it was somewhat disheartening to discover that the light, instead of being white, was yellow. In other words, it was gaslight, and not daylight, that shone beyond the door.

While thus I knelt, I thought I heard a certain scurrying within. It was a sound not very unlike that which I had heard in the dark passage, and which I had mistaken for automatic aberrations of my hearing sense. Now, the same sound gave me a certain depressing feeling of insecurity, as though a malign mystery, suited to this uncanny place, was preparing a grotesque, and, perhaps, dangerous reception for me. Should I abandon this enterprise and seek another door? There was danger that I might not find this one again. Indeed, was there anything to fear? Surely my conscience—

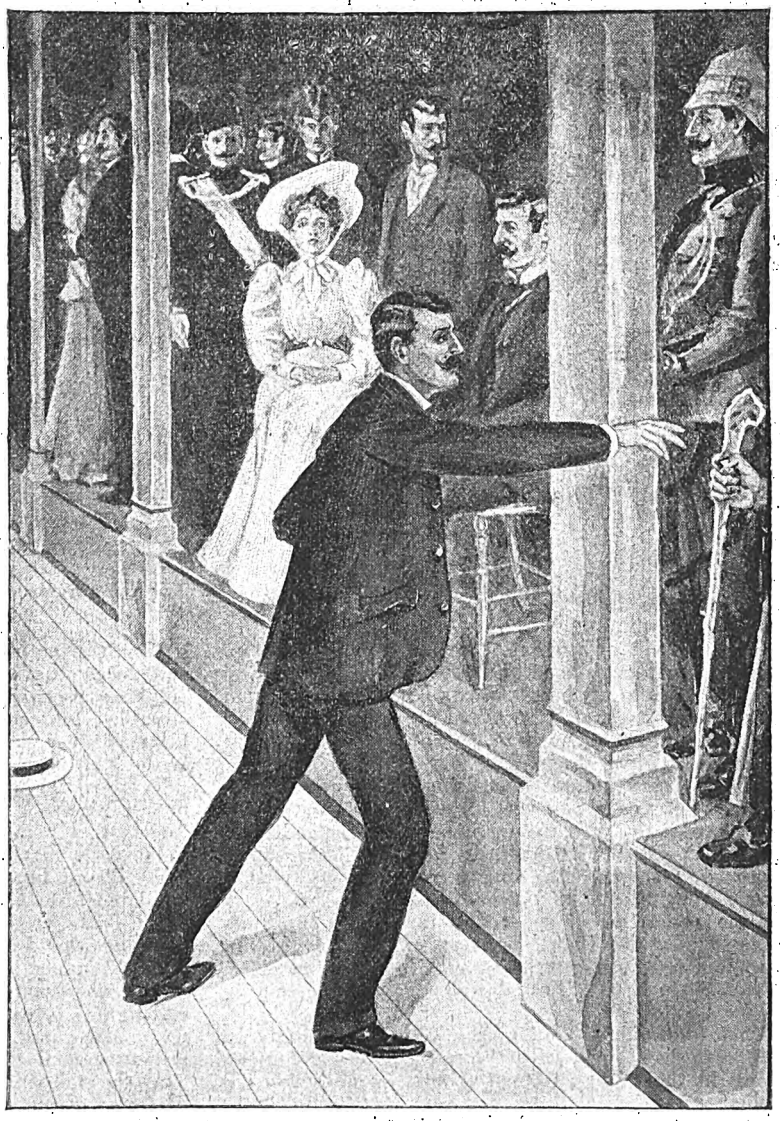
I gently pushed upon the door. It did not open. I found a keyhole and peered through it. A curious, large hall seemed to be beyond, lighted faintly, and I thought I saw the shadowy form of a woman float across the field of vision.

Just above the keyhole I found a knob. I turned it, and instantly the door flew open, pulling me violently with it; and before the instinctive movement to seize upon a support and hold it securely permitted me to take my grasp from the knob, I found myself wholly at the mercy of unresisted gravitation, flying undoubtedly downward, if reason is to be accepted, but in all other directions as well, if my feelings had been the ground of judgment.

But this time, instead of falling upon a cold, stone floor, I alighted on a deliciously soft carpet, of the thickest and finest rugs; and, for that matter, the distance which I had fallen was in reality quite small.

Upon looking about I found myself in the strangest place it was ever my fortune to see; but before I describe it I must say something in explanation of my unaccountable flight through the air.

The floor of this hall was sunk a few feet below the level of the passage by which I had approached, and down from the door led a flight of stone steps, which the pulling of the door had made me clear as I fell. I had thought that someone was concealed behind the door.



I seized the stick and tried to wrench it from his grasp.

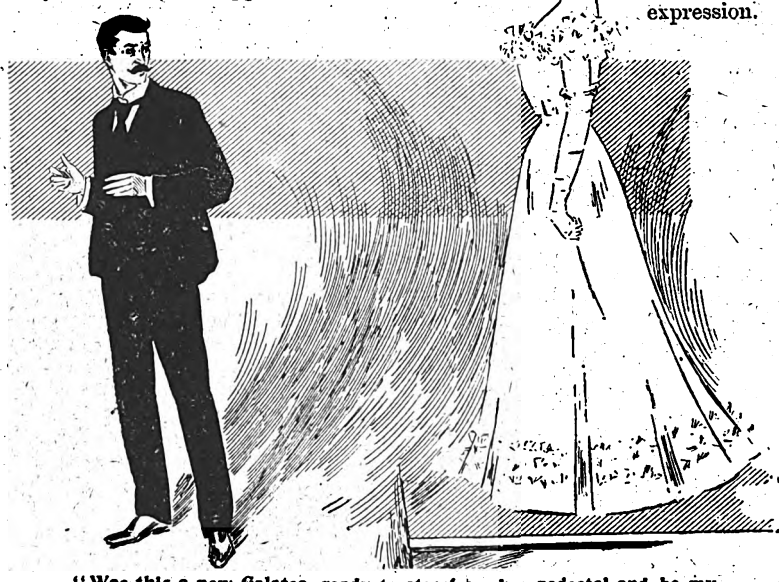
and pulled it open quickly when I turned the knob; but, upon looking, I saw no one, and I must believe that, for some reason which I shall not attempt to explore, the conduct of the door was guided by a powerful spring.

There was no time for any intelligent kind of thinking, for, besides being in a large hall of extraordinary appearance, I found myself in company with the most astonishing people. The walls were covered with curious things from every corner of the world.

The roof was perforated with openings, representing stars, animals, angels, demons and other things. These openings were covered with coloured glass of every shade, and above all was the light which shone through the grotesque openings and filled the room with a soft yellow radiance.

The light was too faint for a fine definition of features and so I could not then have said that I knew any of the persons present. They were all on the opposite side of the room, and everyone of them was looking at me. Some were sitting, others standing, and all were upon an elevated platform which ran round the room. The platform was raised not more than eight inches above the floor.

I scrambled to my feet and looked round upon them, of course expecting that I should be spoken to. But not a word was said and not a movement was made. The whole circumstance was so extraordinary, and the silence and immobility of the assembled people so impressive, that a strange tingling feeling, which all who have been frightened know the nature of, crept up my face and into my hair, and my heart beat with what seemed to be so strong a torsional force that it twisted a sharp pain out of its function.



"Was this a new Galatea, ready to step from her pedestal and be my devoted slave?"

I made an essay of speech.

"This," I said (indignation arising with the emergency of courage), "may be a very amusing pastime for you, but I have it that you are putting a very gross indignity upon me. If Dr. Brownell is in this distinguished company, I should like him to hear me say that I resent being made the victim of this boyish prank for for the edification of spectators invited to enjoy my discomfiture, and that I propose, without any loss of time, to give to my resentment such form and character as will cause it to have a disagreeable permanency in his recollection."

This wide-winged and rather silly threat might as well have been spoken to the red dragons and green angels in the ceiling, for not a word or movement did it elicit.

I found it easy to speak, but my voice sounded as though it had come from someone else to me alone, and made me uncertain that I had spoken at all. But a quickening anger was straining its leash within me, and I made no effort to control it.

A sense or outrage, shame and indignation swept over me; there were things I would not bear.

At this moment, Brownell's individuality emerged from the dim shadows of the company, and I walked straight up to him. He looked at me steadily as I approached, the old, good-natured, half-quizzical expression that I knew so well sitting upon his face.

I had approached him very near, when an indefinable violent sensation seized upon me and held me from further advance. Likely it was as much dread as terror; but whatever it was, there I stood grown to the floor, staring in dismay at this silent and motionless man with the quizzical expression.

Quite near me was an old man sitting on a chair, his hand resting on a heavy stick. I seized the stick and tried to wrench it from his grasp, intending to brain Brownell with it; but think what must have been my horror to see the old man's arm come away from his body with the stick, the hand still retaining its hold! I threw the stick away with a shudder and went up closer to Brownell. I caught him by the shoulders, and shook him with such violence that his head rolled on the floor at my feet.

Then the truth burst through the envelope of my vast and inconceivable stupidity—not all stupidity, for another affliction beset me—these were all wax-figures! I had stumbled into one of those queer nooks in Brownell's house where some of his treasures were stored, and where, in these uncanny ways, he enjoyed himself alone.

The reaction from this discovery was peculiar. At first I laughed; but my laughter became so loud and furious that I saw it was hysteria, and then I had trouble to check it. My head was splitting, and my throat was cracked and burning. Pains of various kinds found employment in torturing me, and they were pains to which I was in nowise accustomed. Therefore, it was necessary that I make haste to escape from this almost unearthly place.

The silence and apparent intelligent immobility of the wax-figures were more than depressing. I began to fear, indeed, that, after all, they would take on life and present some new form of suffering for my torture.

At the end of the hall was a wide door draped with a portière. From where I stood I could see the white satin of a woman's skirt just behind the portière on one side. Evidently no light entered that room, except the weak, diffused light of the demons and angels in the room where I was standing and hence it was much darker beyond the portières; but after looking around, I saw that if there were any escape, except by the way I had come, it must be through the room in which stood the woman in satin. Yet I feared to enter that room.

The dim light, the woman behind the portière—it all looked mysterious and dread-lurking. It was evident that the woman stood, as did the others, on a platform; but was that sufficient upon which to construct a belief that she, too, was wax? And would it not be all the better if she were flesh and blood? Assuredly, for that meant deliverance.

I went, without further thinking, to the portière, and passed within the room, having an unaccountable care that I did not pass too near the woman in satin.

I went into the room and looked around for a door. None could I find. My gaze fell upon the woman whose skirt I had seen, and then came upon me the very heaviest blow of all in that day of miseries; for there before me, beautiful and radiant, embodiment of all the finest graces of womankind, unspeakably winsome, and in all possible ways the loveliest woman under the sun, stood the physician's wife. If only it had been she, indeed, instead of an artful wax counterfeit!

I stood and admired her to my heart's content, and then I looked another way and continued my search for the door.

In what ever way I turned, I felt that the soft blue eyes of this enchanting figure were upon me. This gave me a certain fear, the meaning of which, beyond a consciousness of extreme nervous irritation, I was not able to understand. My disorder began to take on an exhilaration much like that which comes from hasheesh, imparting a quickening power to my senses and a keen edge to my imagination.

A feeling of happy confidence and lively enthusiasm struck off the angles of the fear which formerly had depressed me, and I became bold, valiant and adventurous. What an inspiring effect even the wax-image of a beautiful woman may have on a man!

I again looked at the figure in satin. Could I have been in error? Was it possible that a wax figure could be caught stealing a quick glance at me and suppressing a delicious smile? Was this a new Galatea, ready to step from her pedestal and be my devoted slave?

A great hope, so wild that I dared not give it too generous entertainment, leapt up from my heart. Fool or madman—which was I? Though the whole world might be consumed with love of her, she would remain steadfast in the way of a wife for ever. It was wholly impossible that she should choose this astounding way of letting me know that the one secret of my life had slipped away from me and had been welcomed into her own life.

I gazed upon her, filled with awe. Her head slowly turned, her glorious eyes rested full upon my face, and the sweetest smile that I had ever seen on her beautiful face saturated all my sensibilities with inconceivable delights. There was a meaning in that look and smile that I had never seen before, and the light that shone through it was a welcome to me!

I went closer to her, my feet winged with joy. The smile beckoned, the glance was a reassurance.

"Alice!" I cried.

"I have waited for you long," she answered; and there can be no music on earth so sweet as those words.

I caught her in my arms and drew her to my breast, nearly crushing her. I looked up into her face and she looked down into mine. I drew her from the pedestal.

All at once a look of horror came into her face.

"You are covered with blood!" she cried.

"It is nothing," I protested.

The look of horror became one of terror.

"Oh," she said, "there is blood on your face and villainy in your heart! So this is how you would betray your best friend and wreck my life. I will save him and you."

With that I saw something bright and keen glitter a moment in her hand, and in an instant a thing cold and sharp slipped between the ribs of my breast. I choked; a blindness assailed me, and I felt myself going all at large to the floor.

* * * * *

Dr. Brownell was sitting beside me in a room of his house, and I was lying in bed with a feeling of great weakness. He saw that I was watching him. He arose and stood over me, and his face showed much relief.

"You are all right now, aren't you, old fellow?"

How kind his voice was!

"Yes."

I felt no pain in my breast, but feebly I put up my hand.

"Is the wound dangerous?" I asked.

"What wound?"

I made no reply.

"The only wound you had was a slight abrasion of the scalp, and that has been cured a week."

I dared not ask any more questions.

"Alice came in to see you this morning and left these flowers for you. I told her I thought you would be all right to-day, and she will come to see you as soon as I send her word. By the way, old man, that was a curious mistake you made in getting among my wax-figures. We found you unconscious there. In your delirium you must have developed a strong dislike for the figures of Alice and me, as you completely demolished them."

MY RUN FOR LIFE.

A SOUTH AMERICAN ADVENTURE.

I WAS young and careless at the time, but my "run for life" sobered me—at least, for a few days. Youth is generally endowed with a superabundance of animal spirits, together with a natural buoyancy; agencies which soon overcome the temporary effects of any serious occurence that may intrude itself into the normal condition of life in its "teens."

I had just been newly imported from Scotland into the South American town of Rosario on the banks of the Rio Parana, a bright little port increasing in importance every year, and a central shipping depôt for wool, grain, and hides brought from the many villages dotted over the surrounding prairies.

From Rosario I had a long journey before me, having to make my way, as best I could, to a hamlet rejoicing in the euphonious title of Frayle Muerto, or, in English, "The Dead Monk," and situated in the province of Cordova, which adjoins that of Santa Fé, whose capital is Rosario.

Looking about me for some mode of conveyance into the interior, I was fortunate enough to fall in with a Mr. Wilson, an Englishman, who had been for a long time in the country, and was starting next day with a "tropa," or troupe of mule-waggons for Cordova, the route to which place passed within a few miles of my destination.

I gladly arranged to accompany him; and the following morning saw me seated in a covered cart drawn by mules, make my entry first on to the great flat pampas that, relieved by occasional patches of forest, stretch for hundreds of miles away to the foot of the mighty Cordilleras.

A first view of the prairies of South America can never be forgotten; it is more impressive than the feeling when in mid-ocean. Naught is seen but the great expanse of heaving billows lapping the horizon on every side.

The tall prairie-grass bending before the breeze resembles the motion of the restless sea. The verdure is varied and beautiful, dotted here and there with immense ant-hills, from and to which industrious armies of ants march, some laden with leaves and broad blades of grass, which, presenting a surface sufficient for the wind to catch, considerably increase the burden of the staggering insect, sometimes toppling it entirely over, and reminding one of our advertising sandwich-men at home.

We had made an early start, so when mid-day came our little caravan was glad of a rest. The mules were unyoked from their light waggons and allowed to stray round about, picking up what best suited their tastes from the great variety of grasses by the wayside.

A fire was soon kindled, and the great native roast called asado got ready. The asado is simply a cut of beef, through which an iron rod is run, this rod being stuck in the ground and slanted over the fire in a manner that allows the beef to be quickly cooked.

No meal is complete without the native tea, and both the tea itself and the manner of taking it are very different from the cup-and-saucer European custom. A small gourd about the size of an ordinary teacup is used, a hole being cut at one end, into which are put two or three spoonfuls of a herb called yerba—a plant indigenous to some parts of the country. The remaining space in this gourd is then filled up with hot water and occasionally a little sugar; and this maté or tea is enjoyed with the agency of a tube, through which it is sucked, American cocktail fashion, by the happy possessor for the time being, who, when he has drawn through the last drop of this South American nectar, hands the maté-cup to the servant, who, filling it up again with water, and, if necessary, adding a little more yerba and sugar, passes it on to guest number two; and so on, each one having several turns at the suction business, until all are satisfied. This mode of tea-drinking naturally enough takes a long time, and we were quite ready for a siesta, which lasted until the great heat of the noonday sun had decreased in power.

Then all was hurry getting the mules caught and yoked; and this work required no little skill and patience, for mules are as stubborn in one country as in another, and not only have a will of their own, but take a great many opportunities of giving ocular demonstration that such is the case, in a manner highly suggestive of there being a right and a wrong way of going about anything, but especially a wrong way. However, we eventually moved on, and did not again halt till sunset.

Next morning we were off again by daybreak, and for the first time I saw the "mirage," which at early morn frequently forms itself on the prairie horizon and is a most impressive spectacle. The imagination which has often pictured to itself castles in the air has them now full in sight, and to all appearance real and tangible; and villages and farms, which are many leagues too far off to be seen by the ordinary light of day, stand forth, on a seeming foundation of shimmering air, clear and with every prominent object distinctly defined. Late in the afternoon of that day we arrived at a dilapidated-looking hut, at which point, being the nearest to Frayle Muerto, I was to part company with my companion and his mule caravan.

While Mr. Wilson was arranging with the owner of the hut to supply me with a horse and a mounted guide, so that I might get over to my destination that same evening, I had time to look about me, and was greatly impressed with the forlorn-looking condition of my surroundings.

The rancho, or native hut, was a wretched structure, with mud walls and a clumsily thatched roof, and consisted of two rooms, one of the apartments evidently being used as a kitchen and bedroom, while the other appeared to be of a nondescript character, There was no attempt at cultivation, the prairie-grass growing up to the very walls of the house, excepting in the front, where constant use had stamped out the grass and left the bare earth, on parts of which was a small yard of posts or corral, in which were confined some horses.

Lounging about the gate of this yard were some half-dozen natives, or rather gauchos, as, judging from their appearance, they were more like partly-civilised Indians.

The costume of each consisted of a red shirt, a pair of white drawers, partly covered by a species of petticoat called a chiripa, and the native cloak or poncho; a broad belt was worn round the waist, and a gaudily-coloured handkerchief tied over the head took the place of the Spanish sombrero.

The garments, such as they were, had stood many a rough storm, but seemed incapable of standing many more, the material being of the poorest and thinnest, while the original colours had long since faded away. These men were mostly barefooted, and their coarse, matted hair and swarthy faces told of few interviews with the toilet-table.

Before parting with Mr. Wilson, I took occasion to refund him some expenses he had incurred for me during our journey together, and when paying him I thoughtlessly exposed my purse, which was well-lined with bright gold sovereigns. and I noticed that the eyes of some of the nat ves had been attracted towards us while we were settling accounts.

Whether Mr. Wilson saw this or not I cannot say, but he did not leave the place until, after a hearty farewell between us, he saw me mounted and along with my guide fairly started for Frayle Muerto.

Although I had a little experience of riding in Scotland; this was my first "mount" in America, and nei her the horse nor myself got on well together. The native recado is very different from our home saddle, and sometimes, as in the present case, has only one little wooden stirrup, just large enough to admit of your big toe resting in while you mount.

This want of stirrups and my pulling the bridle English fashion, instead of, as is the native mode, merely allowing the reins to gently touch the neck of the horse on the contrary side towards which he is to turn, had the effect of making both of us very uncomfortable. There was nothing but open prairie to be seen, excepting to the westward, where I could see a long line of trees, and in their direction we were going.

I had just taken my last look at Mr. Wilson's caravan, as, wending its way into a cañada or slight depression in the prairie. it disappeared from my sight, when I was startled by loud shouts, and on looking back I saw some of the gauchos, whom I had left at the native hut, now mouuted and galloping towards me.

On arriving at close quarters. they did all they could to frighten my horse by swinging their lassoes over their heads and cantering round me in a gradually lessening circle, my guide basely deserting me and joining in the attack, This novel proceeding had the effect of making my horse plunge violently, and as I only knew very few words of the native language, I could hardly convince them by persuasive argument to desist.

In my attempts to keep my seat in the saddle, I foolishly tried to place my foot and my confidence in the wretched stirrup which suddenly giving way over I went, falling with my head downwards. The shock stunned me for a short time, but I still held firm to the bridle, and so detained the horse from escaping.

In a few minutes I managed to remount, and had no sooner done so, when, closing in on all sides, the gauchos actually "hounded" my horse back to the hut which I had so recently left. The fall had stupefied me to such an extent that I did not properly realise my position until after the natives had pulled me off the horse's back and examined if I had any firearms on my person.

I was the happy owner of a fine new revolver, but unfortunately it was useless to me then, being, along with the most of my baggage, safely stored in Rosario. Satisfying themselves that I was unarmed, the gauchos pushed me into the room which I had previously noticed as answering to no particular description, and, shutting the door, left me "alone in my glory."

After collecting my bewildered faculties as well as I could, I naturally began to think over the matter; but not deriving any satisfaction from its consideration, I took from my pocket a small edition of a book entitled "Easy Conversations in Spanish and English," which I had carried carefully with me since my arrival in the country, and diligently hunted up a few words which I thought applicable to my present situation. The most apropos "conversation" I could find, however, was one supposed to be on entering an hotel, which was hardly encouraging in the present state of affairs.

I had observed that the patron, or owner of the hut, with whom Mr. Wilson had settled preliminaries, had taken no active part in my imprisonment; so going to the door, which, having no lock, was easily opened, I shouted, in my easily commanding tone:

"Patron, Patron!"

Presently Mr. Patron came, and I, book in hand for ready reference, commenced a violent protest against his unlooked-for hospitality, and I wound up by insisting to be sent on with a guide immediately. As my oration was mostly English, and the remainder very questionable Spanish, it had the effect of irritating Mr. Patron sufficiently to cause him to shrug his shoulders significantly, and then hurry off, slamming the door behind him.

This proceeding disconcerted me most effectually; and when I began to think of the cunning way in which the gauchos had waited until Mr. Wilson and his caravan were out of sight and hearing before coming after me, my want of firearms, and their knowledge of my possessing gold, also my being an unknown stranger in these parts, and their own restless and irresponsible lives having no particular homes or livelihood, I felt then that my first adventure in this new country might also be my last. I recalled stories I had read and heard of these wild gauchos, their admiration of those of their number who had committed the most murders, their lawlessness and general indifference to bloodshed; and as I caused my blood to run cold with such recollections, I began to feel how helpless I was, and blamed myself severely for not having taken the precautions adopted in these parts of going about well armed.

Looking out of the door, I observed the gauchos, who were standing a few yards off, talking earnestly to each other and constantly glancing towards me.

The sun had now set, and it was quickly growing dark, the twilight being of very short duration in this country. Taking out my case of cigarrettes, I lit one, and began to walk quietly up and down in front of the hut, puffing away as unconcernedly as I possibly could; but each turn I took was a little longer than its predecessor, and the length was always increased towards the side on which lay the wood we had previously started for.

While pretending to be thinking of nothing in particular, but simply enjoying my evening smoke unconscious of danger, I lit my second cigarette, continuing my one-sided promenade, until my "tether" was being stretched to such an extent that I saw the gauchos were beginning to suspect me; so taking an extra long turn, and watching my opportunity, I simply turned tail and fled. Running as fast as I possibly could straight for the distant forest, towards which we had originally set out. I never felt in such a hurry in all my life as I did on that occasion. I knew I had a good start, but, then, the fleet horses of the gauchos! As I anticipated, in the hurry and confusion which my unlooked-for retreat produced, it was a little time before I saw myself pursued, and every moment was precious to me then.

During my schooldays racing had always been my favourite sport, and I made good use of my practice now, especially when, on glancing over my shoulder, I saw some of the gauchos hurrying after me on horseback.

While straining every effort to increase my speed, I could not help constantly giving hasty looks behind; and I noticed that the gauchos were urging on their steeds with whip and spur while lying well forward, their ponchos flying behind with the wind, caused by their swift motion through the air.

I had by this time got very near to the wood, else I could not have seen it, as all daylight had already faded away. I knew that once amongst the trees I could elude my pursuers where the scrub grew thickest, as they would not be able to follow me quickly on horseback; and if they dismounted I was fully equal to them, as, notwithstanding my long run, I still felt in good fettle. Another spurt and I might gain the welcome shelter of the trees in time.

I could now hear the snorting of the horses as they tore after me, as well as the excited cries of their wild masters.

Another few yards and they would have run me down, when, with one great bound, I leapt over an old pile of dead branches, and dashed into a part of the wood where the undergrowth was heavy and the trees grew closely together.

I was now obliged to slacken my pace and thread my way with care through the luxuriant vegetation, trying to keep on in the same direction I had at first taken. I could not now hear the shouts of the baffled gauchos, who had evidently given up the chase, or else were following me silently on foot; but this I thought very unlikely, as they rarely walk far, living, as they do, almost entirely on horseback.

With an easier mind, but trembling excessively, owing to the inevitable reaction which sets in after any great excitement, I now sauntered leisurely along, and was soon surprised and delighted to see some large fires in the wood, round which I trusted to find some rancheros or farmers camping out for the night. I was advancing with a light heart, when, on a nearer inspection, I saw by the glare of the fires large groups seated in circles, seemingly enjoying a feast.

Two or three dogs, having scented a stranger, began to bark furiously, causing some of their masters to rise from their recumbent positions and gaze in my direction. I knew they could not see me, as I stood in a dark recess of the wood; but observing now that the number of men was very great, I suddenly remembered that large bands of Indians made frequent incursions to these parts, stealing cattle and often carrying off the wives and children belonging to the native farmers.

Knowing that the Indians had a deep-rooted hatred to foreigners, rarely allowing them to escape with their lives when captured, I even in my extremity thought of the old adage, "Out of the frying-pan into the fire," and almost wished myself back in the old rancho again.

Fortunately, however, I had evidently not been discovered; so off I set again, although fearing that perhaps while hurrying from the Indians I might rush into the clutches of the gauchos.

After some time, hearing no signs of pursuit, I slackened my pace, feeling unwilling to go very far, not knowing what I might next encounter.

I had not eaten anything all day, and I began to feel very hungry; I felt chilled as well, for it was midwinter, and, although the sun is strong during the day, the nights are often bitterly cold. Being my first experience of a South American forest, and not knowing what class of ravenous beasts inhabited such parts, I felt a sort of unconquerable dread creeping over me when any animal gave vent to its midnight howl, as I could not tell from what kind of brute the cry might emanate.

I laugh when I think of it now, but, in good truth, the situation was decidedly unpleasant, especially to a mere boy, and in a country till then principally known to me through the agency of the school atlas.

Tired out at last with excitment and fatigue, I felt a drowsiness stealing over me too strong to be overcome, and, frightened to trust myself on the ground with all sorts of unknown animals prowling about in search of supper, I scrambled up a tall tree, and, settling myself away high up on two stout forked branches, fell asleep before I had time to properly close my eyes.

I did not slumber long, the cold was too intense, and I woke up frozen so stiff that it was some time before I could move a limb. I saw the danger of being "up a tree" on such a night; so, painfully descending, I eventually got back some heat by hurrying onwards—where I could not tell.

Eventually I found myself on the banks of a river, and, as it seemed shallow, I determined to ford it. As I waded across the cold stream, the stars appeared to twinkle more brightly, and, as I landed, I felt that I was on the right side this time.

Climbing up the bank, I found myself on a road which quickly led me to some houses, in one of which I saw a light gleaming. I soon was at the door, which I found open, and entering I saw some natives indulging in a game of billiards, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour.

The place was a billiard saloon, and the proprietor coming forward, I showed him a card on which was written the address of the resident in Frayle Muerto, whom I wished to meet. He informed me, to my delight, that I was not only now safe in the village of the Dead Monk, but close to my friend's house.

Before leaving the saloon, however, I explained how hungry I was, and the kind saloon-keeper placed before me all he had in his store, from which I made one of the heartiest meals I ever enjoyed, though it consisted of—raisins and brandy!

Jephtha's Daughter.

"WHAT'S up, Jack?" said one policeman to another at the corner of Upper Brook Street, W., on a melting hot afternoon in August.

"Dunno! it's at 45, whatever it is. D'you know who lives there, Charlie?"

"Oh! it's that Yankee spiritual woman, medium they call her; guess its some sort of a meeting she's got on, guinea a time, you know—about our week's wages."

The street was filled with carriages driving up and setting down at No. 45. Fashionable ladies and a few idle men-about-town were the majority of the "outside" visitors, among whom might have been seen a certain Lord Ruthven, who was attracted more by the personal beauty and charm of the mistress of the house than by any belief in or respect for the spiritualistic propaganda.

Inside were assembled clairvoyants, mediums, palmists, telepathists, crystal-gazers, and the flower of the spiritualistic world generally, including Little Strangeways, the middle-aged spinster genius of Spook Rooms, W., and Rapper, the renowned recipient of weekly spirit correspondence, from the celebrated "Rosy." But the star of the occasion was Claudia S. Sennet, of Boston, Mass., U.S.A.

She had burst upon London during the season with the suddenness and brilliancy of a comet.

She was a woman of the typical New England sort, but with the addition of a stately, almost aristocratic manner, which made her wonderfully attractive.

Tall, with dark hair and eyes, and a mouth which seemed to possess a dual character, now expressing sweet womanliness and gentleness of soul, now compressed with a determined snap which boded ill for those in opposition to her. When driving in the "Row" she was the lovely cynosure of all eyes.

Whenever her smart little brougham slowed up by the railings, Lord Ruthven was never very far off, and might almost be counted upon to approach and enter into animated conversation with her.

Legends with regard to her antecedents were rife, but none of them could be relied upon.

She brought Society a new sensation, and with Society's usual disregard of such matters, it ignored rumour for reasons best known to itself. Her house in Upper Brook Street was magnificently furnished, and her means apparently abundant.

The crowd was enormous.

Spiritualistic séances, when the medium is beautiful and the surroundings in harmony, are always popular among the "smart" set.

Lord Ruthven seeks the mistress of the house everywhere. At last he discovers her seated behind a wealth of palms in the small conservatory at the head of the staircase.

"Do you know why I have sought you out, Claudia?"

"How can I tell?" she answers him, a little nervously for her.

"Surely you, who can read the thoughts and souls of men, can read my heart. I want your answer to-day. I want to go away from here, knowing that nothing will ever part you from me, that, as my wife, you will be safe and happy for evermore."

"But you know nothing of me, my disposition, my temper," looking up at him with her glorious eyes that seemed to gather in them that beautiful humidity which so touches the hearts of good men and true. "My blood is not of that 'blue' tint which passes current in your social sphere. I am nothing but a daughter of the Republic, a descendant of the old honest Puritan stock."

"I care not what you are! who you are!" replied her lover, "I love you, and to marry you is the dearest wish of my heart. Claudia, say that you love me."

"I do love you, but wait—wait till this séance is over, then if you still are of the same mind come to me again."

"The séance will—can make no difference to my love. Why wait until then—give me your answer now!"

"Do not press me," she somewhat sadly said, while a shiver appeared to pass over her frame.

With a sudden passionate movement she plucked a white rose from the bosom of her dress, and offered it to him.

"Take it," she said almost mournfully, "and if at the afternoon's end you are prepared to take me, place the rose in your coat; if your mind should change, well throw it away. I shall know."

She rose from her seat, and just saying "The time has arrived," she moved slowly down the stairs towards the dining-room, where her advent was eagerly looked for. She turns her head for a second only at the door, and then he sees her no more.

On her arrival a movement is made by the initiated. Claudia leads the way up the stairs, and the whole assemblage troop after her. At the door of the drawing-room she pauses a moment, and then enters the room which has been artificially darkened.

Everyone suits themselves with regard to seats, and then an expectant silence settles down upon all.

The proceedings commenced with the usual legerdemainic illusions. Bells tinkled, banjos responded to invisible fingers; the audience felt touches from presumably spirit hands, and the handwriting of deceased relatives and friends was seen on the wall.

Little Strangeways said, audibly, that someone had kissed her. Rapper, quite as audibly, said it was not possible, even in the spirit world. When the raps and inquiries of the lesser lights were ended Claudia spoke.

Her clear, musical voice thrilled through the room.

"Is the spirit of Jephtha S. Sennett present?"

Dead silence followed the question.

There was a sound as of a man awakened from a deep sleep.

"I am here," came in sepulchral tones, but with a pronounced American accent.

"In what relation do you stand to me?" said Claudia passionlessly.

"I am your father," was the reply.

"Give me your opinion from the spirit world of these present proceedings," continued Claudia.

The spirit of Jephtha heaved a deep sigh.

"They are a fraud from beginning to end," said the spirit. "For years you and I have been living upon the credulity of the public. This place with all its mechanical paraphernalia has been specially prepared for hoodwinking paying visitors. Fools patronise us, fools are befooled by us, and our sole aim has been to pander to their folly."

As if his last words were a signal, the lights flashed up, and the room became flooded with light.

It revealed, first the spell-bound audience, then the deadly-pale face of Claudia. It showed also the towering form of a grey-haired man, who stood grasping with both hands the edge of a large table. He had the appearance of one awakening from a cataleptic trance. Suddenly he seemed to divine the situation. He glared savagely at his daughter.

"You she-devil!" he cried hoarsely. "You have mesmerised me! You have caused me to betray our secret; you have sold us both!"

She did not answer. She looked searchingly towards where Lord Ruthven stood by the door.

The rose was not in his coat!

Claudia continued to gaze in his direction with an almost despairing look in her eyes, as if she half hoped that he would uplift the sign. But he did not even look at her.

With a quick, impulsive gesture he left the room, his voice immediately afterwards being heard at the house door calling for a hansom.

"Oh, Heavens!" she moaned piteously, "he might have saved me!—but he has deserted me—and I loved him!"

The next day the legend "To Let" might have been read on a board outside the house, No. 45 Upper Brook Street.

During the winter Society, enjoying its dolce far niente on the Riviera, occasionally heard of a certain Jephtha S. Sennett, who kept a select and luxurious private gambling-house in the neighbourhood of Nice.

His beautiful decoy was a woman of peculiar magnetic power, known to the habitués as Claudia.

RALPH ENDERBY.

"Have You Got That Ten-Pound Note?"

SIX TEN-POUND NOTES CLAIMED.

BELOW we give short accounts of the six men who, up to the present, have been lucky enough to secure the Pearson's Weekly £10 notes.

Mr. John Lotan, 22 St. Anne's Chambers, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.—winner of £10 No. 33—is a lavatory attendant at Ludgate Hill Station. One morning, while he was reading a copy of Pearson's Weekly, a gentleman walked in, and whi e washing was asked by Mr. Lotan: "Have you got that £10 note?" and to his astonishment a sealed envelope, No. 33, was produced and handed to him.

Inspector Charles Lee, 1 Agnes Terrace, St. Mary's Avenue, Southend—winner of £10 No. 27—is Cliffs-Inspector and Superintendent of Gardens to the Southend Corporation. One night he was walking near the Admiralty Flagstaff, when, after asking several men the well-known question, he happened to meet with the right one, the natural consequence being that he received the envelope containing the equivalent to £10.

Mr. Harry Edward Baker, 4 Beaconsfield Road, Magdalen Road, Norwich—winner of £10 No. 1—is an elementary school teacher at Norwich. Having seen in a local paper that a Ten-Pound man was expected at Norwich, he kept on the look-out for the mysterious stranger. One afternoon he was in the Market place, and noticed there a middle-aged man whom he thought was a likely sort of person to be intrusted with the precious missive. He followed the stranger up, and at first opportunity entered into conversation with him, later on showing him the front page of Pearson's Weekly, and asking if he had the £10, whereupon a Sealed Envelope was put into his hand.

Mr. Robert Gautier, 132 Clarence Road, Wimbledon—winner of £10 No. 36—is in the employ of a photographic material dealer in the West-end of London. He was calling on the manager of a large firm one day, and the matter of the £10 Scheme happened to be brought up. During the conversation Mr. Gautier (who has been a regular reader of Pearson's Weekly for some years) took a copy of the paper from his pocket, and, showing the front page to the man to whom he was talking, said, "Have you got that £10 note?" and, to his surprise, the gentleman produced one of the Sealed Envelopes.

Mr. W. W. Tonkin, 5 Grove Road, Brixton—winner of £10 No. 30—was at a friend's house spending the evening, when the conversation turned on Pearson's Weekly £10 Scheme. Mr. Tonkin, who was very enthusiastic over the scheme and made the most of his opportunities, showed the front page of Pearson's Weekly to each person present, and was astonished when, after he had nearly gone the round of the company assembled, he found himself the possessor of one of the coveted envelopes.

Mr. Charles Wright, 30 Oxford Gardens, North Kensington—winner of £10 No. 12—was in the smoking-room of the Crown Hotel, Southampton, and jokingly asked a stranger for the £10 as mentioned in Pearson's Weekly, which he handed the stranger to read of the scheme. His astonishment was great when the £10 letter was handed to him. The landlord was close on Mr. Wright's track, and only missed the coveted envelope by a short lead. Mr. Wright is a member of the choir at the Chapel Royal, Savoy.

There are now forty other Ten-Pounders walking about the country, and all you have to do is to show the right person a copy of the current number of Pearson's Weekly and the £10 is yours.

Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXIV.—He Sets Out to Do a Little Reforming.

WHEN Mr. Bowser got up the other morning, there was an uncertain look in his eyes—that is, Mrs. Bowser was not certain whether he was going up street to blow up the butcher or down street to blow up the tailor. He was moody and silent during breakfast, and as he made no move to leave the house after the meal Mrs. Bowser kindly inquired if he wasn't feeling well.

"I'm feeling well enough," he replied, "but I shall remain at home this morning. There are several little things I want to look into and put right, and one of them is at the door now."

"Do you mean that costermonger?"

"That's exactly what I do mean. I am going to find out whether a man with an old donkey and a wobbly cart has any legal right to stop in front of my house and shout and yell and shriek and howl and bawl and roar like that. Just listen to him! By the living jingo, but it's no wonder that we've had five deaths in this street within the last two weeks!"

"But you—you won't go and say anything to him!"

"Won't I!" exclaimed Mr. Bowser as he clapped on his hat and opened the door and bustled down the steps, while the family cat and Mrs. Bowser looked after him.

"Plums! Cucumbers! Bananas!" yelled the man at the top of his voice and with a wave of his hand and a nod of his head toward every house in the terrace.

"Look here, you howling idiot," began Mr. Bowser as he walked up to him, "I want to know who gave you the legal right to murder folks with your voice?"

"D'ye mean my shoutin'?" asked the man in considerable astonishment.

"Of course I do! I want to know if the law gives you the right to whoop and yell and bellow and shriek and groan in order to call attention to the pig's food in your cart. If it does, I'll see that it's changed. If it doesn't, I want you to go."

"I say, old man," replied the costermonger with a leer, "you must have fallen out of bed this mornin'. I've been sellin' wegetables for five years, and you are the first person I've met who wasn't charmed with my woice. Better tie a wet towel round your head and go to bed ag'in!"

"Don't give me any impudence!" shouted Mr. Bowser. "You may be licensed to cart vegetables and fruits round, but are you licensed to set a thousand people's nerves on edge by your beastly howling?"

"I'm licensed to do anything I want to, old kicker," replied the man, "and if you want to make a fuss about it come on. You look one of the sort who'd take the bread out of a poor man's mouth, but if you try it on me I'll make you sorry!"

A crowd of children and pedestrians began to gather, and, realising that he would have the worst of it, Mr. Bowser walked into the house. The costermonger yelled "Cucumbers!" after him, and the children applauded, and Mrs. Bowser said:

"Don't you see you can't do anything with such men as that? They come along here from daylight to dark, and everyone yells just like this man."

"But it's against the law, and I know it is!" shouted Mr. Bowser as he struck the wall with his fist.

"I want to know who gave you the legal right to murder folks with your voice?"

Digitized by Google

"Well, there's lots of things against the law, but you can't change 'em. If the police permit these costermongers to yell and scream, they won't stop their noise for anything you say."

"Then I'll break some one's neck!"

Mr. Bowser went out and sat down on the front steps. The costermonger grinned at him and moved on, but it was scarcely a minute before an old clothes man turned the corner and set up his yell.

He had yelled about sixteen times before he reached the Bowsers' gate, and there he stopped and looked at the man on the steps and screamed out in agonized tones:

"Old clo'! Old clo'! Any old clo' to sell!"

"Move on, you scoundrel!" shouted Mr. Bowser as he rose up.

"Old clo'! Old clo'! I buy old clo' for cash!"

"By the beard of Plato, but I'll have your life if you don't move on!" exclaimed Bowser as he clattered down the steps, with a tragedy in either eye.

The old clothes man ran across the street, but no farther, and from his new position he shrieked and shouted and yelled until he had collected a crowd of half a hundred people and Mr. Bowser had been forced into the house.

"You can see you can't do anything," said Mrs. Bowser.

"But I will do something!" he hotly replied. "Are all the ordinances of this city made for the benefit of such howling demons as that? Has a tax-payer and and property owner no rights? If there are no laws to protect me, then I'll protect myself!"

Out he went again, and he was just in time to encounter a man, who had turned in from a side street, yelling:

He was seized and banged against the fence.

"Knives to grind-o! Knives to grind-o! Bring out your knives to grind-o!"

Mr. Bowser walked down to the gate. He looked like a dangerous man, but the knife-grinder was willing to take chances if he could make a few coppers. He halted his grinder on wheels and uttered his yell of "Grind-o!" as if Mr. Bowser were forty yards away.

He was still hanging on the "o" when he was seized and banged against the fence, and a voice rang in his ears:

"You infernal nuisance, shut up, or I'll break your neck!"

The grinder shut up. He looked into Mr. Bowser's eyes and became afraid. However, as he was released after a minute and told to move on his courage returned and he hadn't got more than ten feet away before he turned and said:

"You knock me and bang me, and I take the law on you!"

Mrs. Bowser opened the door and tried to argue the matter with Mr. Bowser, but he declared he'd wet his hands in the lifeblood of the next nuisance who came along.

He didn't have over ten minutes to wait. A hokey-pokey vendor, an umbrella mender, and a tinker suddenly appeared in company, and all were yelling to drown the notes of the band at the corner.

Mr. Bowser rose up like a bull about to make his last charge, and he was at the gate as they halted.

"Umbrellas t' mend! Mend your pans! Hokey-pokey!" shouted the three at him as they waved their arms about.

Mrs. Bowser threw up the window to call out, but she was too late. Mr. Bowser had started. He upset hokey-pokey cart and hokey-pokey dealer, he filled the air with old umbrellas and tinker tools, and it was Spion Kop over again, with Mr. Bowser in place of the Boers.

He met the enemy, and they were his, and in five minutes they were in possession of the field of battle. He was cheered by the crowd which gathered, and a dozen over-enthusiastic taxpayers insisted on a speech. A man had arisen who had taken up the cudgel for reform, and they wanted to know his policy towards fireworks, footballs, and spinning tops.

Mr. Bowser backed up against the gate and might have given them an outline, but before he could collect his oratory a fat policeman burst through the crowd and seized him and said:

"You old ruffian! But you want to get up a riot and disturb half the town, do you? Come along with me!"

Mr. Bowser was walked to the police-court and left in the cell till the magistrate was ready to hear his case and say:

"You may be a citizen and a taxpayer and a reformist, but you have no right to break loose and take the law into your own hands. I fine you five pounds, sir, and if you are brought here before me again on the same charge I shall feel it my duty to put you where you can do no more harm for the next six months!"

"Didn't I tell you how it would end?" asked Mrs Bowser when he got home.

But he said no word in reply. He realised that if he even opened his mouth he would drop dead.

A Written Proposal.

Mrs. Bland had been looking for a letter from her daughter, but now that it had come she was not pleased at its contents.

Amy had accepted the invitation of a former schoolmate to spend the summer holidays at her home in Sussex, and she had been there nearly five weeks.

Mrs. Bland had urged her daughter to accept the invit tion, as it would give Amy a splendid chance of picking up strength for the winter at comparatively little cost; and as they were none too well off, and the girl could not have afforded more than a fortnight's stay in the country on her own account, the offer was not to be lightly refused.

Amy had protested that her happiness would be incomplete as her mother was not with her; they usually spent the vacations together, and found great happiness in these between-term rests even although they went no farther from their home than the nearest parks.

But Mrs. Bland had over-ruled the objection. Amy was a teacher in a private school and was studying hard that she might be able to take up a lucrative appointment; she needed a complete change and must not neglect this oppportunity of obtaining it.

The Blands had never been well off, but things had gone happily and smoothly until Mr. Bland died. He left his widow a small income, barely enough to keep her and her daughter, and Amy had determined to make use of the beginnings of a good education in order to earn a little and continue her studies. The post of teacher enabled her to do this.

There had always been the fullest confidence between mother and daughter. Mrs. Bland, now forty-one, retained much of her freshness and general youthfulness; she believed in being a rea companion to her daughter, able to take part in her amusements and pleasures, and even assist her to some extent in her studies.

The letter from her daughter, which she now held in her hand, was disquieting inasmuch as it told the mother that for the first time she was not entirely in the confidence of her daughter.

"I suppose it must be so," sighed Mrs. Bland. "Amy is twenty, and I must expect her to be falling in love, and naturally she will not tell me all about it. A mother must always be prepared to have someone else occupy the most promment place in her daughter's heart. Still, it is not entirely that which worries me."

She read the letter again and the serious look on her countenance became more intense.

"It may seem foolish—selfish, perhaps—of me, but I feel that I want to watch over her choice. I do not wish to see her suffer from the heartache, as I did. Girls sometimes bestow their affections on one who is unworthy; and sometimes they fall in love with a man who is only playing with them. Girls are not the only ones who flirt and jilt. True, my experience did not come under either of those heads; it was a foolish lover's quarrel. I was fortunate indeed in my second venture."

Mrs Bland's thoughts had drifted from her daughter to herself. She pulled herself up and glanced at the letter again.

"She hints at a love affair, but she is evidently distressed in a way which cannot be attributed to the state of being in love. There is something else which I cannot fathom, and that makes me fear for her peace of mind. Oh, dear, I wish I had not allowed her to go, after all! If I could only go to her and watch for myself!"

As Mrs. Bland laid the letter on the table her eyes fell on some words written on the top corner of the first page, close to the address, which she had not noticed; they were to the effect that the hostess had at that moment told Amy that that she intended to invite Mrs. Bland to spend the last fortnight of the holiday with them.

Then Mrs. Bland remembered that another letter had arrrived at the same time; it proved to be the invitation mentioned by Amy.

"This is indeed a providential piece of good fortune!" was the thankful exclamation of Mrs. Bland. "Now I may be able to save my dear girl from a possible heartache, or prevent it from becoming too serious."

On that same morning a conversation was taking place between Amy and her friend Blanche Winford in the old Manor House, which was the home of the latter.

"It is exceedingly kind and thoughtful of Mrs. Winford and you to extend an invitation to my mother," said Amy gratefully. "I admit now that it was the one drawback to the full enjoyment to my stay here that mamma was alone at home."

"My dear Amy," said Blanche in her airy manner, "I shall be very pleased to see your mother here, if only to prevent you from monopolising the attentions of the gentlemen."

"Oh, Blanche!" protested Amy, her cheeks flushing and a worried look appearing in her eyes.

Blanche laughed merrily.

"Well," she said with an attempt at seriousness, "it is a fact that Mr. Barton and Mr. Sutherst are both showing you marked attention, and there is only another gentleman in our small party. I confidently anticipate that you will have two prop sals before the end of your stay, if your mother's presence does not alter the condition of things."

Amy flushed a deeper red, and then, to her friend's amazement, covered her face with her hands and began to cry. Blanche's arms were round her friend in an instant, and the light-hearted girl was urging the other to dry her tears and confide her troubles to a sympathetic friend.

"I am in great trouble, Blanche," explained Amy. "I believe—I think—that Mr. Barton is in love—that is, I mean——"

"I know," returned the matter-of-fact Blanche. "The plain truth is that he is in love with you and you are in love with him. Oh, well,"—Amy made a feeble protest against the last statement—"you could soon fall in love with him; let us leave it at that. And the same remark applies to Mr. Sutherst, although he is in the neighbourhood of forty. And you don't know what to do?"

Amy opened her lips to reply, but said nothing.

"Now, my dear, I tell you plainly that Mr. Barton is a young man with very poor prospects, and if you marry him you will have a struggle all through life, about as hard as you have at present. I am talking sense, and you will credit me with no desire to hurt your feelings. I may be worldly, but common sense and so called worldliness generally go together. Now, if you marry Sutherst, you will have as good and kind and noble a man as you could wish to have for a husband, you will have money and be able to give your mother an easier time, and you will make the man and yourself happy, for I am convinced that Mr. Sutherst is one of the few men who love with all their heart and only love once. What does the difference in age matter?"

Amy had no time to reply, for Mrs. Winford entered; and while Blanche was talking with her mother, she ran upstairs to bathe her eyes.

Blanche's words had struck home. When Amy, a girl of fifteen, was sitting by the bed-side of her dying father, he had called his "little girl" and had asked her to do her best when she grew up for the dear mother whom they both loved so well; and Amy, with enthusiasm born of love and grief had promised. And now it devolved upon her to act in accordance with that promise; she had never forseen such a contingency, and she was sorely perplexed.

If she followed the dictates of her own heart, she would throw in her lot with the younger man; he was a manly young fellow, and she believed that they could together carve out a fortune for themselves. She did not share her friend's worldly views. On the other hand, she fully indorsed all that Blanche had said about Sutherst; she felt that she might learn to love a man such as he. And her mother's future would be assured.

The difference in the manner of the two men towards her was marked. Barton was more of the lover, while Sutherst always spoke to her and treated her in a way that was almost fatherly. The manner of the younger man was more calculated to attract the girl, yet she was bound to admit that she felt herself drawn towards the older. She longed for her mother to come, vaguely hoping that her presence would assist her in cutting the knot.

But by the time, two days later, that Mrs. Bland arrived, the girl had made up her mind to accept Sutherst if he should, as Blanche hinted, make a proposal. The sight of her mother tended to strengthen her determination; her promise to her father, and the lowly circumstances in which they lived, occurred to her mind with greater force and settled the problem that had worried her two days before.

Amy introduced her mother to young Barton, but she found that Mr. Sutherst and Mrs. Bland had met in the drawing-room and had "introduced themselves."

"Dear mamma," murmured Amy to hers lf, "I have never had a secret from her, and I will tell her about Mr. Sutherst—but I will not mention Mr. Barton, or my perplexity. After all, I am sure that I can love Mr. Sutherst!"

It was an illogical assertion to say that she had never had a secret from her mother, and in the same breath, to declare that she would not tell about Mr. Barton, and her short monologue ended with a sigh.

But the confession did not come till the evening of the following day, and then Amy made it in the privacy of her mother's bed-room before she retired. When she had concluded, the contrast between the faces of the two women was very striking; that of the daughter was red hot, whereas that of the mother was deathly pale and cold.

"My dear child," said the mother gravely, after a pause, "are you sure that you are not making a mistake? It may be that Mr. Sutherst is merely showing the interest of an older man in a young woman. He has probably heard something of your history and admires you for your determination to make the most of your ability; and—though perhaps I ought not to say it—you are a young woman who would command the respect and admiration of Mr. Sutherst's age and character."

Human nature is a strange thing; although Amy felt that there might be a great deal of truth in her mother's remark, and although that remark coincided with her own wishes, yet she rebelled against the assertion and defended her opinion as stoutly as if she hoped and believed with all her soul that it was the right one.

"No, mamma, dear!" she replied in a very decided tone. "I am convinced that Mr. Sutherst is in love with me. If he makes a proposal I shall accept him."

"And if not?" asked her mother, making a great effort to conceal the trouble that was agitating her.

Amy did not know how to reply; there was a conflict of emotions now raging in her heart, a conflict called into existence by these words. Sutherst or Barton?

Her very soul seemed to be rent by the opposite feelings; she turned pale and then red, and finally buried her face in her mother's lap as she had done many times before in the old days. Her mother, not understanding the cause of her silence, looked down upon the brown hair with quivering lips and eyes suspiciously moist.

"I do not wish to make you unhappy, Amy," she said tenderly, stroking the head that lay in her lap, "but I wish to spare you a heartache. Do not allow yourself to be mistaken; do not be carried away by girlish emotions. I have watched Mr. Sutherst and—and I do not share your opinion."

Amy did not reply. If Mr. Sutherst was not in love with her, all her visions of being able to release her mother from poverty would vanish. By a strange perversity of nature, her feelings seemed to undergo a change, her whole being cried out for the love of Mr. Sutherst and she could scarcely endure the thought that she had been mistaken.

No more was said that evening. Both lay awake until early morning; the mother could imagine the feelings of the daughter, but the daughter could not by any chance have divined the thoughts that were passing through the brain of the mother—and Amy would have been intensely surprised had she been able to do so.

On the following morning Mrs. Bland took occasion to remind her daughter of the warning given over night; it was a brief, motherly sentence, for Mrs. Bland showed no desire to talk again on the subject at any length. After that the matter dropped.

Mr. Sutherst's attentions did not relax with the appearance of Mrs. Bland at the Manor House; he showed the same interest in Amy, and the only difference was that he included Mrs. Bland in any proposition for an excursion or a walk.

Amy regarded this as a distinctly honourable course of action and, contrary to what might have been expected, was glad that her mother was with them. She will now see exactly how matters stand, was the thought that crossed the girl's mind.

Amy rather dreaded Blanche's teasing, but that light-hearted young lady remained mute on the all-important subject. Amy caught her friend looking at the trio with a peculiar glance on more than one occasion, but she did not mind the look so long as Blanche's tongue did not come into action.

Ten days passed away very pleasantly; scarcely one of them went by without Mr. Sutherst accompanying Mrs. Bland and her daughter for an hour or two, and on three of those days young Barton was also invited to become one of the little group.

All the other guests had departed; both gentlemen had eagerly accepted an invitation to extend their stay. That invitation proved that Mrs. Winford saw more than many people do.

Blanche did not seem to mind being left out of the party; when asked to go with them, she made an excuse that she had to help her mother, and now and then she carried off young Barton so that the other three might be alone—rather to that young gentleman's disgust, it must be admitted.

It was the day before that on which the four guests were to depart, and no proposal had come from Mr. Sutherst. Amy's good spirits began to flag. She asked herself whether she really cared, and a something within her replied very boldly, "No!" But she crowded down that feeling and tried to believe that she did care very much.

"Here is a letter for you from Mr. Sutherst, Amy," said Blanche, entering her friend's room that evening. "I congratulate you, my dear! I'm sure it is a proposal. The poor man did not care to speak, I suppose, so he begged me to deliver this personally and keep the matter a profound secret."

And imprinting a kiss on Amy's cheek, she vanished.

"Oh, mamma, he has written me a letter of proposal!" cried Amy, entering her mother's room. "Mr. Sutherst, I mean."

"Impossible!"

"I will let you read the letter, mother dear," replied Amy, feeling a little hurt at her mother's tone. "That will convince you. It's—it's—not exactly what I should have thought. It is—well, I don't understand all the references. He speaks as if he had known me for years—as if he had loved me for years. Still, there is no doubt that he is really and truly in love."

Mrs. Bland's hands trembled so violently that she could scarcely take the letter, and with her left hand she had to hold the back of a chair for support. She sat down and read the letter without a word, read it eagerly, greedily. Then she drew her daughter to her in the old manner and kissed her.

"Amy, was this letter really addressed to you?"

"It was 'Amy Bland' on the envelope, and Blanche brought it to me. You see, he begins 'My dear Amy.'"

There was a pause; the mother seemed to be making an effort to say something, but all she said in the end was:

"Let us find the envelope."

They found it in Amy's room. Mrs. Bland looked at it, then handed it to her daughter and pointed to the word "Mrs." before the name "Amy Bland."

The girl stared at it, then at her mother; her eyes wandered from one to the other in amazement.

"What does it mean?" she gasped.

"It means that the letter is addressed to me," replied Mrs. Bland tenderly. "That explains the references which you do not understand. Mr. Sutherst and I were sweethearts many years ago; we quarrelled. I married, and was happy in my choice; he never married, but has loved me ever since. We recognised each other as soon as we met, although so many years have passed. But I did not anticipate this proposal. I warned you, because I felt that Mr. Sutherst's attention was fatherly, not loverly. My poor Amy!"

But Mrs. Bland's sympathy was not required. It took Amy some minutes to understand the position, but when she realised that her mother would have a protector and wealth in her old age without any sacrifice on her (Amy's) part, a great load seemed to fall from her heart and scale to drop from her eyes.

And then she told her mother just how she had felt, and that she had made up her mind to marry Sutherst in order to help her mother.

"If he asked me," she concluded, "but he didn't! So that makes it much better for Mr. Barton—if he likes to take the chance!"

Barton did not see the chance just then, but he became aware of it later and took it.

Blanche never ventures to tease her friend about any of the circumstances of the holiday at the Manor House. She began to do so soon after Amy's engagement to Barton, but Amy silenced her by holding up a blank envelope, and asking: "Miss or Mrs.?"

"What a dolt I was to make the mistake!" admitted Blanche.

A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

By William Westall.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.

PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

Major Wyvenhoe, commander of an expedition which went out from England to help the Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty. He is intrusted with dispatches for delivery to Bolivar, the Supreme Chief.

Captain Cautley, who is in charge of the ship which took the expedition out.

John Ready, the servant of Wyvenhoe.

General Arismendez, ex-Governor of Pampatar and Vice-President of the Venezuelan Republic. He received Wyvenhoe and Cautley on their arrival in Venezuela.

Don Iago Santleo, and Antonio Bonanza, two Venezuelans who accompany Wyvenhoe when he takes the dispatches to Bolivar.

CHAPTER XIII.

Bonanza's Story.

Don Iago's explanation made rather for darkness than light. While whetting my curiosity as to his antecedents it deepened the mystery in which he had shrouded himself from the beginning of our acquaintance.

He had seen the saying "all's well that ends well" in a book, presumably a Spanish book, and been told its meaning. Therefore he must know, or have known, somebody who knew English and had taught him to pronounce this phrase faultlessly, a phrase presenting peculiar difficulties to one conversant only with Spanish, which is spoken as it is spelt and possesses neither a "w" or the sound of "th."

For that he should have picked it up casually and hit upon the right pronunciation by chance was of course out of the question. He could only have acquired the proficiency which so much surprised me by considerable practice and hearing the words frequently repeated.

In short, Santleo must have been acquainted with an English speaking person, yet he protested that I was the only Englishman he had ever known, and it was almost inconceivable that there should be any aborigine or Spanish Creole on the western llanos or among the remoter mountains of Venezuela able to speak the language of Shakespeare with an irreproachable accent.

On the other hand, if he knew English why should he deny it, and if he did not want me to suspect that he knew it why had he said "All's well that ends well"? True, it might be an inadvertence. I inferred from his manner that it was—a supposition, however, that made the matter all the more bewildering, for no one quotes inadvertently in a language with which he is not tolerably familiar.

Moreover, though I had not known Don Iago long, we had been thrown much together and talked about many things, yet albeit I had spoken freely of myself and my past life, he had told me hardly aught of himself and nothing of his people or his home, which seemed all the more strange as he was of a frank and joyous nature, brave and true, and unless I was greatly mistaken had conceived as warm a regard for me as I had conceived for him. Not at all the sort of man to practise reserve out of suspicion or mistrust, or in pursuance of some deep laid design, I could only conclude that it was imposed on him from without, that he acted in obedience to some other will than his own, or possibly from a sense of duty.

Be that as it might Santleo had undoubtedly an imperative motive for his reticence, yet despite my ever growing curiosity on the subject I had no intention either of trying to surprise his secret or soliciting a confidence which he did not think fit to impart spontaneously. I should have to remain in the dark until time or circumstances unsealed his lips or otherwise unveiled the mystery.

These were my thoughts as I acted on my compadre's advice by changing my wet clothes for dry ones.

In our haste to escape from our pursuers we had boarded the nearest flechera, which happened to be the largest, and Bonanza's kit was in the other. But he was quite equal to the occasion. Doffing all his things he laid them in the bows to dry, covering himself meanwhile with a cobija, otherwise poncho capote, a large double blanket or rug, with a slit in the middle for the head, an indispensable necessity of South American travel.

Then he lighted a cigar, and looking at us with a highly amused expression broke into a laugh which lasted some time.

"Good, was not it? The best thing I've known for a long while," he exclaims at length, then laughs again.

"Since you say so I suppose it was," quoth I, "though 'pon my word I don't see where the fun came in. We were several times within an ace of being killed, and only escaped by the skin of our teeth. If you call that the best thing you have known for a long while I should like to know what is the worst."

"I was not thinking of our fight with the Godos, though it was so pleasantly exciting. I was thinking of that old traitor of an Alcalde taking me for Don Simon. That he should take you two, with your blue eyes, fair skins, and light hair, for Englishmen was natural. Nobody would take you for aught else, though Don Iago is a Creole. But to imagine I was the Supreme Chief! Ah! ah!"

"You feel flattered, I suppose?"

"Flattered? Did you ever see Bolivar?"

"No, that is a pleasure to come."

"Wait till you see him and then say whether you would feel flattered if you were taken for him. Look at me." Bonanza, who was a tall fellow and as vain as a peacock stretched himself to his full height. "Regard my legs" (tucking up his cobija). "Well, the Supreme Chief is quite little; his legs are like carrots, and when he has his boots on look for all the world like two candles in big sticks, while as for his face and mine—but wait till you see him. All the same"—here Bonanza became serious—"I would willingly exchange my physical advantages for his brains and tongue. There is not his equal in Venezuela for swaying a popular assembly, cajoling a man, or, though I say it myself, winning his way to the heart of a pretty woman."

"And is that a sort of thing to which Don Simon is given?"

"Well, they say that if he were as successful in war as he is in love he would never lose a battle, and he loses more than he wins."

"You had better not say that to anybody else, though, for if it came to his ears you would lose his favour, and I have heard that Bolivar never forgives," observed Don Iago.

"I have lost his favour already, else had I been a colonel by this time."

"How was that?"

"In this way. I was going down the Orinoco in a flechera with Don Simon and Colonel Hartado, a great favourite of his and an arrant boaster. He was always talking about himself and his exploits, protested that he cared neither for alligators nor Godos, and that he would swim through a river full of them without either hesitation or fear. Shortly afterwards the Chief wanted to land at a village and was put ashore in a canoe rowed by two Indians.

"Presently Hartado wanted to go also, and thinking it was a fine chance of putting his courage to the test, I had an understanding with the Indians, to whom I gave a little present, with the result that the canoe was accidentally capsized in a place where the river swarmed with caymanas (alligators).

"Madre de Dios! How Hartado yelled and swam. I never saw a man go through the water so fast in my life, and he was so frightened that when he landed he ran over so far on his hands and knees before he dared to get up and look behind him. As ill luck would have it, however, Bolivar saw it all and questioned the Indians, who let the cat out of the bag. He was angry and I got a good rating. What is worse, he has never forgiven me, and I shall never be promoted—by him."

"I am not surprised at Bolivar being angry. It was a very dangerous joke and might have cost both the colonel and the Indians their lives."

"Not at all. They righted the canoe in an instant, only Hartado was too scared to tarry. The danger was in his swimming ashore."

"What did he say?"

"Only that he yelled to frighten the caymanas, not out of fear. He was too mad to talk much."

"He was rightly served. But do you think you were wise in making an enemy of a man who has the Chief's ear?"

"I am not wise nor ever shall be. But I think I am rather clever in getting out of scrapes. Some of my friends are good enough to say that I have as many lives as a cat."

"And you would need to have considering the recklessness of your character and the nature of your country," I said laughing. "The rivers teem with alligators, caribe fish, and tembladores, the woods with snakes, tigers, scorpions, ticks, jiggers, and other insect abominations that suck your blood and spoil your rest. Then you have pirates, robbers, and a devastating war with enemies who give no quarter."

"So altogether you think Venezuela a good country to live out of," observed Santleo.

"I was speaking more in jest than in earnest. But if you put it in that way I should say that people who value their lives and study their comfort might, just now at least, find countries more to their taste."

"May I venture to ask you a question?"

"By all means. Ask away."

"Why, considering its present condition and other disadvantages, which I fully admit, did you come to Venezuela?"

"For several reasons. I am of a restless disposition and had nothing to do at home. I delight in adventure, sport, and active service, all of which I hoped to find here and have found; also I wanted to lend a hand in freeing South America from the yoke of Spain. For the rest, I don't set any great store by my life, and though I like comfort I can cheerfully dispense with it when needs must. Are you answered?"

"Perfectly, and I thank you for answering so frankly a question which I had no right to ask."

"Where no offence is meant none ought to be taken, and I hope you will not take it amiss if, having answered your question, I inquire why you left your native mountains, where, I suppose, peace reigns, to participate in this cruel war?"

"Yes, there is peace up there, and it is not likely to be disturbed. I quitted my native mountains in order to see something of the world and fight the Spaniards, though, as you say, it is a cruel war, and conducted in a way and a spirit which I little expected."

"If seeing the world be your object you should go further afield than Venezuela. If I keep my head on my shoulders and my throat from being cut for a twelvemonth I shall return to England after I have seen something of Central and North America and had a run through the United States. Why not come with me?"

Don Iago's eyes glistened and his manly face beamed with delight.

Bonanza lighted up a cigar, and broke into a laugh.

"Yonder are the lights of San Fernando," he said pointing westward.

"If I could, if I would," he exclaimed. "To see England is the wish nearest my heart, and I would give—but no, it is impossible. I should have—I mean that I cannot, without good cause, leave Venezuela until the Spaniards are out of it."

"But the good cause arising you would accept my invitation?"

"Not even then, Señor Wyvenhoe, unless—but let us say no more about it. There is not greater folly than indulging in hopes that can never be realised. Rather let us talk about your ancestor who voyaged in these parts so long ago. Guyana, you say, he called them. I wonder what he thought of it and whether he was ever hereabouts."

Nothing I had told Santleo, not even my account of London and Paris, so interested him as the story of Gilbert Wyvenhoe's adventures to which he often recurred.

"I doubt whether he got so high as this, but the names in his narratives are so queerly spelt that I cannot be sure," I answered. "How he liked the country he does not in so many words (of which he was sparing) say. But he was uncommonly glad to get home again."

"It was strange he heard nothing more of his companions."

"Considering the time and the circumstances it would have been strange if he had heard."

"Where did they part?"

"At an Indian village in a great forest."

"That does not tell us much. The others may have gone on and found Manoah."

"Which, seeing there is no such place, would be stranger still."

"How know you there is no such place, Señor Wyvenhoe? Have your travels in this continent been so extensive that you know every corner of it?"

"I bow to your correction, my dear compadre. I ought to have said that I don't believe in the existence of El Dorado. A mighty city built of silver and gold and inhabited by a race of civilised aborigines belongs to the region of phantasy, not of fact."

"I daresay. All the same they might have lighted on some happy valley, a place where they could rest and be thankful and end their days in peace."

"Possibly, but I don't think so. I have always felt persuaded that these poor wanderers perished miserably, and now that I have seen the country for myself I feel sure of it."

Here Bonanza, who was a poor listener and could never hold his tongue for five consecutive minutes, broke in:

"You have the advantage over me in the matter of travel outside of South America, Señor Wyvenhoe, but I have travelled more in Venezuela than you have, and it is a better country than you think, though just now under a cloud. As yet you have seen the merest fringe of it. I have been told that there is no land either in the new world or the old which is posses-ed of a greater variety of climate, scenery, and sport.

"Wait till you have chased wild bulls and hunted tigers on the llanos; wait till you have ridden a charge with General Paez and his wild cavalry of the plains, seen the Andes, and tasted the delights of Caraccas, and you will admit that there are few finer countries than this, and no climate so delightful as that of our tierra templada. But discussion is not my forte and serious talk bores me. Let us have something to eat, fighting Godos and running away is appetising work."

Wherever else he might have been Bonanza was excellent company. Always in high spirits his incessant chatter, though occasionally tiresome, served to beguile the tedium of the way, and his jokes gave us many a hearty laugh.

Our recent experience had made us very cautious and very vigilant. Our weapons were always ready, we kept in the middle of the river, though there the current was strongest, landed always on the right bank, choosing our camping places with great circumspection, setting always a watch, which was relieved every two hours, and strictly forbidding the Indians to stroll into the forest. Fortunately the Spaniards had no armed boats on the river, and though we met and passed several piratical looking craft, we showed so bold a front that none of them ventured to attack us.

Ten days after leaving Angostura we entered the Apure, one of the most important affluents of the Orinoco, yet vastly smaller than the main stream. Yet the profusion of animal life was greater than aught I had yet beheld or thought possible.

Caymanas eighteen and twenty feet long basked in groups among the sedges on the banks, and the water was so thick with the loathsome creatures that the Indians were continually striking them with their paddles. Now and then we caught sight of tigers and leopards gliding between the trees or sunning themselves on the sands.

Birds of gorgeous plumage flitted from bough to bough, others flew over our heads in flocks so prodigious as to hide the sun, and the shores were peopled with a vast variety of aquatic birds, from the long-legged pelican and stately flamingo to the smallest crane.

The sight was superb, but owing to the meanderings of the stream and the want of wind our progress was painfully slow, and the insect pests, which are never so numerous and malignant as in the neighbourhood of water, made life a torment. They were, if possible, even worse in the smaller branches by which we had to pass in order to keep clear of the Spaniards and reach the village of Caujaral, on the Apure, where our water journey ended.

Hard by is the town of San Juan de Pallara, where we requisitioned horses for ourselves and mules for our baggage, and an hour before next day's dawn we set out for San Fernando, to which place, as we had heard, Bolivar was laying siege. We were also assured that, the enemy being on the other side of the river, the road was safe, but by way of providing for possibilities we took with us six Zambos, and Don Antonio, who knew the country, acted as guide.

For a few miles the road, which was not much broader than a cattle track, led through dense scrub, but soon the forest became more open, the trees wider apart, forming here and there grassy glades, in one of which we made our first halt.

"Does this please you better, Señor Wyvenhoe?" inquired Bonanza as we dismounted.

"Decidedly," said I. "Anything is better than those interminable rivers and impenetrable forests, and the back of a horse is far before the stern sheets of a flechera."

"You feel freer, eh? Don't need to sit with your legs doubled underneath you. Caramba! I have not got the stiffness out of my joints even yet. And there is no place where a man on a good horse feels so free as on the llanos, where we shall be before long. We are already on the edge of the great plain of Varinas, and before many days are past you will see some beautiful fighting. Paez is with the army, and there is not his equal in all Columbia for beating up the enemy's quarters."

Our halt was of the shortest, and we halted only twice more, being anxious to get to the camp before nightfall. In this, however, we were disappointed. The pack mules began to lag behind, and their speed had to be ours, so that we were in the dark two hours short of our destination.

Nevertheless we pushed on, Bonanza protesting that he could find the way by night as easily as by day. He rode first, we others following him in single file and close order, the darkness being so thick under the trees that we were unable to see each other, and could indeed hardly see our horses' heads.

I was next to him. After me came Don Iago, and John Ready and the Zambos brought up the rear. Our unshod horses stepped noiselessly. None of us spoke except when necessity required, and only in a whisper, lest we should be heard by some enemy coming in the opposite direction or lurking in the bushes.

We had been going in this fashion something more than an hour when Bonanza suddenly pulled up and passed the word to halt.

"Yonder are the lights of San Fernando," he said, pointing westward. "In a few minutes we shall see the patriot camp fires on both sides of the river, if they have crossed it, as no doubt they have."

This was good hearing, and deeming caution no longer imperative we began to talk again. The Zambos would have sung if they had not been stopped. But presently Don Antonio pulled up a second time.

"Halt, and for Heaven's sake silence!" he said in a hoarse whisper. He had been talking more loudly than any of us. "I see no sign of a camp, and if our people have retreated, and they would only retreat after losing a battle, we are marching slap into the lion's mouth. We can go little or no further either one way or the other. The mules are dead beat, the horses tired, and crossing the river before daylight is out of the question. What's to be done?"

"Dismount and stand by the horses till the moon rises," suggested Don Iago.

"The very thing," said I. "When the moon shows up we shall be able to see what we are about, and the horses, relieved of our weight, will get a little rest."

So all dismounted. The Zambos threw themselves on the ground, but I bade John keep on the alert, and we three leant against our saddles ready to mount at the first alarm.

In half-an-hour the moon rose grandly in a clear sky, giving so fair a light that we could make out San Fernando distinctly, a little walled town on a spit of land which projected into the river, with a background of thick forest; but the intervening country was comparatively open, and a few hundred paces ahead of us was a grove of palm trees.

"What next?" asked Bonanza. "If we go further we are pretty sure to fall in with one of the enemy's patrols, and I suppose you would not like to go back until we have ascertained what has become of the Chief and his army."

"Our business is to find the Chief and deliver our dispatches, and we must go where he is," I rejoined. "We will bivouac in that palm grove and question the first passer by. Failing that, surprise a picket, if we can light on one."

On which we advanced, leading our horses, and were within a short distance of the grove when a dozen or more dark forms came out of it, two on horseback, the others on foot.

Thinking boldness the best policy I gave the order to mount and prepare to charge.

"Who goes there?" demanded one of the strangers.

"Amigos," returned Don Antonio, riding fearlessly forward.

"Friends! That is all very well, but what are you—patriots or Godos?"

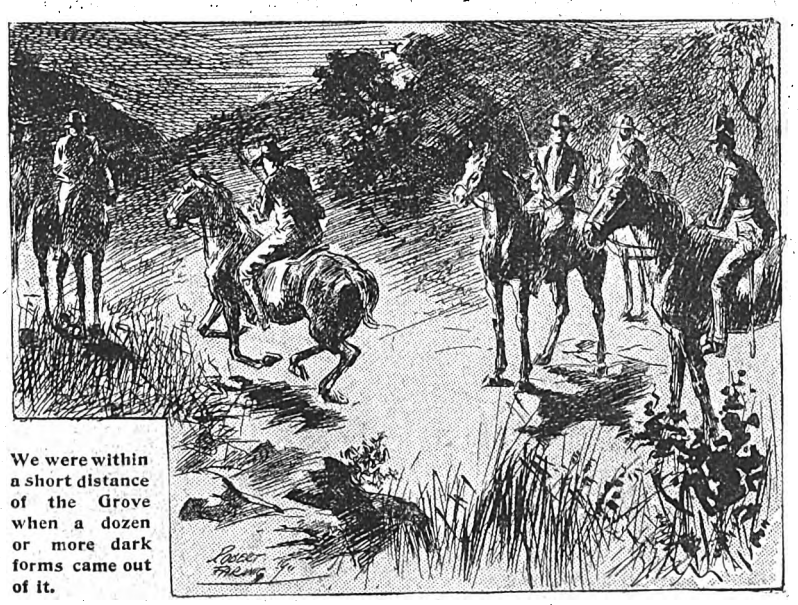
"It's all right," whispered Santleo. "Spaniards would neither call us patriots nor themselves Godos."

"Patriots, of course, and what are you?" replied and asked Bonanza.

"Also patriots—guerilleros."

"In that case you can perhaps tells us what has become of the patriot army? We were told that Don Simon was laying siege to San Fernando."

"So he meant to do and crossed the river with that intent, but hearing that Morillo was on the llanos he has gone to look for him. But they marched only a little while



We were within a short distance of the Grove when a dozen or more dark forms came out of it.

before sunset, and if you start early in the morning on the Caliboza trail you can easily overtake them. Will you do us the favour to join our encampment?"

"What do you say?" asked Bonanza turning to me. "Guerillero generally means brigand. Most of them take whatever they can lay their hands on and regard murder as a pleasant form of excitement."

"Nevertheless, I think we shall have to trust these fellows. To refuse their hospitality would make enemies of them at once, and we must guard against treachery by keeping together and not sleeping all at a time. They don't seem much, if any, stronger than ourselves."

"But there may be more than we have seen. However, there seems to be no choice. The Señor Major accepts your kind offer with pleasure, Señor Caballero——"

"My name is Gonsalvo."

"Señor Don Gonsalvo, and we shall be happy to join your bivouac."

"Gracias! Have you aught to eat?"

"Some tasajo and cassava bread."

"To the devil with your tasajo. We have a fat buck, and shall be happy to share it with you. Some of my fellows are making a fire. Let us go."

Whereupon the speaker led the way to a glade where a big fire was blazing, by the light of which we were able to take stock of our entertainers, of whom there were twice as many as ourselves.

Don Gonsalvo, the chief, was a black of herculanean proportions. His followers were about the most villainous-looking collection of cut-throats I ever beheld—and I had seen a few in Spain and elsewhere—negroes, quadroons, mulattoes, Zambos, and Indians, each more ill-favoured than the other, and only one white face amongst them. All were armed to the teeth. As for clothing, some wore Spanish uniforms, others the ordinary shirt and trousers, several a shirt only, and a few wore next to nothing.

That they would murder us if they could take us unawares I had no doubt whatever; but as we were as well armed as themselves and on our guard I did not think they were likely to make the attempt, and said so to Don Iago.

"You are quite right. Guerilleros only go in for hard fighting when they are cornered. I have no fear of their falling on us during the night unless we fall asleep. That is not the danger."

"What is, then?"

"Betrayal. I think Gonsalvo means honestly, otherwise he would have waited until we entered the grove and there attacked us. But in a band like this there is sure to be at least one Judas. San Fernando is less than an hour's walk away, and nothing would be easier than to sell us to the Spaniards."

"That is true, but as we cannot make a move before morning we must just take the risk and trust to Providence."

"Also keep a sharp look out. In my opinion the most likely of them to play the traitor is that white fellow in uniform. He looks like a soldier, and is probably a Spanish deserter. By betraying us he could both obtain immunity for his offence and a handsome reward. I'll speak to Diego."

Diego was the best of our Zambos, a wonderful tracker, as keen as a sleuthhound and as strong as a bull-fighter.

"What have you told Diego?" I asked.

"To keep an eye on that white-faced chap, and if he slips away to follow him."

In Disguise.

ON the occasion of the annual flower show at a certain town some members of the county police were drafted from the neighbouring villages on account of the large number of pickpockets who annually visit the show.

One elderly constable wore his regulation boots and ordinary policeman's trousers, but had donned a small cap in place of his helmet, and a small covert coat over his tunic. This coat was much too short, and the tails of the tunic hung down some way below it. Altogether he presented a most ludicrous appearance.

As he stood apart from the crowd, intently watching, a lady, to whom he was well-known, approached him, and asked him to direct her to a certain part of the show.

He thereupon drew himself up, and in a most awe-inspiring manner said:

"Hush, hush, Mrs. Tompkins. Don't speak to me now. I'm on detective duty." E. H.

One Way of Dispersing a Mob.

A POLICEMAN hailing from the granite city lately made application for a similar situation in the Leeds City Police Force.

The superintendent was examining him on his knowledge of police duty.

"In the event of your having to disperse a mob, how would you use your baton?"

"Oh, sir, we never used a baton for that purpose in Aberdeen. When we wanted to skaill a mob there, we jist pat roon the hat an' askit a collection."

A Gallant Rescue.

ONE very foggy night last November, a policeman in a quiet suburb of a town not far from Windsor, was engaged in a desperate struggle with two ruffians, whom he found attempting to rob an old lady.

Her piercing shrieks, and the shouts of "Help! in the Queen's name!" brought a passing rustic to the spot, and so valiantly did he perform that the would-be thieves were soon both secured.

The voluble thanks of the old lady and Robert were cut short by the remark:

"Don't mention it, yer Majesty. Thank heaven, I've helped ter save yer from them durned Acanhists."

And the honest fellow really seemed disappointed when he found that it was not his Sovereign whom his gallantry had rescued.

The Cyclist Scored.

A PORTION of the main road from Manchester to Swinton is very rough and lumpy on one side, while the other side has a very fair surface.

On a recent occasion, there being no other traffic about, a cyclist, who was riding on his wrong side to get the advantage of the good surface, was accosted by a policeman who demanded to know why he was on that side of the road.

"Oh," said the cyclist smiling, "I just came across to answer your silly questions," and the laugh that went up from the bystanders told the man in blue that for once the cyclist had scored. F. D. H.

A Sell for the "Bobby."

IT was in the time of the dog muzzling days.

A young lady was seen by a policeman to be carrying a little pet dog in her arms, which was without a muzzle.

The policeman went up to her and said:

"It is my dooty, ma'am, to take that dog in charge for not havin' a muzzle on."

"Oh," said the lady, "but it won't bite or hurt anyone."

"It's the lor, ma'am," said the man in blue.

Reluctantly the lady gave the policeman her dog, and passed on, leaving the astounded "bobby" with a toy poodle on wheels in his arms!

He Performed His Duty.

A YOUNG fellow, standing six feet two inches in height, joined the police force of his native town. At the end of his first day as a constable he dressed in mufti, and walked up to the top of the town to see his chums.

Presently the latter began to play leap-frog in the street, thereby obstructing the thoroughfare, and the new constable joined in with zest.

Suddenly a cry of "Stop!" was raised, and the players fled as the constable on the beat was seen approaching, among the first to run being the new constable.

When they got safely away, one of the players, in sudden recollection, exclaimed:

"Why, Dai, you're a bobby, too!"

Dai was thunderstruck.

"Why!" he gasped, slapping his thigh, "so I am. I've got to arrest you!"

Which he promptly did! W. J. O.

He Called the Police.

AT a certain draper's shop in the vicinity of Drury Lane they keep a small boy to run errands.

The other day a young lady came in and asked the shop assistant for a yard of silk. When it was placed in front of her she explained:

"Oh, really, I must be mad! I want muslin."

Hearing this, the boy rushed out of the shop, and, seeing a policeman across the road, ran up to him and shouted excitedly:

"Hi! come over to our shop, quick; there's a gal in there what's gone mad and wants muzzling!"

The Sailor's Ruse.

ONE day this summer a policeman on duty near the Customs Offices at one of our southern ports was accosted by an officer from a ship that had just arrived.

The sailor, who carried a parcel in his hand, slipped a 5s. piece into the policeman's palm, with the words:

"I am going to bring some tobacco ashore to-morrow night, so don't take any notice of me then."

The bobby pocketed the coin, but next evening, as the sailor appeared with a parcel under his arm, he stopped him, took him into the Customs Office, and had him searched and his parcel examined.

Great was the policeman's disgust to find nothing on which duty could be charged. He had let the tobacco pass on the previous night!

Wanted the Quid.

A CONCEITED cyclist, finding his machine was out of order, dismounted by the roadside in order to adjust the bearings, and seeing a country policeman near by he summoned him to his aid.
